Learning that there is an organized movement among the more conservative church people—manipulated by a "Sabbath" organization—to induce your honorable body to close on Sundays the World's Fair, to be held in 1893 in Chicago, the undersigned respectfully put in this counter petition, and ask that the Fair may be open to the public on each Sunday of its continuance. We ask this for the following reasons:

1. That the American principle of separation of church and state may be maintained.

2. That public morality may be subserved by providing a substitute for the immoral places to which men may resort when no moral amusements are available.

3. As a matter of justice also to the people of Chicago who have given of their means to make the Fair possible, tens of thousands of whom can visit the Fair only on a general holiday; and as a matter of justice also to the visitors to the Fair, whose time or means may be limited, and who certainly are entitled to great consideration at your hands.

4. For the public good. The opening of the Fair on Sunday will be for the benefit not only of Chicago, but of the whole country. The rights of no one are infringed, the happiness of no one disturbed. Those who wish to attend can do so; those who do not can otherwise spend the day. This is a solely humanitarian question, a question of human relations and human welfare, and, therefore, the only standard by which you can decide is that of the public welfare.

5. It will benefit the Fair, attracting a much larger attendance, interesting more people in it, and increasing its receipts.

6. To the objection that Sunday opening of the Fair will destroy the day as a rest-day, we affirm that the tendency would be exactly the opposite. The more beautiful you make Sunday, the more attractive, the more noble and varied in its pleasures and instructions, the more difficult it will be to change its character, the less danger there is that employers will ever have the power to transfer it from its present position to the days of toil. With choice of Sunday occupation restricted to attending church or visiting a saloon, the average workingman would choose to keep on laboring.

7. Finally: Opening the World's Fair on Sunday will harm no one but the keepers of immoral places, while it will benefit the Fair itself, the people of Chicago, and the visitors to the Fair, thereby conducing to municipal prosperity, individual education, public morality, and the development and good of the whole country.

Notes and Clippings.

THE Kansas City Times says: "There are at least three men who are avowed Infidels who are running for Congress in Kansas this year, but that will probably cut no figure in the election, as theology is not one of the issues in the state just now."

PROSTITUTES hav always had a reputation for piety. We read that great clerical fetes are going on in Brittany in honor of St. Yves, and the women of the town hav vowed to wreck vengeance on M. Renan if he should "profane the tomb of the saint by his presence."

RELIGIOUS enthusiasm affects some people curiously. A devout woman in Alabama recently hurled a hymn-book at the minister, making a center shot, then drove the congregation from the church, and, going home, attempted to kill her husband with an ax, as an offering to the Lord.—Kansas City Journal.

A POOR Italian applied for naturalization papers in this city last week. In order to find out whether he was worthy to enjoy the privileges of a citizen some serious questions were put. Among others was this query: "What are men sent to the legislature in Albany for?" The Italian fumbled with his forelock and stared at vacancy, then blurted out this reply: "To make money." That man, says the Herald, has imbibed the true spirit of at least one of our great American institutions.

THE Ironclad Age reports that M. E. Billings, after having a second trial for the murder of Prosecuting-attorney Kingsley and conviction and again appealing to the supreme court of the state of Iowa, has just had the verdict set aside by that tribunal. So he goes free. It was a queer case, says Dr. Monroe. Colonel Billings will be remembered as the author of the "Crimes of Preachers." When Moses Hull was in Indianapolis a few weeks ago, he told Dr. Monroe that Billings had gone back on his Infidelity and joined the church. The church is welcome to him. He belongs there.

"I AM going to introduce the bill again during the coming session at Albany," said General Curtis, the father of the bill to abolish capital punishment, to a World reporter. "I ask for the passage of the bill on practical grounds, as I consider it will be for the good of society. I would send a convicted murderer up for life, take away the pardoning power, and make the convict work for the good of the state during his natural life. There is no maudlin sympathy behind my bill, nor hav the Westinghouse people anything to do with it, as has been charged. In the states where capital punishment has been abolished—Michigan, Rhode Island, and Wisconsin—murders hav decreased, while in New York state the rate is eight per cent higher."

IT has been decided in London, Eng., to form a Freethought Society of Jews. A meeting was recently held in the Hall of Science, the headquarters of the Secularists of the metropolis, when about seven hundred Jews unanimously arrived at the conclusion to advance from the old religious restrictions of their fathers. Mr. G. W. Foote was present, and made an able speech, pointing out that the Christians had stolen their God and Bible from the Jews, and had then persecuted them. The Jews had, however, remained steadfast under unparalleled suffering. Christianity had also persecuted Freethought, and the bond of sympathy between Jewish and English Freethinkers should stimulate them to work hand-in-hand against the enemy of both.

THE Christian Register boasts of the progress of Unitarians toward more liberal religious views, and the Christian Advocate recalls this fact to mind: When Theodore Parker preached a sermon on "The Transient and Permanent in Christianity," it was followed by a great commotion in Unitarian circles. Other ministers ceased to exchange with him and when the Rev. John Sargent went so far as to fellowship him as a brother minister he incurred "a storm of criticism and reproach." But marvelous advancement has been made. According to the Christian Register, that sermon which when first delivered was condemned by Unitarians as dangerous heresy now appears to them to be essentially conservativ, and its boldest utterances are accepted as truisms. This indicates progress indeed, comments the Advocate, "but to one outside of that denomination the question occurs: Toward what does this progress tend? Is it in the direction of greater reverence for God and his son and his word? How long will it require Unitarians at this rate of speed to reach the position once occupied by Paine and Voltaire? The Register says that to-day 'Parker is honored with Channing and Emerson among the prophets of Unitarianism.' How is this? Channing believed in miracles, in the literal resurrection of Christ, in the preëxistence of Jesus, in future punishment, in the divine and miraculous revelation of Christianity. If Channing was a prophet, Parker and Emerson were false prophets. If Unitarians hav come to acknowledge Parker and Emerson as their prophets, they hav come to ignore miracles, to degrade Jesus to the level of a man, to deny the existence of a personal God. They hav abandoned Christainity and come to the borders of pantheism."

HITHERTO the church law in Quebec has been that every French Canadian farmer was required to pay tithes on his grain, every twenty-sixth bushel of grain being given to the parish priest. There were no tithes on hay, the result of which was that every habitant felt it to be his duty to grow hay, great quantities of which were sent to the States. The bishop of Three Rivers has now announced that henceforth there will be a tithe on hay to the extent of 7½ cents on every 100, or $7 50 on every 1,000 bundles of hay, paid in money. The Toronto Mail says: "The church, it is obvious, is bound to hav its pound of flesh, no matter how lean the unfortunate farmer may happen to be. So long as the church can keep the habitant docil, childlike, and ignorant, she is reasonably safe in her remarkable privileges. She understands this; hence it is that education is one of the subjects over which she exercises supreme control. There is, however, a limit to human endurance, and this line is very closely approached when at a time that the farmer is suffering an annual pinch at the hands of civil government, the church adds to his misery by commanding him to cast more into her already overflowing treasury."

The Mythical and Pagan Origin of Christianity.

It is the sun which under the name of Horus was born like your God in the arms of the celestial virgin, and passed through an obscure, indigent, and destitute childhood, answering to the season of cold and frost. It is the sun which under the name of Osiris, persecuted by Typhon and the tyrants of the air, was put to death, laid in a dark tomb, the emblem of the hemisphere of winter, and which rising afterward from the inferior zone to the highest point in the heavens awoke triumphant over giants and destroying angels Ye priests, from whom the murmurs proceed, you wear yourselvs its signs all over your bodies. Your tonsure is the disk of the sun; your stole is the zodiac; your rosaries the symbols of the stars and planets. Pontiffs and prelates, your miter, your crosier, your mantle, are the emblems of Osiris; and that crucifix, of which you boast the mystery without comprehending it, is the cross of Serapis, traced by the hands of Egyptian priests on the plan of the figurativ world, which passing through the equinoxes and the tropics became the emblem of future life and resurrection, because it touched the gates of ivory and horn through which the soul was to pass in its way to heaven.—Volney's Ruins of Empires, p. 103.

So far I hav endeavored to show that Christianity, in common with many other ancient creeds, is based upon a mixture of sun and nature worship, and that all of the Christian symbols and ceremonies are of pagan origin. Not only do I affirm this to be the fact and adduce evidence in support of such contention, but I propose to point out step by step how what is known as the Christian religion has, in obedience to the great law of evolution, undergone numerous changes, so that the early believers would scarcely be able to recognize in the religion of to-day their own or the faith of their fathers. Let me proceed with the proof. Next in importance to the cross as a symbol was the crucifix, or cross with the figure of a human being stretched upon it. Osiris is represented by the Egyptians as stretched like a human being upon the cross; Krishna and other imaginary saviors of mankind are represented in like fashion. The Rev. Robert Taylor was of opinion that the posts which were erected along by the river Nile, and which were in the form of a cross, may hav been the origin of this emblem. The river Nile was worshiped on account of its periodical inundations which gave fertility to the land in the provinces near its banks. Posts were erected along its course to indicate the hight to which it might be expected to rise. "These crosses," says Robert Taylor, "along the banks of the river would naturally share in the honor of the stream and be the most expressiv emblem of good fortune, peace, and plenty. The two ideas could never be separated; the fertilizing flood was the waters of life, that conveyed every blessing and even existence itself to the provinces through which it flowed. One other and most obvious hieroglyph completed the expressiv allegory—the demon of famin, who, should the waters fail of their inundation, or not reach the elevation indicated by the position of the transverse beam upon the upright, would reign in all the horrors over their desolated lands. This symbolical personification was, therefore, represented as a miserable emaciated wretch who had grown up 'as a tender plant and as a root out of a dry ground, who had no form nor comeliness; and when they should see him there was no beauty that they should desire him.' Meager were his looks; sharp misery had worn him to the bone. His crown of thorns indicated the sterility of the territories over which he reigned. The reed in his hand, gathered from the banks of the Nile, indicated that it was only the mighty river, by keeping within its banks, and thus withholding its wonted munificence, that placed an unreal scepter in his gripe. He was nailed to the cross in indication of his entire defeat. And the superscription of his infamous title, 'This is the king of the Jews,' expressivly indicated that famin, want, or poverty ruled the destinies of the most slavish, beggarly, and mean race of men with whom they had the honor of being acquainted" (Diegesis, p. 187. See also "Devil's Pulpit," vols. i and ii).

The dogma of the trinity in unity is very closely connected with the notion of the cross, and derives its origin from nature worship. In ancient Egypt we find a trinity in unity existing under the names of Osirus, Horus, and Raform, along with Isis; while in India we find the trinity bearing the names of Brahma, Vishnu, and Siva, in company with Devaki, the female element being needed for the production of life. The worship of the sun, then, is the source of all ancient religions; and since this great luminary was worshiped by all the early races of mankind it is no wonder that we find also that among these peoples the earth was adored as second only in importance, under the names of Devaki, Isis, Ishtar, Venus, Mary. The former daily and the latter yearly produced the sun without sexual union, bearing the relation of wife, mother, and daughter to that brilliant luminary in the same way as the Virgin Mary is supposed by orthodox Christians to do toward Jesus Christ, who was the son of God the father, God the Holy Ghost, and Joseph, the carpenter.

The idea of the mediator comes from Persia, like the story of the fall, so that Christianity is mythical from its foundation. The idea of Jesus as a divine being is a growth, as we shall see hereafter. Experience, however, demonstrates to us that the vast majority of Christians believe in the immaculate conception of the Virgin Mary, because they believe that Jesus was a historical character.

Now there can be no longer any doubt in the minds of thinking persons that the idea of a child being born of a pure virgin is preposterous; and that though it is within the realm of possibility that a man named Jesus lived who went about doing good and who proclaimed a new philosophy which was not acceptable to the Jews, in view of all we know about ancient sun worship it is highly improbable that any such pereon as Jesus lived at all, but more likely that the whole idea was built up out of such pre-existing materials as we hav indicated. For if we admit for one moment that Jesus is a historical character, by parity of reasoning we are compelled to acknowledge that Christna, Osiris, Mithra, Hercules, Esculapius, Bacchus, Apollo, and Adonis were also historical personages. The outlines of the lives of these alleged gods correspond with that of Jesus, but careful examination shows that their career can be traced to the apparent march of the sun through the zodiacal signs.

The zodiac (see Dr. Hardwicke's "Zodiacal Mythology," from "Creation and Evolution," p. 2) which is the line of the apparent annual circuit of the sun, we find was in Egypt, India, Persia, and Greece divided into twelve portions of thirty degrees each, the whole circuit consisting of three hundred and sixty degrees; and the equivalent signs bore a wonderful similarity to each other. In the old Indian zodiac published in the "Philosophical Transactions" of 1772 the signs are as follows, commencing at the vernal equinoxial point: ram, bull, man with two shields, crab, lion, virgin, balances, scorpion, bow and arrow, monster with goat's head and fish's hindquarters, urn, fish." The Indian and Egyptian signs differ slightly but not materially.

Dr. Hardwicke proceeds: "Each of these signs corresponds with a particular portion of the year, varying according to the slow movement known as the precession of the equinoxes, by which all the signs are moved forward very slightly year by year, at the rate of one degree in 71 or 72 years, until, at the end of 2,152 years, a whole sign has moved forward into the position previously occupied by the sign immediately preceding it. This is caused by the failure of the sun to reach the same point in the same time in his apparent circuit each year; and thus it happens that in a period of less than 26,000 years each sign will hav moved completely round the zodiacal band. Now, by a careful calculation it has been found that the vernal equinoxial point coincided with the first degree of Aries about 28 000 years ago, with the first degree of Libra about 17 000 years ago, with the first degree of Taurus B C. 4340, with that of Aries B C. 2188, and with that of Pisces B C. 36; so that at the present time the vernal equinoxial point is really occupied by the sign of the fishes, although, for astronomical purposes, the sign of the ram is always placed in that position, and will for the future always be considered as the first sign of the zodiac, no matter what sign may really occupy that position. Thus there is now what is called a fixed zodiac, which never changes, and which is an arbitrary arrangement made for scientific purposes, and a real zodiac whose figures move steadily and slowly year by year, until at the end of rather more than two thousand years the vernal equinoxial point is occupied by the sign immediately following the one which occupied it during that period of time. As the various astronomical figures became endowed by the ancients with divine honors, each of these signs became associated with a number of romantic stories, until at length the struggles, victories, and defeats of the gods were told in such a variety of ways that sufficient lore existed to fill, if written down, whole libraries. The zodiacal signs were all gods of great importance; the planets were gods, the sun was a god, the moon was a goddess, and the extra-zodiacal constellations were either gods or heroes; but all were not of equal importance, and owing to the constant changing of positions, some were powerful and victorious at one time and weak and dying at another. The chief deity, which to the Aryans was Dyaus, the day father, became in later times a concentrated essence of all the gods, and was supposed to undergo all the vicissitudes to which they were subjected; but inasmuch as the new-born sun was the life of the world, bringing back happiness, and the vernal equinoxial sign was the one at which his influence began to be felt, these two deities were looked upon as god par excellence, a dual deity, separate yet conjoined, and of equal power and authority.

"So, when the bull was the vernal equinoxial point, the sun in Taurus was supreme god; and when the ram, or lamb, was the vernal equinoxial point the sun in Aries was supreme god; and although it was only in March that the sun was at the vernal equinoxial point, yet the bull-god for two thousand years prior to B C. 2188 was always supreme, and the ram-god (in Egypt) or lamb-god (in Persia) after that date. On leaving the vernal equinoxial sign the sun passed into the next in order; but, although then not actually in conjunction with the chief sign, it was but slightly removed from it, the distance growing larger as each fresh sign was occupied: and never were the sun and the principal sign actually separated from each other in the zodiac, so as to pass into opposit hemispheres, until the autumnal equinoxial point was crossed, after which the sun passed successivly through all the winter constellations, being separated for the space of six months from the sign of the vernal equinox." Therefore, the six summer signs were accounted specially beautiful and holy; the sign of the vernal equinox being the head and chief of the six, while the six winter signs were accounted less holy, but quite as powerful for evil as the others were for good.

"From this was formed the main drama of all subsequent mythological systems, the ground-work of which was as follows: 'The savior sun god was born at the winter solstice, and ascended to the vernal equinox where he was united with the bull, becoming the bull god, and in after-time with the ram or lamb, becoming the ram god or lamb god; after crossing the equator at spring covenant, or coming together at the equator and ecliptic, he ascended to the summit of the heavens, becoming the lion god, at the hight of his power, and then descending again to the autumnal covenant, or equinox, to pass through the winter or scorpion signs alone, and mourning the loss of the vernal equinoxial sign, which was torn from him at the autumnal equinox.' This simple narrativ received numerous embellishments in after times, according to the fancy of the astrologers and priests, who, in many cases, contrived to make out of it a beautiful poem or sublime allegorical drama" (Dr. Hardwicke's Evolution and Creation, p. 6, 7).

This zodiacal mythology forms the basis of all Eastern religions, and Christianity itself is largely founded upon it. In the next chapter I shall endeavor to show how much of the career of Jesus is drawn from this source; how the miraculous part of the supposed life of the Nazarene carpenter was developed; and then we shall be able to judge this branch of the subject in the light of evolution.

ARTHUR B. MOSS.

Testimonial to Walt Whitman.

Let Us Put Wreaths on the Brows of the Living.

Of all the placid hours in his peaceful life, those that Walt Whitman spent on the stage of Horticultural Hall last night must have been among the most gratifying, says the Philadelphia Press of October 22d. To a testimonial, intended to cheer his declining years, not only in a complimentary sense, came a thousand or more people to listen to a tribute to the aged poet by Col. Robert G. Ingersoll, such as seldom falls to the lot of living man to hear about himself.

On the stage sat many admirers of the venerable torch-bearer of modern poetic thought, as Colonel Ingersoll described him, young and old, men and women. There were white beards, but none were so white as that of the author of "Leaves of Grass." He sat calm and sedate in his easy wheeled chair, with his usual garb of gray, with his cloudy white hair falling over his white, turned-down collar that must have been three inches wide. No burst of eloquence from the orator's lips disturbed that equanimity; no tribute of applause moved him from his habitual calm.

And when the lecturer, having concluded, said, "We have met to-night to honor ourselves by honoring the author of 'Leaves of Grass,'" and the audience started to leave the hall, the man they had honored reached forward with his cane and attracted Colonel Ingersoll's attention.

"Do not leave yet," said Colonel Ingersoll, "Mr. Whitman has a word to say."

This is what he said, and no more characteristic thing ever fell from the poet's lips or flowed from his pen:

"Only a word, my friends, only a word. After all, the main factor, my friends, is in meeting, being face to face and meeting like this. I thought I would like to come forward with my living voice and thank you for coming and thank Robert Ingersoll for speaking, and that is about all. With such brief thanks to you and him and showing myself to bear testimony—I think that is the Quaker term—face to face, I bid you all hail and farewell."

THE LECTURE.—AUTHORIZED AND COMPLETE REPORT.

I.

In the year 1855 the American people knew but little of books. Their ideals, their models, were English. Young and Pollok, Addison and Watts were regarded as great poets. Some of the more reckless read Thomson's "Seasons" and the poems and novels of Sir Walter Scott. A few, not quite orthodox, delighted in the mechanical monotony of Pope, and the really wicked—those lost to all religious shame—were worshipers of Shakspere. The really orthodox Protestant, untroubled by doubts, considered Milton the greatest poet of them all. Byron and Shelley were hardly respectable—not to be read by young persons. It was admitted on all hands that Burns was a child of nature of whom his mother was ashamed and proud.

In the blessed year aforesaid, candor, free and sincere speech, were under the ban. Creeds at that time were entrenched behind statutes, prejudice, custom, ignorance, stupidity, Puritanism, and slavery; that is to say, slavery of mind and body.

Of course it always has been, and forever will be, impossible for slavery, or any kind or form of injustice, to produce a great poet. There are hundreds of verse makers and writers on the side of wrong—enemies of progress—but they are not poets, they are not men of genius.

At this time a young man—he to whom this testimonial is given—he upon whose head have fallen the snows of more than seventy winters—this man, born within the sound of the sea, gave to the world a book, "Leaves of Grass." This book was, and is, the true transcript of a soul. The man is unmasked. No drapery of hypocrisy, no pretense, no fear. The book was as original in form as in thought. All customs were forgotten or disregarded, all rules broken—nothing mechanical—no imitation—spontaneous, running and winding like a river, multitudinous in its thoughts as the waves of the sea—nothing mathematical or measured. In everything a touch of chaos—lacking what is called form as clouds lack form, but not lacking the splendor of sunrise or the glory of sunset. It was a marvelous collection and aggregation of fragments, hints, suggestions, memories and prophecies, weeds and flowers, clouds and clods, sights and sounds, emotions and passions, waves, shadows, and constellations.

His book was received by many with disdain, with horror, with indignation and protest—by the few as a marvelous, almost miraculous, message to the world—full of thought, philosophy, poetry, and music.

In the republic of mediocrity genius is dangerous. A great soul appears and fills the world with new and marvelous harmonies. In his words is the old Promethean flame. The heart of nature beats and throbs in his line. The respectable prudes and pedagogues sound the alarm, and cry, or rather screech: "Is this a book for a young person?"

A poem true to life as a Greek statue—candid as nature—fills these barren souls with fear.

Drapery about the perfect was suggested by immodesty.

The provincial prudes, and others of like mold, pretend that love is a duty rather than a passion—a kind of self-denial—not an overmastering joy. They preach the gospel of pretense and pantalettes. In the presence of sincerity, of truth, they cast down their eyes and endeavor to feel immodest. To them, the most beautiful thing is hypocrisy adorned with a blush.

They have no idea of an honest, pure passion, glorying in its strength—intense, intoxicated with the beautiful—giving even to inanimate things pulse and motion, and that transfigures, ennobles, and idealizes the object of its adoration.

They do not walk the streets of the city of life—they explore the sewers; they stand in the gutters and cry "Unclean!" They pretend that beauty is a snare; that love is a Delilah; that the highway of joy is the broad road, lined with flowers and filled with perfume, leading to the city of eternal sorrow.

Since the year 1855 the American people have developed; they are somewhat acquainted with the literature of the world. They have witnessed the most tremendous of revolutions, not only upon the fields of battle, but in the world of thought. The American citizen has concluded that it is hardly worth while being a sovereign unless he has the right to think for himself.

And now, from this hight, with the vantage-ground of to-day, I propose to examine this book and to state, in a general way, what Walt Whitman has done, what he has accomplished, and the place he has won in the world of thought.

II.

THE RELIGION OF THE BODY.

Walt Whitman stood, when he published his book, where all stand to-night—on the perpetually moving line where history ends and prophecy begins. He was full of life to the very tips of his fingers—brave, eager, candid, joyous with health. He was acquainted with the past. He knew something of song and story, of philosophy and art—much of the heroic dead, of brave suffering, of the thoughts of men, the habits of the people—rich as well as poor—familiar with labor, a friend of wind and wave, touched by love and friendship—liking the open road, enjoying the fields and paths, the crags—friend of the forest—feeling that he was free—neither master nor slave—willing that all should know his thoughts—open as the sky, candid as nature—and he gave his thoughts, his dreams, his conclusions, his hopes, and his mental portrait to his fellow-men.

Walt Whitman announced the gospel of the body. He confronted the people. He denied the depravity of man. He insisted that love is not a crime; that men and women should be proudly natural; that they need not grovel on the earth and cover their faces for shame. He taught the dignity and glory of the father and mother; the sacredness of maternity.

Maternity, tender and pure as the tear of pity, holy as suffering—the crown, the flower, the ecstasy of love.

People had been taught from bibles and from creeds that maternity was a kind of crime; that the woman should be purified by some ceremony in some temple built in honor of some god. This barbarism was attacked in "Leaves of Grass."

The glory of simple life was sung; a declaration of independence was made for each and all.

And yet this appeal to manhood and to womanhood was misunderstood. It was denounced simply because it was in harmony with the great trend of nature. To me, the most obscene word in our language is celibacy.

It was not the fashion for people to speak or write their thoughts. We were flooded with the literature of hypocrisy. The writers did not faithfully describe the worlds in which they lived. They endeavored to make a fashionable world. They pretended that the cottage or the hut in which they dwelt was a palace, and they called the little area in which they threw their slops their domain, their realm, their empire. They were ashamed of the real, of what their world actually was. They imitated; that is to say, they told lies, and these lies filled the literature of most lands.

Walt Whitman defended the sacredness of love, the purity of passion—the passion that builds every home and fills the world with art and song.

They cried out: "He is a defender of passion—he is a libertine! He lives in the mire. He lacks spirituality!"

Whoever differs with the multitude, especially with a led multitude—that is to say, with a multitude of taggers—will find out from their leaders that he has committed an unpardonable sin. It is a crime to travel a road of your own, especially if you put up guide-boards for the information of others.

Many centuries ago Epicurus, the greatest man of his century, and of many centuries before and after, said: "Happiness is the only good; happiness is the supreme end." This man was temperate, frugal, generous, noble—and yet through all these years he has been denounced by the hypocrites of the world as a mere eater and drinker.

It was said that Whitman had exaggerated the importance of love—that he had made too much of this passion. Let me say that no poet—not excepting Shakspere—has had imagination enough to exaggerate the importance of human love—a passion that contains all hights and all depths—ample as space, with a sky in which glitter all constellations, and that has within it all storms, all lightnings, all wrecks and ruins, all griefs, all sorrows, all shadows, and all the joy and sunshine of which the heart and brain are capable.

No writer must be measured by a word or line or paragraph. He is to be measured by his work—by the tendency, not of one line, but by the tendency of all.

Which way does the great stream tend? Is it for good or evil? Are the motives high and noble, or low and infamous?

We cannot measure Shakspere by a few lines, neither can we measure the Bible by a few chapters, nor "Leaves of Grass" by a few paragraphs. In each there are many things that I neither approve nor believe—but in all books you will find a mingling of wisdom and foolishness, of prophecies and mistakes—in other words, among the excellencies there will be defects. The mine is not all gold, or all silver, or all diamonds—there are baser metals. The trees of the forest are not all of one size. On some of the highest there are dead and useless limbs, and there may be growing beneath the bushes, weeds, and now and then a poisonous vine.

If I were to edit the great books of the world, I might leave out some lines and I might leave out the best. I have no right to make of my brain a sieve and say that only that which passes through belongs to the rest of the human race. I claim the right to choose. I give that right to all.

Walt Whitman had the courage to express his thought—the candor to tell the truth. And here let me say it gives me joy—a kind of perfect satisfaction—to look above the bigoted bats, the satisfied owls and wrens and chickadees, and see the great eagle poised, circling higher and higher, unconscious of their existence. And it gives me joy, a kind of perfect satisfaction, to look above the petty passions and jealousies of small and respectable people—above the considerations of place and power and reputation, and see a brave, intrepid man.

It must be remembered that the American people had separated from the Old World—that we had declared not only the independence of colonies, but the independence of the individual. We had done more—we had declared that the state could no longer be ruled by the Church, and that the Church could not be ruled by the state, and that the individual could not be ruled by the Church. These declarations were in danger of being forgotten. We needed a new voice, sonorous, loud, and clear, a new poet for America for the new epoch, somebody to chant the morning song of the new day.

The great man who gives a true transcript of his mind, fascinates and instructs. Most writers suppress individuality. They wish to please the public. They flatter the stupid and pander to the prejudice of their readers. They write for the market—making books as other mechanics make shoes. They have no message—they bear no torch—they are simply the slaves of customers. The books they manufacture are handled by "the trade;" they are regarded as harmless. The pulpit does not object; the young person can read the monotonous pages without a blush—or a thought. On the title-pages of these books you will find the imprint of the great publishers—on the rest of the pages, nothing. These books might be prescribed for insomnia.

III.

Men of talent, men of business, touch life upon few sides. They travel but the beaten path. The creative spirit is not in them. They regard with suspicion a poet who touches life on every side. They have little confidence in that divine thing called sympathy, and they do not and cannot understand the man who enters into the hopes, the aims, and the feelings of all others.

In all genius there is the touch of chaos—a little of the vagabond; and the successful tradesman, the man who buys and sells, or manages a bank, does not care to deal with a person who has only poems for collaterals—they hav a little fear of such people, and regard them as the awkward country man does a sleight-of-hand performer.

In every age in which books have been produced the governing class, the respectable, have been opposed to the works of real genius. If what are known as the best people could have their way, if the pulpit had been consulted—the provincial moralists—the works of Shakspere would have been suppressed. Not a line would have reached our time. And the same may be said of every dramatist of his age.

If the Scotch Kirk could have decided, nothing would have been known of Robert Burns. If the good people, the orthodox, could have had their say, not one line of Voltaire would now be known. All the plates of the French Encyclopedia would have been destroyed with the thousands that were destroyed. Nothing would have been known of D'Alembert, Grimm, Diderot, or any of the Titans who warred against the thrones and altars and laid the foundation of modern literature not only, but what is of far greater moment, universal education.

It is not too much to say that every book now held in high esteem would have been destroyed, if those in authority could have had their will. Every book of modern times, that has a real value, that has enlarged the intellectual horizon of mankind, that has developed the brain, that has furnished real food for thought, can be found in the Index Expurgatorius of the Papacy, and nearly every one has been commended to the free minds of men by the denunciations of Protestants.

If the guardians of society, the protectors of "young persons," could have had their way, we should have known nothing of Byron or Shelley. The voices that thrill the world would now be silent. If authority could have had its way, the world would have been as ignorant now as it was when our ancestors lived in holes or hung from dead limbs by their prehensile tails.

But we are not forced to go very far back. If Shakspere had been published for the first time now, those divine plays—greater than continents and seas, greater even than the constellations of the midnight sky—would be excluded from the mails by the decision of the present enlightened postmaster-general.

The poets have always lived in an ideal world, and that ideal world has always been far better than the real world. As a consequence, they have forever roused, not simply the imagination, but the energies—the enthusiasm of the human race.

The great poets have been on the side of the oppressed—of the downtrodden. They have suffered with the imprisoned and the enslaved, and whenever and wherever man has suffered for the right, wherever the hero has been stricken down—whether on field or scaffold—some man of genius has walked by his side, and some poet has given form and expression, not simply to his deeds, but to his aspirations.

From the Greek and Roman world we still hear the voices of a few. The poets, the philosophers, the artists, and the orators still speak. Countless millions have been covered by the waves of oblivion, but the few who uttered the elemental truths, who had sympathy for the whole human race, and who were great enough to prophesy a grander day, are as alive to-night as when they roused, by their bodily presence, by their living voices, by their works of art, the enthusiasm of their fellow men.

Think of the respectable people, of the men of wealth and position, those who dwelt in mansions, children of success, who went down to the grave voiceless, and whose names we do not know. Think of the vast multitudes, the endless processions, that entered the caverns of eternal night—leaving no thought—no truth as a legacy to mankind!

The great poets have sympathized with the people. They have uttered in all ages the human cry. Unbought by gold, unawed by power, they have lifted high the torch that illuminates the world.

IV.

Walt Whitman is in the highest sense a believer in democracy. He knows that there is but one excuse for government—the preservation of liberty; to the end that man may be happy. He knows that there is but one excuse for any institution, secular and religious—the preservation of liberty; and that there is but one excuse for schools, for universal education, for the ascertainment of facts, namely, the preservation of liberty. He resents the arrogance and cruelty of power. He has sworn never to be tyrant or slave. He has solemnly declared:

I speak the password primeval—I give the sign of democracy.
By God! I will accept nothing which all cannot have their counterpart of on the same terms.

This one declaration covers the entire ground. It is a declaration of independence, and it is also a declaration of justice, that is to say, a declaration of the independence of the individual, and a declaration that all shall be free. The man who has this spirit can truthfully say:

I have taken off my hat to nothing known or unknown.
I swear I am for those that have never been mastered.

There is in Whitman what he calls "The boundless impatience of restraint"—together with that sense of justice which compelled him to say: "Neither a servant, nor a master, am I."

He was wise enough to know that giving others the same rights that he claims for himself could not harm him, and he was great enough to say: "As if it were not indispensable to my own rights that others possess the same."

He felt as all should feel, that the liberty of no man is safe unless the liberty of each is safe.

There is in our country a little of the old servile spirit, a little of the bowing and cringing to others. Many Americans do not understand that the officers of the government are simply the servants of the people. Nothing is so demoralizing as the worship of place. Whitman has reminded the people of this country that they are supreme, and he has said to them:

The President is there in the White House for you—it is not you who are here for him.
The Secretaries act in their bureaus for you—not you here for them.
All doctrines, all politics and civilization exurge from you.
All sculpture and monuments and anything inscribed anywhere are tallied in you.

He describes the ideal American citizen—the one

Who says, indifferently and alike, "How are you, friend?" to the President at his levee.
And he says, "Good day, my brother," to the slave that hoes in the sugar field.

Long ago, when the politicians were wrong, when the judges were subservient, when the pulpit was a coward, Walt Whitman shouted:

Man shall not hold property in man.
The least developed person on earth is just as important and sacred to himself or herself as the most developed person is to himself or herself.

This is the very soul of true democracy.

Beauty is not all there is of poetry. It must contain the truth. It is not simply an oak, rude and grand, neither is it simply a vine. It is both. Around the oak of truth runs the vine of beauty.

Walt Whitman utters the elemental truths and is the poet of democracy. He is also the poet of individuality.

V.

INDIVIDUALITY.

In order to protect the liberties of a nation, we must protect the individual. A democracy is a nation of free individuals. The individuals are not to be sacrificed to the nation. The nation exists only for the purpose of guarding and protecting the individuality of men and women. Walt Whitman has told us that: "The whole theory of the universe is directed to one single individual—namely, to you."

And he has also told us that the greatest city—the greatest nation—is "where the citizen is the head and the ideal."

And that

The greatest city is that which has the greatest man or woman.
If it be but a few ragged huts, it is still the greatest city in the whole world.

By this test, maybe the greatest city on the continent to-night is Camden.

This poet has asked of us this question:

What do you suppose will satisfy the soul, except to walk free and own no superior?

The man who asks this question has left no impress of his lips in the dust, and has no dirt upon his knees.

He carries the idea of individuality to its utmost hight:

What do you suppose I have intimated to you in a hundred ways
But that man or woman is as good as God?
And that there is no God any more divine than yourself?

Glorying in individuality, in the freedom of the soul, he cries out:

Oh, the joy of suffering!
To struggle against great odds;
To meet enemies undaunted;
To be entirely alone with them—to find out how much I can stand;
To look strife, torture, prison, popular odium, death, face to face;
To mount the scaffold—to advance to the muzzle of guns—with perfect nonchalance—
To be indeed a god.

Walt Whitman is willing to stand alone. He is sufficient unto himself, and he says:

Henceforth I ask not good fortune—I am good fortune.
Strong and content I travel the open road.
I am one of those who look carelessly into faces of Presidents and Governors as to say, "Who are you?"

And not only this, but he has the courage to say: "Nothing—not God—is greater to one than one's self." Walt Whitman is the poet of Individuality—the defender of the rights of each for the sake of all—and his sympathies are as wide as the world. He is the defender of the whole race.

VI.

HUMANITY.

The great poet is intensely human—infinitely sympathetic—entering into the joys and griefs of others, bearing their burdens, knowing their sorrows. Brain without heart is not much; they must act together. When the respectable people of the North, the rich, the successful, were willing to carry out the Fugitive Slave law, Walt Whitman said:

I am the wounded slave—I wince at the bite of the dogs.
Hell and despair are upon me—"Crack" and again "crack" the marksmen;
I clutch the rails of the fence—my blood drips, thinned with the ooze of my skin;
I fall on the weeds and stones;
The riders spur their unwilling horses—haul close;
Taunt my dizzy ears and beat me with the butts of their whips.
Agonies are one of my changes of garment.
I do not ask the wounded person how he feels. I, myself, become the wounded person.

I see myself in prison shaped like another man;
And feel the dull unintermitted pain.
For me the keepers of convicts shoulder their carbines and keep watch.
It is I, let out in the morning and barred at night.
Not a prisoner walks handcuffed to the jail but I am handcuffed to him and walk by his side.

Judge not as the judge judges, but as the sun falling upon a helpless thing.

Of the very worst he had the infinite tenderness to say: "Not until the sun excludes you will I exclude you."

In this age of greed, when houses and lands, and stocks and bonds, outrank human life; when gold is more of value than blood, these words should be read by all:

When the psalm sings, instead of the singer;
When the script preaches, instead of the preacher;
When the pulpit descends and goes, instead of the carver that carved the supporting desk;
When I can touch the body of books, by night or by day, and when they touch my body back again;
When the holy vessels, or the bits of Eucharist, or lath and plast procreate as effectually as the young silversmiths or bakers or the masons in their overalls;
When the university convinces like a slumbering woman and child convince;
When the minted gold in the vault smiles like the night-watchman's daughter;
When warranty deeds loaf in chairs opposite, and are my friendly companions;
I intend to reach them my hand and make as much of them as I do of men and women like you!

VII.

The poet is also a painter, a sculptor—he, too, deals in form and color. The great poet is of necessity a great artist. With a few words he creates pictures, filling his canvas with living men and women—with those who feel and speak. Have you ever read the account of the stage-driver's funeral? Let me read it:

Cold dash of waves at the ferry wharf—posh of ice in the river—half frozen mud in the street—a gray discouraged sky overhead—short-lasting daylight of twelfth month.

A hearse and stages—other vehicles give place—the funeral of an old Broadway stage-driver—the cortege mostly drivers.

Steady the trot to the cemetery—duly rattles the death-bell—the gate is passed—the new-dug grave is hollowed out—the living alight—the hearse uncloses.

The coffin is passed out—lowered and settled—the whip is laid on the coffin—the earth is softly shoveled in.

The mound above is flattened with the spades.

Silence: and among them no one moves or speaks.

It is done. He is decently laid away.

Is there anything more?

He was a good fellow—free mouthed—quick tempered—not bad looking—able to take his own part—witty—sensitive to a slight—ready with life or death for a friend—fond of women—gambled—ate hearty—drank hearty—had known what it was to be flush—grew low spirited toward the last—sickened—was helped by a contribution—died aged forty-one years—and that was his funeral.

Let me read you another description—one of a woman:

Behold a woman!
She looks out from her Quaker cap—her face is clearer and more beautiful than the sky.
She sits in an arm chair under the shaded porch of the farm house.
The sun just shines on her old, white head.
Her ample gown is of cream hued linen.
Her grandsons raised the flax and her granddaughters spun it with the distaff and the wheel.
The melodious character of the earth.
The finished—beyond which philosophy cannot go and does not wish to go.
The justified mother of men.

Would you hear of an old-time sea fight?

Would you learn who won by the light of the moon and stars?
List to the yarn as my grandmother's father, the sailor, told it to me:
Our foe was no skulk in his ship, I tell you, said he.
His was the surly English pluck, and there is no tougher or truer, and never was and never will be.
Long the lower eve he came, horribly raking us.
We closed with him; the yards entangled, the cannon touched.
My captain lashed fast with his own hands.
We had received some eighteen pound shots under the water, and on our lower gun deck two large pieces had burst at the first fire, killing all around and blowing up overhead.
Fighting at sundown; fighting at dark.
Ten o'clock at night; the full moon well up; our leaks on the gain; five feet of water reported.
The master-at-arms loosing the prisoners confined in the hold to give them a chance for themselves
The transit to and from the magazine is now stopped by the sentinels.
They see so many strange faces they do not know whom to trust.
Our frigate takes fire.
The other asks if we demand quarter,
If our colors are struck and the fighting done.
Now I laugh content, for I hear the voice of my little Captain,
"We have not struck," he composedly cries, "we have just begun our part of the fighting."
Only three guns in use.
One is directed by the Captain himself against the enemy's mainmast.
Two, well served with grape and canister, silences his musketry and clears his decks.
The taps alone second the fire of his little battery, especially the maintop.
They hold out bravely during the whole of the action.
Not a moment's cease,
The leaks gain fast on the pumps, the fire eats toward the powder magazine; one of the pumps has been shot away; it is thought we are sinking.
Serene stands the little Captain,
He is not hurried; his voice neither high nor low.
His eyes give more light to us than our battle lanterns.
Toward twelve, there in the beams of the moon, they surrender to us.
Stretched and still lies the midnight,
Two great hulks motionless on the breast of the darkness,
Our vessel riddled and slowly sinking, preparations to pass to the one we have conquered.
The captain on the quarter deck coolly giving his orders through a countenance white as a sheet;
Near by, the corpse of the child that served in the cabin;
The dead face of an old salt, with long white hair and carefully curled whiskers.
The flames. spite of all that can be done, flecked aloft and below,
The husky voices of the two officers yet fit for duty.
Formless stacks of bodies and bodies by themselves, dabs of flesh upon the masts and spars;
Cut of cordage, tangle of rigging, slight shock of the sooth of waves;
Black and impassive guns, litter of powder parcels, strong scent.
A few large stars overhead, silent and mournful, shining; delicate sniffs of sea breeze, smells of sedge grass and fields by the shore; death messages given in charge to survivors.
The hiss of the surgeon's knife, the gnawing teeth of his saw,
Wheeze, cluck, swash of falling blood, short, wild scream, long, dull, tapering groan.

Some people say that this is not poetry—that it lacks measure and rhyme.

VIII.

WHAT IS POETRY?

The whole world is engaged in the invisible commerce of thought. That is to say, in the exchange of thoughts by words, symbols, sounds, colors, and forms. The motions of the silent, invisible world, where feeling glows and thought flames—that contains all seeds of action—are made known only by sounds and colors, forms, objects, relations, uses, and qualities—so that the visible universe is a dictionary, an aggregation of symbols, by which and through which is carried on the invisible commerce of thought. Each object is capable of many meanings, or of being used in many ways to convey ideas or states of feeling or of facts that take place in the world of the brain.

The greatest poet is the one who selects the best, the most appropriate symbols to convey the best, the highest, the sublimest thoughts. Each man occupies a world of his own. He is the only citizen of his world. He is subject and sovereign, and the best he can do is to give the facts concerning the world in which he lives to the citizens of other worlds. No two of these worlds are alike. They are of all kinds, from the flat, barren, and uninteresting—from the small and shriveled and worthless—to those whose rivers and mountains and seas and constellations belittle and cheapen the visible world. The inhabitants of these marvelous worlds have been the singers of songs, utterers of great speech—the creators of art.

And here lies the difference between creators and imitators: the creator tells what passes in his own world—the imitator does not. The imitator abdicates, and by the fact of imitation falls upon his knees. He is like one who, hearing a traveler talk, pretends to others that he has traveled.

In nearly all lands, the poet has been privileged—for the sake of beauty, they have allowed him to speak, and for that reason he has told the story of the oppressed, and has excited the indignation of honest men and even the pity of tyrants. He, above all others, has added to the intellectual beauty of the world. He has been the true creator of language, and has left his impress on mankind.

What I have said is not only true of poetry—it is true of all speech. All are compelled to use the visible world as a dictionary. Words have been invented and are being invented—for the reason that new powers are found in the old symbols, new qualities, relations, uses, and meanings. The growth of language is necessary on account of the development of the human mind. The savage needs but few symbols—the civilized many—the poet most of all.

The old idea was, however, that the poet must be a rhymer. Before printing was known, it was said: the rhyme assists the memory. That excuse no longer exists.

Is rhyme a necessary part of poetry? In my judgment, rhyme is a hindrance to expression. The rhymer is compelled to wander from his subject—to say more or less than he means—to introduce irrelevant matter that interferes continually with the dramatic action and is a perpetual obstruction to sincere utterance.

All poems, of necessity, must be short. The highly and purely poetic is the sudden bursting into blossom of a great and tender thought. The planting of the seed, the growth, the bud and flower must be rapid. The spring must be quick and warm—the soil perfect, the sunshine and rain enough—everything should tend to hasten, nothing to delay. In poetry, as in wit, the crystallization must be sudden.

The greatest poems are rhythmical. While rhyme is a hindrance, rhythm seems to be the comrade of the poetic. Rhythm has a natural foundation. Under emotion, the blood rises and falls, the muscles contract and relax, and this action of the blood is as rhythmical as the rise and fall of the sea. In the highest form of expression, the thought should be in harmony with this natural ebb and flow.

The highest poetic truth is expressed in rhythmical form. I have sometimes thought that an idea selects its own words, chooses its own garments, and that when the thought has possession, absolutely, of the speaker or writer, he unconsciously allows the thought to clothe itself.

The great poetry of the world keeps time with the winds and the waves.

I do not mean by rhythm a recurring accent at accurately measured intervals. Perfect time is the death of music. There should always be room for eager haste and delicious delay, and whatever change there may be in the rhythm or time, the action itself should suggest perfect freedom.

A word more about rhythm. I believe that certain feelings and passions—joy, grief, emulation, revenge, produce certain molecular movements in the brain—that every thought is accompanied by certain physical phenomena. Now it may be that certain sounds, colors, and forms produce the same molecular action in the brain that accompanies certain feelings, and that these sounds, colors, and forms produce first, the molecular movements and these in their turn reproduce the feelings, emotions, and states of mind capable of producing the same or like molecular movements. So that what we call heroic music, produces the same molecular action in the brain—the same physical changes—that are produced by the real feeling of heroism; that the sounds we call plaintive produce the same molecular movement in the brain that grief, or the twilight of grief, actually produces. There may be a rhythmical molecular movement belonging to each state of mind, that accompanies each thought or passion, and it may be that music, or painting, or sculpture, produces the same state of mind or feeling that produces the music or painting or sculpture, by producing the same molecular movements.

All arts are born of the same spirit, and express like thoughts in different ways—that is to say, they produce like states of mind and feeling. The sculptor, the painter, the composer, the poet, the orator, work to the same end, with different materials. The painter expresses through form and color and relation; the sculptor through form and relation. The poet also paints and chisels—his words give form, relation, and color. His statues and his paintings do not crumble, neither do they fade, nor will they as long as language endures. The composer touches the passions, produces the very states of feeling produced by the painter and sculptor, the poet and orator. In all these there must be rhythm—that is to say, proportion—that is to say, harmony, melody.

So that the greatest poet is the one who idealizes the common, who gives new meanings to old symbols, who transfigures the ordinary things of life. He must deal with the hopes and fears, and with the experiences of the people.

The poetic is not the exceptional. A perfect poem is like a perfect day. It has the undefinable charm of naturalness and ease. It must not appear to be the result of great labor. We feel, in spite of ourselves, that man does best that which he does easiest.

The great poet is the instrumentality, not always of his time, but of the best of his time, and he must be in unison and accord with the ideals of his race. The sublimer he is, the simpler he is. The thoughts of the people must be clad in the garments of feeling—the words must be known, apt, familiar. The hight must be in the thought, in the sympathy.

In the olden time they used to have May day parties, and the prettiest child was crowned Queen of May. Imagine an old blacksmith and his wife looking at their little daughter clad in white and crowned with roses. They would wonder while they looked at her, how they ever came to have so beautiful a child. It is thus that the poet clothes the intellectual children or ideals of the people. They must not be gemmed and garlanded beyond the recognition of their parents. Out from all the flowers and beauty must look the eyes of the child they know.

We have grown tired of gods and goddesses in art. Milton's heavenly militia excites our laughter. Lighthouses have driven sirens from the dangerous coasts. We have found that we do not depend on the imagination for wonders—there are millions of miracles under our feet.

Nothing can be more marvelous than the common and everyday facts of life. The phantoms have been cast aside. Men and women are enough for men and women. In their lives is all the tragedy and all the comedy that they can comprehend.

The painter no longer crowds his canvas with the winged and impossible—he paints life as he sees it, people as he knows them, and in whom he is interested. "The Angelus," the perfection of pathos, is nothing but two peasants bending their heads in thankfulness as they hear the solemn sound of the distant bell—two peasants, who have nothing to be thankful for—nothing but weariness and want, nothing but the crusts that they soften with their tears—nothing. And yet as you look at that picture you feel that they have something besides to be thankful for—that they have life, love, and hope—and so the distant bell makes music in their simple hearts.

IX.

The attitude of Whitman toward religion has not been understood. Towards all forms of worship, towards all creeds, he has maintained the attitude of absolute fairness. He does not believe that Nature has given her last message to man. He does not believe that all has been ascertained. He denies that any sect has written down the entire truth. He believes in progress, and, so believing, he says:

We can consider bibles and religions divine. I do not say they are not divine. I say they have all grown out of us and may grow out of us still. It is not they who give the life. It is you who give the life.

My thoughts are hymns of the praise of things;
In the dispute on God and eternity I am silent.

Have you thought there could be but a single Supreme? There can be any number of Supremes. One does not countervail another any more than one eyesight countervails another.

Upon the great questions, as to the great problems, he feels only the serenity of a great and well-poised soul.

No array of terms can say how much I am at peace about God and about death.
I hear and behold God in every object, not understanding God, not in the least.
Nor do I understand who there can be more wonderful than myself.
In the faces of men and women I see God, and in my face in the glass.
I find letters from God dropped in the street and every one is signed by God's name.

The whole visible world is regarded by him as a revelation, and so is the invisible world, and with this feeling he writes:

Not objecting to special revelations—considering a curl of smoke or a hair on the back of my hand just as curious as any revelation.

The creeds do not satisfy, the old mythologies are not enough; they are too narrow at best, giving only hints and suggestions; and feeling this lack in that which has been written and preached, Whitman says:

Magnifying and applying come I;
Outbidding at the start the old cautious hucksters;
Taking myself the exact dimensions of Jehovah;
Lithographing Kronos, Zeus his son and Herkules his grandson;
Buying drafts of Osiris, Isis, Belus, Brahm, and Buddha;
In my portfolio placing Manito alone—Alah on a leaf—the crucifix engraved
With Odin and the hideous face of Mexitli and every idol and image—
Taking them all for what they are worth, and not a cent more.

Whitman keeps open house. He is intellectually hospitable. He extends his hand to a new idea. He does not accept a creed because it is wrinkled and old and has a long white beard. He knows that hypocrisy has a venerable look, and that it relies on looks nd masks—on stupidity—and fear. Neither does h reject or accept the new because it is new. He wants the truth, and so he welcomes all until he knows just who and what they are.

X.

PHILOSOPHY.

Walt Whitman is a philosopher.

The more a man has thought, the more he has studied, the more he has traveled intellectually, the less certain he is. Only the very ignorant are perfectly satisfied that they know. To the common man the great problems are easy. He has no trouble in accounting for the universe. He can tell you the origin and destiny of man and the why and the wherefore of things. As a rule, he is a believer in special providence, and is egoistic enough to suppose that everything that happens in the universe happens in reference to him.

A colony of red ants lived at the foot of the Alps. It happened one day, that an avalanche destroyed the hill; and one of the ants was heard to remark: "Who could have taken so much trouble to destroy our home?"

Walt Whitman walked by the side of the sea "where the fierce old mother endlessly cries for her castaways," and endeavored to think out, to fathom the mystery of being; and he says:

I too, but signify, at the utmost, a little washed up drift,
A few sands and dead leaves gathered together—merging myself as part of the sands and drift.
Aware, now, that amid all the blab whose echoes recoil upon me, I have not once had the least idea of who or what I am.
But that for all my insolent poems, the real me still stands untouched, untold, altogether unreached,
Withdrawn afar, mocking me with mock congratulatory signs and voices,
With peals of distant ironical laughter at every word I have written or shall write,
Striking me with insults as I fall helpless on the sand.
I perceive I have not understood anything, not a single object; and that no man ever can.

There is in our language no profounder poem than the one entitled "Elemental Drifts."

The effort to find the origin of things has ever been, and will forever be, fruitless. Those who endeavor to find the secret of life resemble a man looking in the mirror, who thinks that if he only could be quick enough he could grasp the image that he sees behind the glass.

The latest word of this poet upon this subject is as follows:

"To me this life with all its realities and functions is finally a mystery, the real something yet to be evolved, and the stamp and shape and life here somehow given an important, perhaps the main, outline to something further. Somehow this hangs over everything else, and stands behind it, is inside of all facts, and the concrete and material and the worldly affairs of life and sense. That is the purport and meaning behind all the other meanings, of LEAVES OF GRASS."

As a matter of fact the questions of origin and destiny are beyond the grasp of the human mind. We can see a certain distance; beyond that everything is only indistinct; and beyond the indistinct is the unseen. In the presence of these mysteries—and everything is a mystery so far as origin, destiny, and nature are concerned—the intelligent, honest man is compelled to say, "I do not know."

In the great midnight a few truths like stars shine on forever—and from the brain of man come a few struggling gleams of light—a few momentary sparks.

Some have contended that everything is spirit; others that everything is matter; and again, others who maintained that a part is matter and a part is spirit; some that spirit was first and matter after; others that matter was first and spirit after; and others that matter and spirit have existed together.

But none of these people can by any possibility tell what matter is, or what spirit is, or what the difference is between spirit and matter.

The materialists look upon the spiritualists as substantially crazy; and the spiritualists regard the materialists as low and groveling. These spiritualistic people hold matter in contempt; but, after all, matter is quite a mystery. You take in your hand a little earth—a little dust. Do you know what it is? In this dust you put a seed; the rain falls upon it; the light strikes it; the seed grows; it bursts into blossom; it produces fruit.

What is this dust—this womb? Do you understand it? Is there anything in the wide universe more wonderful than this?

Take a grain of sand, reduce it to powder, take the smallest possible particle, look at it with a microscope, contemplate its every part for days, and it remains the citadel of a secret—an impregnable fortress. Bring all the theologians, philosophers, and scientists in serried ranks against it; let them attack on every side with all the arts and arms of thought and force. The citadel does not fall. Over the battlements floats the flag and the victorious secret smiles at the baffled hosts.

Walt Whitman did not and does not imagine that he has reached the limit—the end of the road

The Spiritualist's Idea of Man.

In THE TRUTH SEEKER of October 18th I find a somewhat lengthy dissertation by Julian Marcellas on the "Idealist's Idea of Man," followed up by our friend Otto Wettstein with the "Materialist's Idea of Man." And I think that a fitting topic to follow should be the "Spiritualist's Idea of Man."

The idealist argues his hope of immortality based on the difference of inorganic and organic matter; the inorganic being under control of and subject to the chemical laws of nature, while organized life is to a great extent under the control of a force or entity—an intelligent force we may say—which resides within its confines, and controls its movements, etc. Matter as such is inert; not that the particles of a mass of matter are dead, as Otto pleases to state we infer, but no mass of inorganic matter has any power to move its bulk from place to place. The motions of any mass of inorganic matter are purely chemical or molecular. There is no consciousness of the forces exerted upon it by the laws of chemistry. The mass does not know when it moves, but it simply obeys the laws of nature or the propelling force, hence is inert. So when put in motion the mass has no power or choice to stop, but would go on eternally if not met and overcome or its direction changed or stopped. Therefore when Otto declares that matter is not inert and argues against the law of inertia on the ground of molecular action, he simply shows that he misapprehends the subject under discussion. Now, on the contrary, when a mass of matter is moved about, as is shown by organized beings, it also shows that such mass contains a force, an intelligently acting power, which can move a mass of organized matter on a plane much higher than that of inorganic materials. Don't you see, Otto? The idealist is therefore right when he affirms that the matter so moving about and manifesting intelligence must contain something more than mere chemical or molecular life. And when friend Otto asserts that the idea of inertia as applied to matter is becoming exploded, he greatly errs. No scientist will so affirm. Can he point me out the man who from a scientific standpoint does so affirm? No, sir. The law of inertia is as firm and true as nature itself, and those who say differently do not hav any grounds upon which to make such statement. The man who does not comprehend the difference between a man who moves and a cart wheel which rolls is a poor materialistic philosopher.

The same laws which pertain to matter—that is, chemical force—act both on or in organic and inorganic matter, and from the peculiar combination of organic matter they act with even greater force and action than on the mass of inorganic matter. And yet above all this there is an intelligent, ennobling force, which has hopes, fears, desires, and impulses, grand beyond description. The Materialist, bent on pulling this grand idea down, and holding man's aspirations down in the bog and mud, will not allow him to soar upward, and at last tear himself away from gross materiality, but when he does so escape declares him dead.

My friend Otto, you can depend on this, matter unorganized has no power to move itself, nor any power to stop itself. If you do not wind one of your watches it will run down, and has no power to wind itself into motion, though in time the chemical effects of oxygen and hydrogen will eat it up and make its particles fine enough to be cast about by the air. Not so with a man; he knows how to wind himself up, how to supply his wants and maintain his physical and mental well-being.

The Materialist insists that all this life, intelligence, and motion is the result of the secret chemical forces resident in matter. That is, he attributes the properties of intelligence to inorganic matter. Inorganic matter he thinks can organize itself into an intelligent organic being. He admits that matter per se is not intelligent, no single atom can change itself into anything else. An atom of gold can never become an atom of silver or of anything else, it must forever remain gold and nothing else; as an atom it has no intelligence. But, he argues, when it combines with millions of other atoms, equally unintelligent, they form an organized being manifesting intelligence. Now, this is the hight of absurdity! He tries to show by electricity, which is caused by friction, and is a form of heat, an effect analogous to mind. Why so? Electricity is simply heat evolved, which was contained in the matter from which it was taken. There is no more relation or similarity between electricity and mind than between mind and a piece of rock. He says, "Mind, consciousness, individuality, memory, etc., are purely the result of living, complex organic bodies which in their perfect living state generate these mental forces or processes, very much as a battery generates electricity."

Now please observe that electricity is analogous to latent heat, has simply been evolved, was beforehand contained in the battery; but mind, intelligence, love, wit or humor, desire, memory, etc.—was that contained in the meat, potatoes, and cabbage composing my dinner, or does it reside in any of the organs of my body?

Is it in the bones, tendons, muscles, or fibers, or even in the insensate brain? Do you not see that the consciousness is not one thing only, but a multiplicity of feelings and desires? In fact, the mind of man is almost limitless in its aspirations and emotions, and does not depend but little upon what we eat or drink, so that the health of the body is not impaired.

To say that mind is a result of matter, especially when we say that matter has no mind to start with, is an assumption, and is arguing that something is the direct result of nothing, or that mind, the most important thing of life, comes from nothing, or out of mindless matter. If we admit that mind is contained in matter, then there is no reason to argue against its immortality, for it would not follow because a portion of matter decays that the mind which had been generated from it would also cease to exist, for the matter which produces so fine an organization may hav produced a much finer body or spirit in which the mind could, under new conditions, continue to liv and manifest its acquired intelligence. To ergue that when the body dies the spirit must also die, would be equivalent to saying that when the mother dies the child must die also. We see, however, that the child is a distinct individuality produced by the mother, but being no longer dependent upon her body and mind for life, will continue to liv on when she dies.

The Materialist argues that as a spirit it must hav always lived, must hav always been an entity, or having had a beginning it must hav an end.

Why such an inference? The child did not liv before its mother. In truth and probability, the child inherited all its mind from its parents; it had no existence as a mind until the physical and mental forces of its parents were brought together, and yet when either or both of its progenitors died the child remained strong and healthy, because by the laws of being it had set up an independent existence and there was no necessity for its death because the parents died; so with the spirit of man, when it has attained to all the intelligence and life it can obtain from the organization of matter, it will hav developed from the finer elements of matter a spiritual body in which to liv on in a more purely mental sphere than this life is fitted for, and there is no more reason why it should not continue to liv than there is why it should hav lived before its mother. Such ideas are simply absurd.

To say that because a thing has a beginning it must of a necessity hav an end amounts to nothing when we consider the constant and everlasting change of matter and things. You might with the same propriety argue that a child could never grow into a man. As matter is eternal and indestructible, why may not mind be also?

It will be seen then, that for proofs of immortality we must seek in the realm of the spiritual forces, and by a careful observation of the phenomena of the later developments of Spiritualism can they be established, and in no other way. We may argue as we please, the idealist may idealize and the Materialist may materialize, so to speak, but the only way to settle the question is to observe the manifestations of intelligence given through independent slate-writing, rapping, table-tipping, and the movement of physical objects which appeal to the intelligence of the man and identify his spirit from knowledge which no one else could impart; and if the spirit can materialize, all the better. The fact that so many hav cheated and defrauded for the sake of getting a living out of that desire, is bad enough, and no wonder that so many hav become disgusted with the subject; but if anyone is really anxious to obtain some evidence of a future life, and will go alone, and sincerely desires a knowledge of the spirit world, there is no doubt in my mind he can be satisfied of the truth, but he or she will hav to test the subject by an unbiased and, as far as possible, an unprejudiced mind.

The spirits, who can read your minds, will permit no egotistic nonsense in the matter, and you will be most likely to draw to yourselvs just such a class of spirits as agree with your own feelings and desires.

Otto infers that because during the carboniferous ages no organic life (animals) could hav existed on this earth, therefore no spirits could hav existed. Why not? The atmosphere a thousand feet or so above the mountains may hav been alive with spiritual life. In fact, it has been thought that all organic beings, from the infusoria to man, originated in those localities, away from the earth in those higher regions which were first cooled off. In the upper air these sprites began to develop, and when the earth was cool enough, they began to descend and filled the lands and seas. The chalk beds of England, three thousand feet thick, are but the cast-off shells of these uncountable billions of organic beings, and they all came down from the upper air—first one kind, then another, and, finally, why may not all organic life hav descended in the same way, becoming more and more material until the present form of solidity corresponding to the state of the globe was brought about? Otto objects that force can be superior to matter. He insists that matter is the thing and force only an attribute. Now, for instance, the cart and the horse is a sample, the cart is everything and the horse which moves it only an attribute. Or a man and a rock; when the man takes a crowbar and moves the rock to some desirable place the force of the man was merely an attribute of the rock and the crowbar, the rock and the bar were the essential things, the force and the man, or his mind, mere attributes. This is the kind of sophistical reasoning of the Materialist. The mind is nothing, the material which it moves is everything. So the man who forces his body about manifesting life is a mere attribute of his own body. In fact, it is the body which is boss, and "kerflummuxes" his mind about as its chemical and molecular changes compel. He goes on to say, "There is no such thing as force and matter; matter is the only abstract existence, force its attribute. Matter divested of force, or force divested of matter, is impossible." Now, in my opinion this is just as absurd as the Christian Scientist's claim that nothing exists but mind. Otto asserts that nothing exists but matter. Such generalizations lead otherwise clear minds into the most irrational absurdities. To say that there is nothing in the world but mind and matter, and in the next breath say that all is matter, or mind, is equally nonsensical. To see a mass of matter being moved by some independent force or forces, and call it an attribute of the thing moved, is too absurd to contemplate, and no language or illustrations can be ridiculous enough to meet the assertion. To admit this philosophy for a moment, is to assert that the lowest form of inorganic matter, or that farthest removed from mind and force, is the most superior form of it. Now we hav always been led to believe that the highest forms of matter, and those nearest the properties of force and thought, were the more excellent, but it seems this is to be ignored and the undeveloped condition made the more important, or at least the equal of any. To look at all the vast productions of the intellect of man upon land and sea, to see his mechanical achievements, his mental qualifications, and his ability to move nations by the superior results of thought alone, and without the motion of a muscle, and then put him down as a mere automaton, is belittling humanity and degrading the most magnificent things to the level of a mud pile.

Oh, no! The world is progressing, mind is advancing, and the time is coming when the ability to govern and control matter will be enhanced a thousand fold over the present. Now we handle electricity and some of the higher forms of matter and force; then the present achievements will seem as but the alphabet of nature's vast volumes. This will happen when man will not be considered a mere automaton, but a mental and moral force.

Wilkes Barre, Pa. J. R. PERRY.

The Cause in Washington.

The present standing of work as to religious exercises in public schools is as follows: While a carefully prepared presentation of the law and facts, backed by arguments and appeals to one's sense of justice, hav resulted in the cessation of religious exercises in most of our public schools, yet there are a number of places in the state where the school boards are willful, stubborn, defiant, and in some districts the teachers hav resorted to every mean, petty persecution of the children of those parents who hav made protests against the injustice of forcing their children to daily repeat the Lord's prayer.

To end this throughout the state, a case must be decided of sufficient moment to be generally commented on by the press throughout the state. Failing in this, a test case before the courts is an absolute necessity.

The directors of the Washington Secular Union hav decided that an appeal shall be made to the school board of this city (Seattle), as we hav discovered that one of the teachers compels the children to recite the Lord's prayer in concert. We desire to resort to every laudable means to, if possible, avoid litigation. If this city school board refuse our request, then we hav no resource but the courts. But we are hopeful of their compliance with right, justice, and the law; and that the publicity we can giv their decision will induce all the law-defying school boards and teachers to reform.

Sunday law reform is progressing, but against opposition. Rev. Wilbur Crafts, the able, fanatical secretary of the National Sabbath Union (with abundance of funds, for the fanatics back up their opinions with their cash), has been in the state, making his headquarters in Tacoma. He is very subtle, and sends out instructions to his emissaries to all the cities of the state how to use underhand schemes to favor their designs. Realizing it is contrary alike to the letter and spirit of our constitution to make religious laws, they make catspaws of the barbers and store clerks. The cry is: Oh, dear, no; it is not a religious movement. Religion has nothing to do with it. It is merely to insure to the poor tired workers the needed rest on the Lord's day.

We are now in the midst of a big fight. The barbers, finding they could not obtain the passage of an ordinance by the city council to enforce Sunday closing, fell back, at dictation of Crafts emissaries, on an old territorial statute. They arrested three barbers for keeping open shop on Sunday. Two of them were scared into paying $25 and costs. Mr. Samuel Christopher, a Liberal and member of the Washington Secular Union, fought the issue, and as in duty bound the Union resolved to defend him in his constitutional rights. Our president and Mr. McDivitt appeared before Justice Miller, changed venue to Justice Rivers, and entered demurrer and motion to discharge the prisoner—first, because under the complaint he had not committed any offense against the law; second, that the statute under which the complaint was made was repealed by the adoption of the constitution, which guarantees "absolute freedom of religious sentiment, belief, and worship to every individual, and no one shall be disturbed in person or property on account of religion."

On Thursday the case was argued, Mr. Richard Winsor making a most able, eloquent, and convincing speech. On Monday Judge Rivers, who had reserved his decision, gave judgment in our favor and Mr. Christopher was discharged, it being decided that the wording of the statute did not apply to a person following their trade, craft, or avocation, but only to opening places of business for trade—that is, sale or barter. Rage filled the hearts of the goody-goody, pious bigots. On Monday the members of three leading clothing firms were arrested. One of them, H. Hershberg, is a member of our Union. All declare intention to fight the case. We hav the three most able and eloquent lawyers of the city retained for the defense, Richard Winsor, James H. Lewis, and Gen. J. B. Metcalf. They moved to dismiss the complaint on three grounds—first, because the Sunday-closing law is contrary to the spirit of the constitution; second, because it is contrary to a clause of the constitution which expressly excepts this law from being in force; third, because cases of this kind must be founded on an information filed by the prosecuting attorney, the same as if they were before a grand jury. Judge Miller set the hearing of the case for Friday at 3 P.M. There is a very great interest manifested in the case. We hav law, reason, right, common sense, and justice all on our side, but we hav the bitter prejudice and fanatical zeal of Sunday devotees in opposition. They are united, well organized, and hav pledged ample means and generous support to the district attorney in conducting the prosecution (persecution), and hav provided, at their own cost, able associate counsel to assist him.

We are repelling the malignant onslaughts of the enemy, not in behalf of individuals only, but principles; not alone to secure free exercise of our constitutional rights in this city, but of all the people throughout the state.

Never was the necessity of earnest coöperation and efficient organization of Liberals made more apparent. What are you going to do about it?

Sunday Reflections.

Nature's mighty miracle is still over and around us; and hence our wonder and reverence remain to be the inheritance of humanity.—John G. Whittier.

After reading Mr. Longshore's essay on immortality in THE TRUTH SEEKER of July 19th, which in its range was too far-reaching or vague for my full comprehension, I took an hour's walk, during which some questions presented themselvs which I found not easy to answer. Within an easy hour's ride, and only a few miles from the greatest summer resort in the United States, Saratoga, during certain hours on the main road out may be seen hundreds of equipages, and thousands of gaily dressed ladies and gentlemen, attended by coachmen and servants in livery. And in sight of that thoroughfare which so many pass and repass, is a deserted burial-place, on a barren sand knoll covered with stunted pines and other trees, some of them of twenty years' growth, some standing on the graves and others fallen. The standing monuments designate about a dozen buried, the last date some forty years ago. I asked myself, when another forty years is past how many of those daily rolling by seeking pleasure, enjoying life, killing time, etc., will remain? And will any traces of this barren and deserted sand knoll be visible? Will the stunted shrubbery, the moss-adorned monuments, remain to mark the site of the bones moldering beneath? It is only a question of time when the places that know them now will know them no more forever.

On my return I heard a surpliced doctor of divinity read from a book he called the only infallible guide: "I believe in the resurrection of the body, and the life immortal." That is, the life immortal of that resurrected body. My thoughts went back to the neglected sand knoll and the forgotten bones Where would they go? What will they do? Speculation is needless, because it is a palpable impossibility.

I read from their so-called inspired book of Psalms, viii, 4: "What is man that thou art mindful of him?" Again, from Job viii, 17: "What is man that thou shouldest magnify him; and that thou shouldest set thy heart upon him?" Which he answers in this emphatic way: "For there is hope of a tree, if it be cut down, that it will sprout again. Though the root thereof wax old in the earth, and the stock thereof die in the ground, yet through the scent of water it will bud and bring boughs like a plant. But man dieth and wasteth away. So man lieth down, and riseth not; till the heavens be no more, they shall not awake, nor be raised out of their sleep."

Again I return to the moldering dead, and try to make a comparison between the doctor's reading and the logic of Job. There is none. The one is a demonstration, logically proved. The other an assumption without proof. Not that alone, but common observation and nature's laws prove it an impossibility.

Again, is there anything, any substance or matter, having form or outline, endowed with life, that can be when dead resurrected? Or can it be proved that life can exist independent of matter?

Among the most profound of mysteries, is that of life and death. I use the word life, while at the same time I do not know what life is. I do not know that anyone does.

And can thought exist independent of matter? I believe it will be in a general way admitted that animal structure would be inert, incapable of action or force, but for that invisible propelling power called mind. The mind directs the hand holding the pen to write out the thought. Would the limbs move, or the body be carried along, if the mind did not say so?

I can hardly think this will be disputed.

Then what do we know of mind? Only that it is an invisible force that acts under conditions. And does it continue on in an endless round of progression? Is it something or nothing? If something, it is immortal, like all existing things, and cannot be annihilated. Does anyone know? We hav the statements of some of the ablest men and women that they do know. How? By experimental test and observation. These men and women hav been in their investigations severe, clear in their perceptions, and logical in their conclusions. Many names might be called; I will only name three—Juliet H. Severance, M.D., Chas. McArthur, and W. H. Burr. Shall we accept their testimony as conclusiv? I think we are bound to do so by all the rules that govern testimony in law. All accept many things as truth that hav not come within the range of our observation. How then can we do otherwise than believe that they do know, until we find one competent to prove that they do not? It needs more than a simple denial, or personal invectiv, which no gentleman will resort to in debate.

Would a Writ of Error Release Mr. Heywood?

John Orvis in Dr. Foote's Health Monthly.

I wish to report to you, as the secretary of the National Defense Association, that in company with another gentleman, by invitation of Flora and Josephine Tilton, I accompanied them on a visit to Ezra H. Heywood.

I was surprised to find how splendidly Mr. Heywood looks, and how nobly he bears himself under his duress. His health has actually improved during his confinement. I was struck with the simplicity and sweetness of his whole bearing. No railing, no fault-finding, no crimination escaped his lips; but while speaking with the deepest earnestness of the absolute necessity of standing for the liberty of speech, writing, and printing as the very palladium of public safety, though his eye softened with emotion, his bearing was that of a teacher of conquering hosts. Mr. Heywood spoke most feelingly of the absolute necessity that the people should be roused to secure the recognition of the great rights for which he contends and suffers. What hope is there, he asked, for labor on the advance of social reform if anybody, or any power under heaven, may interfere with these fundamental rights of citizenship?

It is believed, not without good grounds for it, that Mr. Heywood might, with comparativly little effort, be released on a writ of error. In such an effort it is of the first importance to secure good legal talent and experience. What can the National Defense Association do about it? I am myself too invalided to do more than put in a "lick" here and there, as in writing this report of my visit. Mr. Heywood will outliv his enemies and persecutors.

When the Shoe Pinches Them They Cry Out.

From the Weekly Constitution, Atlanta, Ga.

The freedom of American institutions, the liberty of the press, are great and glorious things. We are supposed to enjoy them at home and to boast of them abroad. But in spite of this, there are tendencies in our government that giv grave cause for alarm—tendencies that threaten to usurp the rights of the citizen and to undermine our free institutions, among the greatest of which is the liberty of the press.

The political party now in power is occupying advanced ground on this line and in many respects is establishing dangerous precedents. With the high government officials, every man appears to be a law unto himself; in other words, he interprets the law to suit his prejudices, places his own construction upon it, and issues his edicts as though he were the head and fountain of all law, the judge and censor of all people.

Here, for instance, is a postmaster-general who occupies this advanced and unheard-of position; who constitutes himself the censor of the press, and issues his orders to a host of underlings, to be executed at their discretion—according to whatever construction they may place upon them. We see him issuing these arbitrary decrees and exceeding the authority vested in him; his prejudices are great; his judgment weak. An author writes a book; the postmaster-general is a book agent; he wants to sell the book; he writes the author to that effect. For some reason—this is the case of the "Kreutzer Sonata"—the books are not forwarded. Then the postmaster-general declares that the book is obscene and issues his decree: It shall not pass through the mails!

We are not taking the part of this particular author and his book; it is the principle of the thing that we are after, it is the dangerous precedent thus established. According to the postmaster-general's strict rules of official propriety, this prohibition must be wholesale; it must reach a million books which are now being issued in this country, and which, to him, may come under this head of "obscene;" it is an attack upon Shakspere and other standard works; it is an attack upon the liberty of the press of the United States, for scarcely a newspaper is published which does not contain one or more columns that may offend the acute moral sensibilities of the postmaster-general and move him to exercise this tyrannical prohibition.

He is carrying the thing too far. To bring it nearer home, there are one hundred and seventeen post-offices in Georgia. Under the precedent established by Mr. Wanamaker each postmaster is a judge of what is mailable and unmailable matter. This would be right to a certain extent; but are they not likely, also, to exceed their authority, place their own construction on the law, and carry matters too far? Assuredly. An editor may print some article in his paper which would render the whole edition liable to seizure, and the business of the paper and its patrons might be seriously affected in consequence. The postmaster and his clerks, placing their own construction on such an article, could muzzle the press and hav the man at their mercy.

When the lottery law went into effect the Constitution struck all lottery advertisments from its columns, both from its city and mail editions. It has been the custom of the weekly Constitution, in return for services rendered, to distribute gifts among its subscribers. It was not thought that the lottery law would be as far-reaching as this, and so it continued to offer inducements to subscribers as of old. After the law went into effect two editions of the paper were mailed and went safely to their destination. The post-office authorities must hav known that these editions contained the usual inducements to subscribers, but no complaint was made. It was not until the third edition, in the third week after the passage of the lottery law, reached the post-office, that anything was said. Then, after the edition had been prepared for mailing, the Constitution was tardily notified that it could not pass through the mails—at what loss to the paper and its subscribers may be readily imagined.

We submit that this was wrong, and that the law which makes it possible is wrong. Every newspaper in the country will be affected by it; the business of each will be crippled and the liberty of the press restricted. We do not believe that it is the true spirit of the law, or that the law was intended to cover the legitimate business of newspapers. Encouraged and sustained, there is no telling to what lengths it may lead. Under its working we can no longer boast of the liberty of the press, for the press will hav no liberty; it will find a censor in every postmaster and government detectiv, and, in many instances, ignorant and prejudiced men will hav it in their power to suppress the free speech and actions of its shackled editors.

In this connection, it is not going too far to say that the freedom, not of the press, but of the people of the whole country, is in danger. When the greatest engin of civilization can be stopped at will, its actions censured and its products seized, it is time to call a halt. With the power thus acquired there is no knowing to what it may lead. Great consequences may follow and exercise a fatal influence upon our free institutions.

What They Say About the Picture Book.

From the Boston Investigator.

This book contains over three hundred and sixty pages of pictorial and literary arguments against the absurd claims and doctrins of Christianity. The pictures, of which there are nearly two hundred, were designed by Watson Heston, and were published in THE TRUTH SEEKER, during the years 1886-1889, and are in themselvs powerful aids in showing up the foolish pretensions of religion and in exposing the designs of priestcraft. Mr. Heston deserves to be called the artist-hero of Liberalism. He has dedicated his genius to Freethought, and has done faithful and noble work for the cause of right and truth. But the pictures do not make up the whole of this volume. There are nearly two hundred pages of reading matter that serve first as explanations of the illustrations, and secondly as texts to prove the utter falsity of the church's professions and the hypocrisy of those who uphold them. Altogether the book is one of the best weapons against Christianity and the church that has ever been put in the hands of Freethinkers.

The Testimonial to Walt Whitman.

By the kindness of Colonel Ingersoll we are enabled to furnish the readers of THE TRUTH SEEKER with a complete report of his address at the Testimonial to Walt Whitman. No other paper contains it, up to date, and those who read it here can consider themselvs favored mortals.

The beauty and truth of the address are no less great than the generosity which prompted the testimonial. By it Colonel Ingersoll has laid at the feet of the aged poet wealth sufficient to make a great many of his last days more cheerful, and at the same time he has again made the world his debtor for clothing the noblest ideas in garb so brilliant that even the thoughtless will remember them. Poetry as well as the poet has been enriched.

After reading this address, think of the value of a religion which caused the managers of a public hall in Philadelphia to refuse it utterance within the walls they own!

"Practical Bible Christianity."

The editor of a religious journal says that we "should read the twelfth chapter of Paul's epistle to the Romans, and learn what practical Bible Christianity is."

The chapter is as follows:

"I beseech you, therefore, brethren, by the mercies of God, that ye present your bodies a living sacrifice, holy, acceptable, unto God, which is your reasonable service. And be not conformed to this world: but be ye transformed by the renewing of your mind, that ye may prove what is that good, and acceptable, and perfect will of God. For I say, through the grace given unto me, to every man that is among you, not to think of himself more highly than he ought to think; but to think soberly, according as God hath dealt to every man the measure of faith. For as we hav many members in one body, and all members hav not the same office; so we, being many, are one body in Christ, and every one members one of another. Having then gifts differing according to the grace that is given to us, whether prophecy, let us prophesy according to the proportion of faith; or ministry, let us wait on our ministering; or he that teacheth, on teaching; or he that exhorteth, on exhortation: he that giveth, let him do it with simplicity; he that ruleth, with diligence; he that showeth mercy, with cheerfulness. Let love be without dissimulation. Abhor that which is evil; cleave to that wh.ch good. Be kindly affectioned one to another with brotherly love; in honor preferring one another; not slothful in business; fervent in spirit; serving the Lord; rejoicing in hope; patient in tribulation; continuing instant in prayer; distributing to the necessity of saints: given to hospitality. Bless them which persecute you: bless, and curse not. Rejoice with them that do rejoice, and weep with them that weep. Be of the same mind one toward another. Mind not high things, but condescend to men of low estate. Be not wise in your own conceits. Recompense to no man evil for evil. Provide things honest in the sight of all men. If it be possible, as much as lieth in you, liv peaceably with all men. Dearly beloved, avenge not yourselvs; but rather giv place unto wrath; for it is written, Vengeance is mine; I will repay, saith the Lord. Therefore if thine enemy hunger, feed him; if he thirst, giv him drink; for in so doing thou shalt heap coals of fire on his head. Be not overcome of evil, but overcome evil with good."

By the terms of the assertion we are debarred from going outside of the Bible to show whether or not this is real Christianity, and of course no Christianity can be found in the Old Testament. But if because this chapter is in the Bible it is Christian teaching, so must the doctrins taught in the following passages, which are also from the Bible and therefore as really "practical Bible Christianity" as is Paul's good-natured homily.

We are told (2 Thess. ii, 11) that

"God shall send them strong delusion, that they should believe a lie."

We do not assert that this refers to the chapter above cited, but when we compare the teaching of that chapter with the acts of Christians—their deceptions, their thefts and robberies, their cruelties, their ostentatious professions, their wars, their unmerciful conduct toward opponents, their persecutions, their hatreds of each other, their coldness to strangers in their churches, their revengeful spirit, their rancorous differences of opinion, their contempt for men of low estate and esteem for "high things," their arrogance, their dishonesty—it certainly appears plausible that anyone who thinks that the chapter is an epitome of Christian doctrin is one to whom God has sent strong delusion, that he should believe a lie. For if that chapter be Christianity, where shall we look for, and whenever should we hav found, any Christians?

In chapter twelve of the epistle to the Romans Paul recommends honesty (v. 17); but in the third chapter he says:

"For if the truth of God hath more abounded through my lie unto his glory, why yet am I also judged as a sinner?"

Perhaps Paul was trying to make the truth of God abound when he recommended the providing of honest things, for he admits to the Corinthians that he caught them with guile (2 Cor. xii, 16). That, we suppose, is "practical Bible Christianity," as the vote buying, slandering of opponents, and deception of the people nowadays by Christian statesmen is "practical politics."

Here is another Christian doctrin given by Christ himself, and we earnestly desire to know whether it is practiced by Christians. Jesus said:

"Of him that taketh away thy goods ask them not again."

When Jesus said that did he mean, ask a policeman to recover the goods, or, let the thief hav them? Again:

"Submit yourselvs to every ordinance of man, . . . whether it be to kings as supreme; or unto governors" (1 Peter ii, 13). "Let every soul be subject unto higher powers. For there is no power but of God. Whosoever therefore resisteth the power, resisteth the ordinance of God; and they that resist shall receive to themselvs damnation" (Rom. xiii, 1, 2).

"And these sentiments were uttered when a Nero sat upon the throne—when Palestine was being crushed beneath the iron heel of despotism—when brave and patriotic men were struggling for freedom. The Bible has ever been the bulwark of tyranny. When the oppressed millions of France were endeavoring to throw off their yoke—when the Washingtons, the Franklins, the Paines, and the Jeffersons were contending for American liberty—craven priests stood up in the pulpit, opened this book, and gravely read: 'The powers that be are ordained of God; they that resist shall receive to themselvs damnation.'" Is that practical Bible Christianity?

Then here is some more Bible Christianity, painfully practical:

"He that believeth and is baptized shall be saved; but he that believeth not shall be damned" (Mark xvi, 16).

"Depart from me, ye cursed, into everlasting fire" (Matt. xxv, 41).

"These shall go away into everlasting punishment" (Matt. xxv, 46).

"Cast into hell, into the fire that never shall be quenched" (Mark ix, 45).

"If there come any unto you, and bring not this doctrin, receive him not into your house" (2 John i, 10).

In this famous twelfth chapter Paul exhorts the brethren to be of the same mind. How he would accomplish this he tells in another epistle:

"If any man preach any other gospel unto you than that ye hav received, let him be accursed" (Gal. i, 9).

"I would they were even cut off which trouble you" (Gal. v, 12).

Paul had warrant for this practical teaching in the teaching of Jesus:

"But those mine enemies, which would not that I should reign over them, bring hither and slay them before me" (Luke xix, 27).

Jesus made his parables a medium through which to teach practical Bible Christianity; and we will do the Christians the justice to say that they hav followed the doctrin as faithfully as their opportunities allowed. "We see earth covered with the yellow bones of murdered heretics and scholars; we see the persecutions and butcheries of Constantine, of Theodosius, of Clovis, of Justinian, and of Charlemagne; we see the Crusades, in which nearly twenty millions perish; we see the followers of Godfrey in Jerusalem—see the indiscriminate massacre of men, women, and children—see the mosques piled seven deep with murdered Saracens—the Jews burnt in their synagogs; we see Cœur de Lion slaughter in cold blood thousands of captiv Infidels; we see the Franks in Constantinople, plundering, ravishing, murdering; we see the Moors expelled from Spain; we see the murder of the Huguenots and Waldenses—the slaughter of German peasants—the desolation of Ireland—Holland covered with blood; we witness Smithfield and Bartholomew; we see the Inquisition with its countless instruments of fiendish cruelty; we see the Auto-da-fé, where heretics clad in mockery are led to torture and to death; we see men stretched upon the rack, disjointed, and torn limb from limb; we see them flayed alive—their bleeding bodies seared with red-hot irons; we see them covered with pitch and oil and set on fire; we see them hurled headlong from towers to the stony street below; we see them buried alive; we see them hanged and quartered; we see their eyes bored out with heated augers—their tongues torn out—their bones broken with hammers—their bodies pierced with a thousand needles; we see aged women tied to the heels of fiery steeds—see their mangled and bleeding bodies dragged over the frozen earth; we see babes flung into the flames to perish with their mothers, or with their mother sewed in sacks and sunk in the sea; in short, on every hand, we see hate, torture, death!"

That was practical Bible Christianity!

A good Christian doctrin taught by John is this:

"Except ye eat the flesh of the son of man and drink his blood, ye hav no life in you" (John vi, 53).

The practical side of this teaching was a few years ago found to be illustrated in Russia. "We hear," said a writer in Harper's Weekly, "of horrid sects at present in Russia, practicing cannibal and human sacrifices with rites almost more devilish than any recorded in history. 'The communism of the flesh of the lamb,' and 'the communism of the blood of the lamb,' really seem to hav been invented by the lowest demons of the bottomless pit. The subject is too revolting to be pursued in detail; it is enough to say that an infant seven days old is bandaged over the eyes, stretched over a dish, and a silver spoon thrust into the side so as to pierce the heart! The elect suck the child's blood—that is 'the blood of the lamb!' The body is left to dry up in another dish full of sage, then crushed into powder and eaten—that is 'the flesh of the lamb!'"

Another bit of practical Bible Christianity is the New Testament utterances which particularly concern the ladies. We hav space to quote but a few:

"Thy desire shall be to thy husband, and he shall rule over thee" (Gen. iii, 16).

"Wives submit yourselvs to your own husbands" (Col. iii, 18).

"As the church is subject unto Christ, so let the wives be to their own husbands in everything" (Eph. v, 24).

"Let your women keep silence in the churches, for it is not permitted unto them to speak; but they are commanded to be under obedience, as also saith the law. And if they will learn anything, let them ask their husbands at home; for it is a shame for a woman to speak in the church" (1 Cor. xiv, 34, 35).

"Ye wives, be in subjection to your own husbands. . . . For after this manner in the old time the holy women also, who trusted in God, adorned themselvs, being in subjection to their own husbands; even as Sarah obeyed Abraham, calling him lord" (1 Peter iii, 1-6).

"Let woman learn in silence with all subjection. But I suffer not a woman to teach, nor to usurp authority over the man, but to be in silence. For Adam was first formed, then Eve. And Adam was not deceived, but the woman being deceived was in the transgression" (1 Tim. ii, 11-14).

Practical Bible Christianity, too, is well presented in these extracts from a writer called Matthew—although he didn't write it, and no one knows who did. They are rules for Christians to liv by, and are more authoritativ than the letters of Paul, for they were drawn up by Jesus Christ:

"Take no thought for your life, what ye shall eat, or what ye shall drink; nor yet for your body what ye shall put on. . . . Behold the fowls of the air: for they sow not, neither do they reap, nor gather into barns. . . . And why take ye thought for raiment? Consider the lilies of the field, how they grow; they toil not, neither do they spin. . . . Therefore take no thought, saying, What shall we eat? or, What shall we drink? or, Wherewithal shall we be clothed? . . . The morrow shall take thought for the things of itself. Sufficient unto the day is the evil thereof" (Matt. vi, 25-34).

We trust that our religious contemporary will be kind enough to say whether it approves of the practical Bible Christianity outlined in the passages we hav quoted; and if it does not to say why. They are just as authoritativ as any other passages, are as much a part of scripture, and if the church does not approve them we desire to know what the reason is—whether she has received a new revelation or whether fallible men set their reason and human feelings above the word of God?

At any rate millions of Christians follow the teachings inculcated in them where one obeys the comprehensible commands of the twelfth chapter of the epistle to the Romans.

"Sabbath Prosecutions in Washington."

The "Sabbath" fanatics of Seattle, Wash., having been thwarted by the Washington Secular Union in their attempt to hav enacted a municipal ordinance closing barber shops on Sundays, hav now fallen back upon the state Sunday law to gain their end. That statute is as follows:

"Section 2,067. It shall be unlawful for any person or persons of this territory, to open on Sunday for the purposes of trade, or sale of goods, wares and merchandise, any shop, store, or building, or place of business whatever: Provided, That this chapter shall apply to hotels only in so far as the sale of intoxicating liquors are concerned, and shall not apply to drug stores, livery stables, and undertakers.

"Sec. 2,068. Any person or persons violating the foregoing section shall be guilty of a misdemeanor, and on conviction thereof be fined in any sum not less than twenty-five nor more than one hundred dollars."

The "emissaries of the National Sabbath Union," as Mr. Reynolds designates them, propose however to make some exceptions in enforcing the law upon barbers. At one of their meetings, "after considerable discussion, it was decided not to interfere with the proprietors of barber shops who should keep their baths open on Sunday." That is to say, the clique of "Sabbath" fanatics propose to dictate to business men as to who shall and who shall not violate the Sunday laws. The possibilities of blackmail in such a scheme are large, and if they are allowed to carry out their program, their organization, or at least the executiv officers, will probably wax rich. The absurdity of the distinction is well depicted by the Seattle Morning Journal. "It seems," it says, "that the carefully balanced moralists who want to reform things in this neighborhood hav made a review of the barber-shop controversy, and they decree that it will not be wise to make war on such shops as hav a bath-room annex. These can open on Sunday with perfect propriety, because cleanliness is next to godliness, and it will never do to crush any agency that will put a man in a more moral frame of mind. To a personage up a tree, however, it looks as if this thing has reduced itself to a question of anatomy. If a man's piety is to be encouraged on Sunday by a bath—if he can take a dip without offending the religious sense of the community, he certainly should hav the right to clean his nails, cut his hair, and keep his chin in repair, for all these things contribute to good citizenship and prepare him for communion with his Christian brethren. The right to hav the stomach keyed up to concert pitch on Sunday keeps the restaurants sacred from the pious crusade of reformers, but this delicate distinction between the sinful qualities of a bath-tub and a razor is rather too rich for our Liberal blood." The Journal adds: "If this sort of cross-eyed reform is to be the watchword of the hour, the Journal desires to say that it would like to see the authority by which these hair-splitting distinctions are drawn. Who gave it? Where did it come from? Does the constitution of the state of Washington vest the power in any clique or faction to declare that a Sunday bath in a public house is a moral institution, while a Sunday shave in the same shop is an agency of the devil? Such ridiculous and arbitrary and fanatical decrees are as much out of place in Seattle to-day as a polar bear in the orange groves of Florida. We believe in law and order and a decent respect to the honest convictions of every class, but the disposition of some folks to recognize no class as honest and conscientious but themselvs is a species of slavery which no liberal citizen can indorse."

But the Washington Secular Union is still alive, and its secretary announces its determination to hav something to say about this blackmailer's style of enforcing laws. Two sections of the Sunday law read as follows:

"Sec. 2,069. And it shall be the duty of any and all public officers in this territory, knowing of any violation of this chapter, to make complaint under oath, to the nearest justice of peace from where the offense was committed.

"Sec. 2,070. Any public officer who shall refuse or willfully neglect to inform against and prosecute offenders against this chapter shall be deemed guilty of a misdemeanor and on conviction shall be punished by a fine of not less than $25 nor more than $100, and the court before which such officer shall be tried shall declare the office or appointment held by such officer vacant for the balance of his term."

After a test in the courts as to the constitutionality of the Sunday law, if the decision shall be adverse to the Secular Union's claim, the Union will see that the law is impartially enforced, with a view to its repeal. Mr. Reynolds declares: "Since the best way to insure the repeal of a bad law is to rigidly enforce it—let it be known there can be no more open stores, no more sales by the publishers of newspapers on Sunday, nor can the necessary work be done on Sunday to get out the Monday morning edition—no more business of any kind that comes within the scope of this law."

The statute (§2,070) provides a means of doing this, for any officer refusing to inform and prosecute is liable to fine and deposition from office, and the Washington Secular Union can put the machinery of law into motion. The statute was made for the use of the "Sabbath" fanatics, but it cuts both ways. Let everybody observe the law or none.

It is significant that the first man singled out by the "Sabbath" fanatics for prosecution is a member of the Secular Union. It is encouraging to add that the Union promptly retained counsel to defend him. The fight is on; let it proceed!

Morality and Religion.

The American Sentinel quotes this from THE TRUTH SEEKER:

"It seems to be necessary to continually remind the priests that morality has nothing to do with religion. Morality appeals to the experience of mankind. It cares nothing about faith, nothing about sacred books. Morality depends upon facts, something that can be seen, something known, the product of which can be estimated."

And thus comments upon it:

"But morality has much to do with religion, and we doubt not that even THE TRUTH SEEKER admits it practically, even if it does not as a theory. We hav known THE TRUTH SEEKER to remark upon the immorality of professed Christians as something not in accordance with their profession. Why, if morality has nothing to do with religion? THE TRUTH SEEKER certainly knows better."

Still we are not convinced that we were wrong, and do not practically admit what we deny in theory. The reason that we sometimes refer to the moral delinquencies of the preachers is because the Christians claim that their religion makes people more moral. If this be so, then the teachers of that religion ought certainly to be moral. We find, however, as a matter of fact, that they are not so; indeed, it is the reverse, for what class of professional men are so often detected in immorality as the ministers? This fact disposes practically of the claim that Christianity of itself—the possession of religion, a "new birth," a "change of heart"—makes men better. And that is the answer to the Sentinel's question why we refer to these things if we do not think that morality has anything to do with religion.

Morality is an elastic thing, and, like blasphemy, changes with the country one is in. Immemorial custom, Thoreau calls it, with good reason. American morality on marriage customs, for instance, is not he same as the Turkish, though the practice is very similar. Yet the Turks are fully as religious as the Americans. There are dozens of acts called immoral by one people which are not at all immoral to other nations. Drinking wine is called very immoral by the Mohammedans; but it is not so regarded by Christians.

"The pope he is a happy man,
His palace is the Vatican.
And there he sits and drains his can;
The pope he is a happy man.
I often say when I'm at home
I'd like to be the pope of Rome.

"And then there's Sultan Saladin,
That Turkish soldan full of sin;
He has a hundred wives at least,
By which his pleasure is increased.
I've often wished, I hope no sin,
That I were Sultan Saladin.

"But no, the pope no wife may choose,
And so I would not wear his shoes.
No wine may drink the proud paynim,
And so I'd rather not be him.
My wife, my wine, I love, I hope,
And would be neither Turk nor pope."

The commandments of Buddha, as transcribed by the writers of the Old Testament, are supposed to be an epitome of religious morality, but they are not all such by any means; they are simply a few rules found by the race to conduce to human happiness. The religious part of them is not morality at all. "Religious morality" is what one must observe for the welfare of religion—like, "Believe or be damned." That is a religious "moral" commandment. The first commandment is, "Thou shalt hav no other gods before me." That certainly has nothing to do with morality. It is perfectly moral to worship any God one chooses to. The second, against idolatry, also is not a moral but a religious commandment. So is the third, against what is called profanity, or blasphemy. The fourth, against Sabbath-breaking, the Adventists themselvs deny with all the strength they possess. The fifth, against irreverence toward parents, is the first moral commandment, and proceeds from no religion, but purely from human love. The sixth, against murder, needs no religion to make it moral; it is the result of a human desire to liv. The seventh, against adultery, is also a human rule, springing from human love of wife and husband. The eighth, against stealing, was probably made by the first man who succeeded in getting one meal ahead of his hunger. So with the ninth, against false witness; any man who hates to be lied about would say that. The tenth, against covetousness, is a human rule made by the rich for the exclusiv benefit of the poor.

Thus we see in these commandments that whatever is "moral" is that which conduces to human earthly welfare. The rest are religious commandments, which it is not practically immoral to break, because no one is injured thereby. Any act is moral which injures no one, but conduces to happiness. Four of these commandments are religious, and were evidently made by the priests of early times for their own benefit. The others are the sum of human experience as to what benefits the people. They are moral, not religious, and need no religion to sustain them. They depend for their authority "upon facts, something that can be seen, something known, the product of which can be estimated."

The Christians hav been taught by their priests that their religion is the foundation of everything good, and they do not take the trouble to go to the root of these questions and find out the truth. Anyone who accepts the Bible as infallible, or as an authority in morals—or anything else—will be found sadly lacking in true knowledge.

OWING to pressure of work consequent on the forthcoming Congress at Portsmouth, the corresponding secretary, Ida C. Craddock, finds it impossible to answer many quite important letters until after her return from the Congress. She hopes that those who are wondering why they hav received no answer to their letters for the past week or two will make allowances for her unavoidable delay in replying.

THE Portsmouth, O., Blade thus welcomes the heretics to that city: "The Secular Unionists meet here next week. Noted men and women of letters belong to it. We may not see as they see, we may not be in accord with their views, but we can show them what hospitality is. That belongs to humanity. It is not bounded by beliefs. It is as broad and as endless as space. It is the noblest attribute of the human heart. Where it is not there is no Christianity. Where it is not there is no love. Where it is not there is no soul. Let us make it pleasant for these strangers. If they preach strange gods, go into the temple as did Paul and dispute with them. If they desire to giv reason for the faith that is in them, giv them respectful audience—hear them for their cause. No faith as we see it is worth the having whose bulwarks cannot withstand the most searching scrutiny. To run away from, to ignore argument from whatever source or in whatever disguise the alleged devil may come, is a confession of weakness not creditable to the faithful."

Letters from Friends.

SIOUX FALLS, S. D., Oct. 6, 1890.

MR. EDITOR: The "Pictorial Text-Book" at last came to hand. I hav waited long for it, and it is a jewel, worth waiting for. It is worth its price multiplied by ten. It is a remarkably good Sunday-school text-book, and I shall use it as such in my family. N. S. JOHNSON.

ROSLYN, WASH., Oct. 7, 1890.

MR. EDITOR: Inclosed find $6, for which send me three more copies of the "Frecthinker's Text-Book." This makes twelve copies that I hav ordered. I wish to show Mr. Heston my appreciation of his work, and make converts for Liberalism and bones of the holy groans.

Very truly yours, HENRY BEIGHLING.

WEST UNION, IA., Oct. 9, 1890.

MR. EDITOR: I am anxious to get the book that one can read as fast as one can turn the leaves. I hope that Heston may liv forever—which means fifty years or more. To pray is heathenish and to giv thanks is a mockery. The $2 inclosed is for our picture book, and I hope that I may be able to sell a few this winter. J. F. S.

OAKWOOD, S. D., Sept. 27, 1890.

MR. EDITOR: My brother takes your valuable paper, and we are very anxious to hav Mr. Heston return, for we miss the cartoons so. We went to hear one of Mr. Remsburg's lectures, and thought it just grand. It was "The Sunday Question." Elder R —— was there, and he thinks Mr. Remsburg a gentleman in every respect. BELLE CROSBY.

BOZEMAN, MONT., Oct. 1, 1890.

MR. EDITOR: I should like to inquire through your paper if any of its readers know H. L. Burk. My brother, Henley Lybrook Burk, left his home in the state of Michigan many years ago, since which time not a word has been heard from him. We conjecture that he is somewhere in the West. Any information as to where he may be would be most thankfully received. THOS. BURK.

AUSTIN, ILL., Oct. 8, 1890.

MR. EDITOR: Please find inclosed $6, for which mail three "Pictorial Text-Books." Do not abandon the illustrations. We like the paper better with them. I cannot understand why people do not find them beneficial in showing the absurdities of the Bible history. Let us hav them in plain figures, and on front and back pages. Long liv Heston. His pictures will never die. PARKER WINEMAN.

HARWICH, MASS., Oct. 13, 290.

MR. EDITOR: Find $2 inclosed for the "Freethinker's Pictorial Text-Book." I am surprised and pleased with the ability of the editorials and communications in THE TRUTH SEEKER, and look eagerly for its weekly advent among us. More and more do I see the abominable fruits of the huge blasphemy called Christianity. Speed the day when it shall hav been swept from the face of the earth.

B. F. ROBBINS.

BRAYTON, N. Y., Oct. 6, 1890.

MR. EDITOR: I hereby send my thanks to John Peck for his hard pecking of the old copperheads of the orthodox churches. I hope he will keep on pecking their old flinty heads until they surrender up their fort and giv their dupes fair play. I hereby thank Mr. T. E. Longshore for writing out my principle of the immortality of the soul. Death with me ends all. He expresses my views of another life better than I could myself. There is no proof in all nature of another life. All the flowers of the field, all the trees of the wood, all animals, all fowls of the air, all fish of the sea, and man not excepted, die, decay, and waste away, and make a little earth. Here is the end of man, for the God of nature has decreed it so to be, and no one can pass her bounds, for nature is the highest law known, and from her decisions there can be no appeal. Her judgments are final.

ASA W. BRAYTON.

CENTER, ALA., Oct. 10, 1890.

MR. EDITOR: I hav read somewhere—I think in THE TRUTH SEEKER—where it was against the law for a man to kiss his wife on Sunday. I think it was in Connecticut. It was an offense only in the streets, or in public, or going or coming from preaching. The editor of the Albany Law Journal ridicules the idea that such ever was against the law. See the number of Oct. 4, 1890, 261. Giv me reference to the law and a copy of it if it can be had. I am the correspondent referred to. C. DANIEL.

[The law nearest to the one you mention, that we recollect, is this given by Rev. Samuel Peters as a Blue law of Connecticut in his "General History of Connecticut:" "No woman shall kiss her child on the Sabbath or fasting-day." The genuinness of this citation of the Rev. Samuel Peters has been impugned, but not, we believe, with success.—ED. T. S.]

DE WITT, IA., Oct. 11, 1890.

MR. EDITOR: Inclosed please find $5. Continue THE TRUTH SEEKER and also send the "Pictorial Text-Book." I think your paper worthy the support of all Liberal and fair-minded people. Your contributors are men and women that think and study themselvs. They do not let priests and preachers influence their thoughts, but are fearless and outspoken in what they hav to say. In this country—if it is a free one, as the majority claim—we hav the right to our honest convictions, which are reason and common sense, and we should hav the same privilege as those that differ with us in expressing them. What the people of this country want more than anything else is to reason, think, and act for themselvs. By so doing their vision will become brighter, and all that they see around them and those that they come in contact with will help them to be happier. Now, they will soon learn that if they violate the law of nature they must suffer; and I know of no other law, morally speaking, that we are responsible to. F. L. WARNER.

DES MOINES, IA., Oct. 6, 1890.

MR. EDITOR: Inclosed find $2 for the book of pictures. I would not say that THE TRUTH SEEKER without Heston was the play of Hamlet with Hamlet left out, for the paper is of intrinsic value per se; but I may say that Heston is a valuable "condiment" in spicing the paper. What can be more realistic than his last, "The specter that threatens Ireland?"—what more truthful than his depicted cause, Catholicism lugging off on its back the life's-blood of Ireland, Peter's pence? The naked truth is, Ireland is so utterly besotted with priestcraft that to lend a helping hand to save her from starvation is like giving money to a famishing inebriate, who will spend his last cent for liquor. Still, benevolent America will not see Ireland starve; it will contribute munificently, and Ireland will buy some food and the pope get the lion's share. Protestant Ireland seems to be all right. My observation is that Chiniquy's book, "The Priest, the Woman, and the Confessional," is better calculated to deal a death-blow to Catholicism than anything of the kind yet given to the public. It is an eye-opener par excellence.

HUBBARD, Oct. 14, 1890.

MR. EDITOR: In THE TRUTH SEEKER of October 11th I see Nelson Hunt wants to know what Burns meant by the "rye through which Jenny draggit a' her petticoatie," and also who "Racer Jess" was in "The Holy Fair." Now, I spent some of my boyhood's days in Scotland, in the land of Burns, and heard the song, "Coming Through the Rye," sung many times, and was informed that the meaning was that there is a small stream in Ayrshire called the Rye, and that there was no bridge, but stepping-stones, as they were called, and people crossing had to step or jump from one stone to another, and when the water was a little high these stones were covered, and that was how Jenny "draggit a' her petticoatie" coming through the Rye. Now, of Racer Jess my edition of Burns has this foot-note: "The following notice of 'Racer Jess' appeared in the newspapers of February, 1818: 'Died at Mauchline a few weeks since, Janet Gibson, consigned to immortality by Burns in his "Holy Fair," under the turf appellation of Racer Jess. She was the daughter of "Poosie Nancy," who figures in the "Jolly Beggars." She was remarkable for her pedestrian powers, and sometimes ran long distances for a wager.'"

ADAM ARCHIBALD.

GRAND FORKS, Oct. 4, 1890.

MR. EDITOR: Inclosed please find $6 for the old TRUTH SEEKER and the "Pictorial Text-Book," and other books as per bill. I think the old TRUTH SEEKER, which I call my Bible, all right with or without the pictures, but the pictures put on the finishing touch, like paint on a lady's cheek, so I am for the pictures, and I will giv fifty cents toward paying Brother Heston for making one showing some of our great, great statesmen on their knees before a priest confessing that they had eaten meat on Friday, contrary to the rules of our sacred church, and the priest making them do penance by walking around the church on their bare knees on a gravel walk, reading the Holy Rosary and counting their beads. If some of them won't hav to do it, their children will, if they keep selling us to the pope and churches as they hav for the last few years. It is not that which goeth into the mouth which defileth the man, but that which cometh out. Also I wish a picture of Holy John and some of the Woman's Christian Temperance Union ladies driving the cockerels in the coop on Saturday night and marking the door, "No admittance. Selah."

Yours for truth, LEVI BANCROFT.

NEW HAVEN, O., Oct. 13, 1890.

MR. EDITOR: I write with a depressed feeling of sorrow for the loss of one of the best friends that a man can hav. His name was John M. Shult. He became a subscriber to your paper, I think, about July 1, 1890. About August 21st he went to Chicago, Ill., to make some investments in real estate, expecting to be gone about six weeks. He made arrangements with the postmaster at Plymouth that I should hav THE TRUTH SEEKER whilst gone, and to giv it to no other person. I hav got the papers and hav read them; but now comes the saddest part of the affair. On last Wednesday, October 8th, his body was shipped home, supposed to hav been murdered and thrown into the lake, where it was found floating. Other than this we know nothing of it, but it is thought that his having considerable money caused an assault. His death must hav been caused by some violent means, as his body bore marks of assault. He was a bright and shining light—a well-educated, well-informed young man. I can look at it only as a great loss to us Freethought people.

I wish I was able to be a subscriber to your valuable paper, but I am a poor broken-down soldier, not having done a day's work in over two years on account of heart disease, for which I am only receiving twelve dollars per month, so you may know that after keeping my family I hav no money left, but whilst my good friend was living he supplied me with reading matter. And may he ever be remembered by the good, is my fervent wish. THOS. S. CHARITY.

PITTSBURGH, PA., Oct. 13, 1890.

MR. EDITOR: The rancorous hatred of all religious bodies to secret societies is well known; but it remained for a Chicago "religio-philosophical" paper to express its open hatred to the workingmen's cause in general, and to labor organizations in particular. By currying the favor of the capitalists and tyrannical employers they gain support for themselvs and their tottering churches. I extract the following from the Chicago Christian Cynosure:

The carpenters' strike begun with so much éclât in this city last week, was over almost before it began. . . . Many of the union men had no complaint, and did not obey the bosses. Let these manufacturers and employers use a little of their profits to instruct the men against the seductions of secret societies and secure their suppression by law, as approved by Daniel Webster, Joseph Cook, the New York Mail and Express, etc., and they will find the labor problem very easy of solution.

That these utterances should find their way into a "Christian" paper is no wonder, considering the deeds and records of the church in the past ages. Always on the side of power, and herself (the Roman church) being for over a thousand years (from Constantine to the Reformation) the greatest hierarchy in the world, she has yet to show her sympathy for the toiling masses or her love for mankind. And this applies equally to her numerous offspring and all supernatural religions. The countless murders and wholesale butcheries committed under the cloak of "Christianity" are too well known by every intelligent reader. Founded by a few fanatics in a superstitious age, and her whole claim to belief resting on a collection of nonsensical books and more foolish miracles, she still counts her dupes by the millions. It is sad indeed that so large a number of the human family is still in the grasp of this fiery dragon of oppression-religion.

Religion has nothing in common with the poor. As soon as the masses become more educated, and knowledge becomes universal, they will turn their backs on their oppressors. Under its banner slavery and oppression hav flourished long enough; the day is not far distant when another banner, Liberty and Brotherhood of Man, will lead mankind. Then will men know where their rights end and others' begin; and human kindness and good will toward man will be the religion of civilized men and women.

MR. EDITOR: I hav perused with pleasure Mr. Putterbaugh's letter, and devoutly wish that all intelligent people would summon courage to investigate the claims of the Bible to that belief and reverence which amounts to idolatry. Compared with the Shaster and Veddas of India, it is a modern book. Its sensuous, warlike, and energetic character is what might be expected from the disposition of those who held it sacred. As a work of fiction it is inferior to the "Arabian Nights' Entertainments," "Gil Blas," or Fielding's novels. It is far inferior to the Veddas in language and philosophical tone, betraying its modern origin by the weak, diluted character of its moral sentiments. All that is robust and healthy was borrowed from the Stoics, whose philosophy is now the true religion of the world—all that saves the human mind from shipwreck. The Jews borrowed their literature in some measure from the sacred books of Assyria and Persia, to which it is inferior in every respect. How can the Jewish books compete with the Veddas in antiquity, when internal evidence proves that they were written when the nation had just migrated from their Aryan home, and were living, a pastoral people, on the borders of India—sacred India, the Holy Land of Asia? That the Jews were not a people of much dignity, is known by the fact that Josephus speaks of their troops as the most inferior in Xerxes's army. How could they be called ancient, when they went to Egypt as shepherds and found there a nation with a venerable antiquity? Instead of teaching religion, they learned to worship one god from learned men in that region. Even the Stoics allude to one god as a deity known and worshiped by many. The sacred books of an ancient nation comprised their whole literature. Every age added some refinement of thought or some new truth. The Jewish philosophy was meager at first, but as time rolls on doctrins multiply and sacred books grow voluminous. And on such unhealthy food the human mind has been fed for centuries, absorbing money and treasure to satisfy the wishes of the learned, ambitious, or licentious prelate. The Jews could not be very ancient, for the Hebrew or Phœnician languages left no trace even in Asia Minor, where the Phrygian was spoken, a compounded tongue, a mixture of Persian, Assyrian, and Ionian. Ionia preserved the Hellenic tongue or parent of the Greek. Barbarous tongues also were spoken there.

The Jews were mostly distinguished for their marvelous tales, the Bible being merely a heap of such fables, vulgar and silly, told around the woodland fires to entertain the passing stranger. The grand ruins which we should look for in Palestine are wanting, or are left by Persians or other outside nations. Why does not Herodotus make mention of their antiquities, or why does not Sesostris, who traversed Asia as a successful general? ALHAZA.

MR. EDITOR: The reason I send stamps is, I think it safer, as the letter will go through the hands of so many of Wanamaker's lambs and if any of them should feel the dime they would crack the letter for an eye-opener, or chip it in to their pet lamb God. I also inclose some reading that I would like you to insert in THE TRUTH SEEKER. I also mail you an Elmira Telegram giving an account of some holy doings of a sky-pilot in this city. Oh, what a holy howl those pious frauds would set up if it had been a bad Infidel. They would never hav got over croaking and groaning over it. But as it is on their side they are doing their best to smother it up for their pet Christ's sake, fearing they may spoil brood now it's coming on hatching time. If the scrape had happened in the Salvation Army there would be some excuse for the sky-pilot, but a high-toned Plymouth sheep-pen as it is, it is a bad exposure for the soul-broking business. I also mail a Salvation paper to brace you up. Its heading is blood and fire. No wonder they take that for a trademark, for all religion is founded on it.

A city rough happening into a missionary meeting when the subject under discussion was "The Jews Killing Jesus," listened a short time, and the injustice of the act warming up his righteous indignation and pugilistic powers, he suddenly got up from his seat, rushed out, and struck the first Jew he met square on the eye. The astonished Jew asked him the reason of his treating him in such a manner. Bursting with indignation, the wronged gentile screamed out, "Damn you, you killed our Jesus." "Oh," the Jew replied, "but that was four thousand years or more ago." "I don't giv a damn," replied the other, "it's only twenty minutes ago since I heard it."

A bear which a traveling showman is exhibiting about the suburbs took a fancy that while his master went to the public-house he would go to chapel. He selected a Nonconformist place of worship on the high road between Barnes and Mortlake. Service was proceeding; but, so far from welcoming the new proselyte, the congregation manifested a general desire to occupy the pulpit. The minister, who happened to be preaching on the text, "Be not afraid," abruptly suspended his discourse, while the intruder who caused all the commotion unostentatiously made his way to what we suppose were the best seats in the chapel—the "empty choir stalls"—and there lay peaceably down. It is to be feared that an edifying discourse on the text "Be not afraid" would hav been left altogether incomplete had not the owner of the bear happily appeared and dragged bruin away.

A missionary going through the backwoods and coming rather unexpectedly on a lonely cabin, stopped and rapped at the door. A woman answering his knock, he found himself rather at a loss to know what he should say, but plunging into his subject he said, "Missus, I am gathering in the lost sheep." "Well," replied the party addressed as missus, not quite taking in the spiritual meaning of the words, "I saw an old buck and an old ewe goin' by here the other day and I jest wondered who the hell owned them. The missionary, as in duty bound by his sacred calling, and shocked by the woman's words, made a further attempt to improve the occasion by saying, "O woman, you're in darkness!" "There 'tis again," said she. "I told Jake ter put a winder in that ere back kitchen six months ago. By God, he hain't done it yet!"

Mr. Editor: Tennyson says:

I hold it truth, with him who sings
To one clear harp in divers tones,
That men may rise on stepping-stones
Of their dead selvs to higher things.

I believe that love is better than annihilation, and consider progression preferable to oblivion. I think an eternity can not be burdensome if it be well employed, and that this brief life is too long to be spent otherwise. I know not if the path of the soul be a straight line, or a circle, or an eternal spiral tending upward. I defined the soul in my recent article but did not state its "component parts," and I know not if it hav any. Can my brother define the "component parts" of a homogeneous entity? I can define the parts of the soul, abstractly, as love, labor, and cussedness. I can not tell my brother what would hav happened had my maternal ancestor married a Mr. Jones, but the marriage of my parents was inevitably a link in that chain of causation and sequence which extends from out of the eternal past to the transient present to be prolonged throughout the everlasting future, and he might ask me with equal propriety, what gases oxygen could be divided into if it were not an elementary substance? Can he answer these questions from a Materialistic standpoint?

I cannot now inform him where I was before my parents existed, but this knowledge may come to me later as a recollection. My learned brother disparages idealism, which he claims "postulates theories as abstruse as a Latin litany." I understand idealism in its simplicity to be the science of perception, the philosophy without a hypothesis or a theory. The idealists realize that the senses can only take cognizance of immaterial phenomena, which inevitably follow certain other phenomena, and they can predict that as this has occurred invariably in the past it must always come to pass in the future, as illustrated by the burnt picture; but knowing no more, they consider theories but figurativ explanations which are adapted to one's comprehension. The Materialists found their philosophy on idealism, and without any evidence whatever they ascribe phenomena to matter, and on this basis "postulate theories" that are as truly absurd as the "Latin litany;" and some of them ascribe the existence of matter to the work of a god, but these individuals seldom go farther, and all Materialists are bound to stick fast somewhere in the mud of sophistry. If my brother can tell me what matter is but the total of such immaterial perceptions as always "go together," and such special ones as pertain to any object under consideration—in other words, if he can show that materiality exists—he may hav the niche that he has so kindly reserved for me in the temple of fame, for I do not want it, anyway, and I believe that there are New Yorkers who are aggressiv enough to assault a statue. I do not think he can do this, and "if he does it" "it will still be" phenomena, "and if not" phenomena "it will be nothing." I concurred with my critic regarding the fire, and mentioned the coals in the grate simply as an illustration of a paradox that I thought required a physical explanation to prove a metaphysical point. It matters not, so far as my argument is concerned, whether force is identical with matter, or inertia a property of matter or not. These ideas were taught twenty years ago in the village schools of Illinois, and I will not abandon them until I can see for myself that they hav been exploded. My principal arguments are based on the scientific statement that the body is renewed periodically, and I would defend this premis if it were assailed. My brother has mentioned the point I made regarding a memory existing in the mind unthought of during many renewals of the brain and body; but as he has answered me in this respect, I cannot answer him. I claim that a man and a jackknife are comparable as material entities, but there is truly a great difference between them and between all organized bodies and organic ones. I stated so in my previous article, and showed just what this difference is.

Yours truly, Julian Marcellas.

Mr. Editor: I wish again to drop a few random thoughts regarding a secret order composed of Liberals. I think the Liberals should organize similarly to the Independent Order of Odd Fellows, having three degrees, and floor work, also unwritten secret work; charging a stipulated amount for the initiation and degrees, each member to pay into the treasury or general fund so much as monthly dues; and say ten per cent of all moneys received, to be known as the Widows' and Orphans' Fund, to go to pay a certain amount to the widow of a deceased brother for funeral benefit, thus to make it compulsory on the lodge and its members to educate the orphans of deceased brothers when left in destitute circumstances, and to visit the sick and relieve the distressed. Let the qualifications for membership be that there shall be admitted "white, male persons of the age of eighteen years, of good moral character." Allow each member so much as sick benefits for each week's sickness, to be paid out of the general funds of the lodge. When the membership has reached a sufficient number they shall hav power to elect delegates from each society to meet together and organize a grand or sovereign lodge, by electing its executiv officers and transacting such other business as shall be brought before it and for the general welfare of the subordinate lodges under its sovereign jurisdiction. Also, when the membership in any state or territory reaches a certain number they shall hav the power to organize into a subordinate grand body, to hav control of all subordinate lodges in their jurisdiction, the same not conflicting with the sovereign lodge. And when the society shall attain to a sufficient number in all the jurisdictions, the sovereign lodge shall devise plans to allow an assessment on the death of a brother in good standing, of sufficient amount to pay as benefit not less than $1,000, the assessment to be equal on every member of the entire brotherhood.

Now, friends, while it is an easy matter to picture out the future on paper, some may say, Can we accomplish the above? Well, for an illustration I will giv you a brief history of the Independent Order of Odd Fellows. On April 26, 1819, there assembled in a small room in an obscure tavern in Baltimore, Md., five humble progenitors. Then and there they formally and solemnly organized Washington Lodge No. 1, Independent Order of Odd Fellows. The tallow dips shed their dim light on the bronzed faces of the entire brotherhood then assembled to establish an organization that was destined to startle the world. The wildest dreams of that humble five could not hav pictured to them the results to be obtained by organizing—that in less than three-quarters of a century that little band of five would foot up the grand total of 1,635,381 initiated members, with 634,335 members in good standing in 1889, giving relief to 1,460,331 brothers, relieving 183,601 widowed families, and burying 143,504 members, footing up the enormous sum of $51,258,391.26 for relief. The above are facts. Now, Liberals, can we not do likewise? We should be able to do more now, in this enlightened age when electric lights hav taken the place of tallow dips, when the earth has been girdled with an electric chain by means of which the records of to-day's transactions will be whirled across the continent and read before to-morrow's sun shall hav opened and drawn aside "the curtains of his eastern couch."

The investigations of the scientist hav brought to light many of the hidden secrets of nature. The investigations of philosophers, like Paine, Voltaire, Humboldt, Darwin, Huxley, and Franklin, hav brought to light and exposed many of the dogmas and impositions taught by priests. The continent has been spanned by the iron railway, whereby a four months' dangerous, tiresome journey overland from ocean to ocean has been reduced to a holiday excursion of but a few days. Now, with all these advantages, certainly we can organize. Separated as we are, we are like a bundle of sticks. Separate them and the strength of a child could break them, but bind them together and the strength of a giant would be exhausted. So with the Liberals. Separated, the strength of a few weak-minded soul-carpenters could break us asunder, but bound together by the bonds of universal love, welded in the fires of Universal Mental Liberty, the combined strength and influence of heaven and hell, gods and devils, spooks and spirits, could not loosen the cords that bind us together as brothers. We would march triumphantly onward and upward—not heavenward—until the whole world would feel the soothing influence. Love would exert its gentle influence over all. Truth would appear in all we say and do. With fraternity as an eccentric the whole world would move in unison with the dictates of the highest and grandest of principles, the brotherhood of man. We should all labor for the interest of humanity. It is a cause that is worthy of the noblest efforts of man; one which it is not only our duty to advocate but which it should be our pleasure to pursue; a cause which recognizes the true mission of man to be fraternity; which unites men everywhere as brothers, bound together not only by common sympathy but by common wants. Mr. Editor: I cannot resist the temptation to write a few words to thank John P. Guild, of Tyngsboro, Mass., for writing, and you for publishing, his humorous but noble and spirited defense of Prohibition and his splendid array of statistical evidences that proves its great success in Kansas and Iowa.

It is both amusing and vexing to hear the rum and beer advocates tell such infernal lies about the failure of Prohibition in the states which hav tried it. They say the experiment in Iowa and Kansas is a total failure; that more liquor is drank under the Prohibition régime than before; that the people are disappointed and dissatisfied, and are now urging the resubmission of the amendment to the people, all of which is false. I am sorry to see so many Liberals joining in the cry. I understand Liberalism to mean emancipation from superstition, ignorance, and vice. Is not liquor-selling a vice? Is it not the duty of Liberals to prohibit vice in any form if they can? Why then should Liberals oppose the reform which it is their special duty to advocate? To oppose Prohibition is to favor intemperance.

Is Liberalism opposed to the laws which prohibit theft, arson, robbery, felony, defamation, and innumerable other crimes? No, of course not. Then why say that it is opposed to Prohibition of the liquor traffic, which is more destructiv of the good order of society, and the welfare and happiness of the people, than any other crime, and is the cause of a majority of all other crimes?

It is a source of constant regret and sorrow to me that so many Liberal papers and magazines decry Prohibition and scold the Prohibitionists. If it is the peculiar province of Liberals to elevate humanity, it seems to me they, before all others, should teach and propagate temperance, and help, by their influence, to enact and enforce Prohibition. Every sane mind must know that legal restraint, that is, Prohibition, is the only possible remedy for the prevailing, almost unlimited, drunkenness. And we know that this is the remedy, as Mr. Guild so abundantly proves, and as has been proved in Maine for more than thirty years, where true and genuin "personal liberty" has been more fully enjoyed than in any community where liquor-drinking is permitted and practiced. Then why not adopt the remedy?

Some Liberals say, "Liberalism and Prohibition hav nothing to do with each other."

Some "cannot see how a consistent Liberal can be a Prohibitionist."

One says, "Liberalism covers all moral and economic questions; Prohibition only one."

One says that "Liberalism and Prohibition are radically opposed, that Liberalism is jealous of all interference with personal liberty."

One says, "Prohibitionists are mostly orthodox."

Some say, "Liberalism has largely to do with temperance, but nothing to do with Prohibition."

One says, "To yield to another the rights and privileges we take for ourselvs is the opposit of Prohibition, which says distinctly, 'Thou shalt not' do thus and so."

"Prohibition is a church movement, bound inseparably to the Sunday movement—the God-in-the-Constitution movement."

One says, "The relation which Liberalism bears to Prohibition is the relation that truth bears to falsehood, that liberty bears to despotism, the relation of complete opposits."

Such are some of the views expressed by certain Liberals.

Now, I confess that the societies organized as secular, ethical, and anti-religious orders hav in their organizations nothing special to do with any theories of reform except those embraced in the Nine Demands, but the gist of that excellent creed is condensed into a few words—Emancipation from ignorance, superstition, and vice. And all consistent Liberals will do all in their power to dispel ignorance and superstition, and prohibit vice. The eighth Demand of our creed requires "that all laws shall be conformed to the requirements of natural morality, equal rights, and impartial liberty." It seems to me that a law which shall prohibit the selling of liquor for a beverage, and which shall close up the saloons, will conform to all three of the above requirements, and specially to natural morality, so that Prohibition, instead of being opposed to Liberalism, is in harmony with and comprises part of it. Mrs. E. D. Slenker says "a generous prohibition of all evils is best." Miss Susan H. Wixon says, "As all laws are necessarily prohibitory, Prohibition might in a certain higher form of ethics be regarded as sustaining harmonious relations to Liberalism." I agree with both these ladies; and that form of ethics embraced in the creed of Liberalism is the highest form, requiring human emancipation from superstition, ignorance, and vice. I understand Prohibition is in harmony with and forms a part of Liberalism. That the orthodox religionists and the churches are assuming to control and manage the great reform, is no argument against it, though those who urge that fact are, unconsciously perhaps, complimenting the churches and the orthodox. Will Liberals, by and by when the churches adopt, and claim to hav originated, the Nine Demands, deny them and repudiate them? For my part, I am perfectly willing to let the churches and orthodoxy teach temperance, Freethought, liberty, and any other true reform, but let us not take a back seat of our own accord, and let the orthodox and the churches run the true and real reforms just yet.

It is as truly the province of Liberalism, and the duty of Liberals, to suppress vice, as it is to dispel ignorance and encourage intellectual culture; and I propose that the Liberals organize and take the lead in every true and rational measure for the elevation of human character, and cease opposing real reforms because some of the bigots in church organizations advocate the same.

The truth is, the Nine Demands comprise all reforms, and Prohibition is one of them, and Liberals hav no right to oppose it. B.

traveled by the human race. He knows that every victory over nature is but the preparation for another battle. This truth was in his mind when he said: "Understand me well; it is provided in the essence of things, that from any fruition of success, no matter what, shall come forth something to make a greater struggle necessary."

This is the generalization of all history.

XI.

THE TWO POEMS.

There are two of these poems to which I have time to call special attention. The first is entitled, "A Word Out of the Sea."

The boy, coming out of the rocked cradle, wandering over the sands and fields, up from the mystic play of shadows, out of the patches of briers and blackberries—from the memories of birds—from the thousand responses of his heart—goes back to the sea and his childhood, and sings a reminiscence.

Two guests from Alabama—two birds—build their nest, and there were four light green eggs, spotted with brown, and the two birds sang for joy:

Shine, shine,
Pour down your warmth together, great sun!
While we bask, we two together.
Two together—
Winds blow south, or winds blow north,
Day come white, or night come black,
Home, or rivers and mountains from home,
Singing all time, minding no time,
If we two but keep together.

In a little while one of the birds is missed and never appeared again, and all through the summer the mate, the solitary guest, was singing of the lost:

Blow, blow,
Blow up, sea winds, along Paumanok's shore;
I wait and I wait till you blow my mate to me.

And the boy that night, blending himself with the shadows, with bare feet, went down to the sea, where he white arms out in the breakers were tirelessly tossing; listening to the songs and translating the notes.

And the singing bird called loud and high for the mate, wondering what the dusky spot was in the brown and yellow, seeing the mate whichever way he looked, piercing the woods and the earth with his song, hoping that the mate might hear his cry; stopping that he might not lose her answer; waiting and then crying again: "Here I am!" And this gentle call is for you. Do not be deceived by the whistle of the wind; those are the shadows; and at last crying:

O past, O joy!
In the air, in the woods, over fields,
Loved! loved! loved!
Loved—but no more with me—
We two together no more.

And then the boy, understanding the song that had awakened in his breast a thousand songs clearer and louder and more sorrowful than the bird's, knowing that the cry of unsatisfied love would never again be absent from him; thinking then of the destiny of all, and asking of the sea the final word, and the sea answering, delaying not and hurrying not, spoke the low delicious word "Death!" "ever Death!"

The next poem, one that will live as long as our language, entitled: "When Lilacs Last in the Door-yard Bloomed," is on the death of Lincoln.

The sweetest, wisest soul of all my days and lands.

One who reads this will never forget the odor of the lilac, "the lustrous western star" and "the grey-brown bird singing in the pines and cedars."

In this poem the dramatic unities are perfectly preserved, the atmosphere and climate in harmony with every event.

Never will he forget the solemn journey of the coffin through day and night, with the great cloud darkening the land, nor the pomp of inlooped flags, the procession long and winding, the flambeaus of night, the torches' flames, the silent sea of faces, the unbared heads, the thousand voices rising strong and solemn, the dirges, the shuddering organs, the tolling bells—and the sprig of lilac.

And then for a moment they will hear the grey-brown bird singing in the cedars, bashful and tender, while the lustrous star lingers in the West, and they will remember the pictures hung on the chamber walls to adorn the burial house—pictures of spring and farms and homes and the grey smoke, lucid and bright, and the floods of yellow gold—of the gorgeous indolent sinking sun—the sweet herbage under foot—the green leaves of the trees prolific—the breast of the river with the wind-dapple here and there, and the varied and ample land—and the most excellent sun so calm and haughty—the violet and purple morn with just-felt breezes. The gentle soft born measureless light—the miracle spreading, bathing all—the fulfilled noon—the coming eve delicious and the welcome night and the stars.

And then again they will hear the song of the grey-brown bird in the limitless dusk amid the cedars and pines. Again they will remember the star and again the odor of the lilac.

But most of all, the song of the bird translated and becoming the chant for death:

THE CHANT FOR DEATH.

Come lovely and soothing death,
Undulate 'round the world, serenely arriving, arriving,
In the day, in the night, to all, to each,
Sooner or later delicate death.

Praised be the fathomless universe,
For life and joy, and for objects and knowledge curious,
And for love, sweet love—but praise! praise! praise!
For the sure enwinding arms of cool enfolding death.

Dark mother always gliding near with soft feet,
Have none chanted for thee a chant of fullest welcome?
Then I chant it for thee, I glorify thee above all,
I bring thee a song that when thou must indeed come, come unfalteringly.

Approach, strong deliveress,
When it is so, when thou hast taken them I joyously sing the dead,
Lost in the loving floating ocean of thee,
Laved in the flood of thy bliss, O death.

From me to thee glad serenades,
Dances for thee I propose saluting thee, adornments and feastings for thee,
And the sights of the open landscape and the high-spread sky are fitting,
And life and the fields, and the bright and thoughtful night.

The night in silence under many a star,
The ocean shore and the husky whispering wave whose voice I know,
And the soul turning to thee, O vast and well-veiled death,
And the body gratefully nestling close to thee.

Over the tree-tops I float thee a song,
Over the rising and sinking waves, over the myriad fields and the prairies wide,
Over the dense-packed cities all—and the teeming wharves and waves,
I float this carol to thee, with joy to thee, O death.

This poem, in memory of "the sweetest, wisest soul of all our days and lands," and for whose sake lilac and star and bird were entwined, will last as long as the memory of Lincoln.

XII.

OLD AGE.

Walt Whitman is not only the poet of childhood, of youth, of manhood, but, above all, of old age. He has not been soured by slander or petrified by prejudice; neither calumny nor flattery has made him revengeful or arrogant. Now sitting by the fireside, in the winter of life,

His jocund heart still beating in his breast,

he is just as brave and calm and kind as in his manhood's proudest days, when roses blossomed in his cheeks. He has taken life's seven steps. Now, as the gamester might say, "on velvet." He is enjoying "old age expanded, broad, with the haughty breadth of the universe; old age, flowing free, with the delicious, near-by freedom of death; old age, superbly rising, welcoming the ineffable aggregation of dying days."

He is taking the "loftiest look at last," and before he goes he utters thanks "for health, the midday sun, the impalpable air—for life, mere life; for precious ever lingering memories of mother, father, brothers, sisters, friends; for all his days, for gentle words, caresses, gifts from foreign lands, for shelter, wine and meat, for sweet appreciation, for beings, groups, love, deeds, words, books; for colors, forms; for all the brave, strong men who forward sprung in freedom's help—all years—in all lands; the cannoneers of song and thought—the great artillerists, the foremost leaders, captains of the soul."

It is a great thing to preach philosophy—far greater to live it. The highest philosophy accepts the inevitable with a smile, and greets it as though it were desired.

To be satisfied: This is wealth—success.

The real philosopher knows that everything has happened that could have happened—consequently he accepts. He is glad that he has lived—glad that he has had his moment on the stage. In this spirit Whitman has accepted life.

I shall go forth;
I shall traverse these states, but I cannot tell whither or how long.
Perhaps soon, some day or night, while I am singing, my voice will suddenly cease,
O soul!
Then all may arrive but to this:
The glances of my eyes that swept the daylight,
The unspeakable love I interchanged with women,
My joys in the open air,
My walks in the Mannahatta,
The continual good will I have met,
The curious attachments of young men to me,
My reflections alone—the absorption into me from the landscape, stars, animals, thunder, rain, and snow in my interviews alone;
The words of my mouth—rude, ignorant—my many faults and derelictions;
The light touches on my lips of the lips of my comrades at parting,
The tracks which I leave on the sidewalks and fields—
May all arrive at but this beginning of me;
This beginning of me—and yet it is enough, O, soul!
O, soul, we have positively appeared; that is enough.

Yes, Walt Whitman has appeared. He has his place upon the stage. The drama is not ended. His voice is still heard. He is the Poet of Democracy—of all people. He is the poet of the body and soul. He has sounded the note of Individuality. He has given the pass-word primeval. He is the Poet of Humanity—of Intellectual Hospitality. He has voiced the aspirations of America—and, above all, he is the poet of Love and Death.

How grandly, how bravely he has given his thought, and how superb is his farewell—his leave-taking:

After the supper and talk; after the day is done.
As a friend from friends his final withdrawal prolonging.
Good-bye and good-bye with emotional lips repeating.
So hard for his hand to release those hands—no more will they meet—
No more for communion of sorrow and joy of old and young,
A far-stretching journey awaits him to return no more.
Shunning postponing severance, seeking to ward off the last word ever so little,
Even at the exit door turning—charges superfluous calling back—even as he descends the steps,
Something to eke out a minute additional—shadows of night-fall deepening,
Farewell messages lessening, dimmer the forthgoer's visage and form,
Soon to be lost for aye in the darkness; loth, oh, so loth to depart!

And is this all? Will the forthgoer be lost, and forever? Is death the end? Over the grave bends Love sobbing, and by her side stands Hope and whispers:

We shall meet again. Before all life is death, and after all death is life. The falling leaf, touched with the hectic flush, that testifies of autumn's death, is, in a subtler sense, a prophecy of spring.

Walt Whitman has dreamed great dreams, told great truths and uttered sublime thoughts. He has held aloft the torch and bravely led the way.

As you read the marvelous book, or the person, called "Leaves of Grass," you feel the freedom of the antique world; you hear the voices of the morning, of the first great singers—voices elemental as those of sea and storm. The horizon enlarges, the heavens grow ample, limitations are forgotten—the realization of the will, the accomplishment of the ideal, seem to be within your power. Obstructions become petty and disappear. The chains and bars are broken, and the distinctions of caste are lost.

The soul is in the open air, under the blue and stars—the flag of Nature. Creeds, theories, and philosophies ask to be examined, contradicted, reconstructed. Prejudices disappear, superstitions vanish, and custom abdicates. The sacred places become highways, duties and desires clasp hands and become comrades and friends. Authority drops the scepter, the priest the miter, and the purple falls from kings. The inanimate becomes articulate, the meanest and humblest things utter speech, and the dumb and voiceless burst into song. A feeling of independence takes possession of the soul, the body expands, the blood flows full and free, superiors vanish, flattery is a lost art, and life becomes rich, royal, and superb. The world becomes a personal possession, and the oceans, the continents, and constellations belong to you. You are in the center, everything radiates from you, and in your veins beats and throbs the pulse of all life. You become a rover, careless and free. You wander by the shores of all seas and hear the eternal psalm. You feel the silence of the wide forest, and stand beneath the intertwined and over arching boughs, entranced with symphonies of winds and woods. You are borne on the tides of eager and swift rivers, hear the rush and roar of cataracts as they fall beneath the seven-hued arch, and watch the eagles as they circling soar. You traverse gorges dark and dim, and climb the scarred and threatening cliffs. You stand in orchards where the blossoms fall like snow, where the birds nest and sing, and painted moths make aimless journeys through the happy air. You live the lives of those who till the earth, and walk amid the perfumed fields, hear the reapers' song, and feel the breadth and scope of earth and sky. You are in the great cities, in the midst of multitudes, of the endless processions. You are on the wide plains—the prairies—with hunter and trapper, with savage and pioneer, and you feel the soft grass yielding under your feet. You sail in many ships, and breathe the free air of the sea. You travel many roads, and countless paths. You visit palaces and prisons, hospitals and courts; you pity kings and convicts, and your sympathy goes out to all the suffering and insane, the oppressed and enslaved, and even to the infamous. You hear the din of labor, all sounds of factory, field, and forest, of all tools, instruments, and machines. You become familiar with men and women of all employments, trades, and professions—with birth and burial, with wedding feast and funeral chant. You see the cloud and flame of war, and you enjoy the ineffable perfect days of peace.

In this one book, in these wondrous "Leaves of Grass," you find hints and suggestions, touches and fragments, of all there is of life, that lies between the babe, whose rounded cheeks dimple beneath his mother's laughing, loving eyes, and the old man, snow-crowned, who, with a smile, extends his hand to death. And we have met to-night to honor ourselves by honoring the author of "Leaves of Grass."

FOR HER DAILY BREAD.

A NINETEENTH CENTURY NOVEL.

Preface by R. G. INGERSOLL.

For Her Daily Bread is the story of two young girls and a younger brother who were left parentless, with little money, fair education, and much courage, to make their way through the world by going to Chicago. The author is also the heroin. The narrativ is, in the main, a history of a working girl's life and experience in the city of Chicago among bluff business men, kind hearted folks, and disreputable hypocrits. It is just such a story of human life as we should expect Colonel Ingersoll to be interested in; and whatever he admires and appreciates is sure to be worth the attention of the rest of the world. TRY-SQUARE:

OR,

The Church of Practical Religion.

BY REPORTER.

This is the history of an attempt to found a church without superstition, and its success. Uncle Job Sawyer, the pastor, having established his pulpit, uses it to discuss all the vital questions of human concern, religious, political, and otherwise. The book is written in well-chosen language, and easily understood. There is just sufficient narrativ about it to interest the reader and hold his attention while the truth is being brought to his mind.

News of the Week.

It is said that the president and the Republican party dislike the anti-Catholic articles which Col. Elliott Shepard prints in his New York Republican organ, the Mail and Express, and will procure their discontinuance or start another Republican evening paper here.

Rev. Martin L. Fritch, of Reading, Pa., has been jailed three months for stealing.

In the coming election in Great Britain Scotsmen will endeavor to disestablish the Church of Scotland.

The archbishops and bishops of Ireland hav issued a pastoral letter calling on Parliament to avert the starvation threatening the Irish.

The Russian government has placed in all the telegraph stations in the province of Finland, which is largely Protestant, images of the saints of the Greek Catholic church.

The Italian government has closed a school at Smyrna because it raised the pontifical escutcheon instead of that of Italy. The Sisters of Charity who ran the school hav been dismissed, and a secular school has been set up in place of the old one.

The trouble between the Central American republics is the attempt to effect union. Apprehensions of the unjust aggrandization of one nation in the union cause the countries, as says a dispatch, to "tear one another like tigers."

The Russian superintendent of police is receiving many petitions to change names of Jewish lawyers to names that will not betray Hebraic origin, so that the petitioners will not suffer avoidance in patronage.

Cardinal Taschereau's demand for precedence at the visit of Prince George has given an additional fillip to religious dissensions in Canada.

Religious objections to truths in public school books are inducing more and more expurgation. It is reported that "the class-books will soon become more celebrated for their negations and omissions than for the positiv information they contain."

Emperor William of Germany is said to be irritated against Russia's keeping 450,000 men out of a peace standard of 850,000 mobilized on the frontier. But for this standing menace of Russia France would disarm, it is said, and Germany and Austria would follow suit.

The lamentations of Catholics in Italy are now swelled by the wailings of some scores of priests who are thrown out of snug berths into poverty by the closing of churches, chapels, and oratories connected with the charitable guilds and confraternities. The closing proceeds from the assumption by the state of the administration of the charitable funds.

There is much feeling against the Mafia societies, or societies for the commission of private murder in revenge of wrong or fancied wrong, in New Orleans. The sanctified Italian Catholics swear alibis for everyone suspected, so that it is difficult to convict. Mayor Shakespeare of New Orleans says, "No community can exist with murder societies in its midst; these societies must perish or the society itself must perish."

Catholics in Italy are angry that the government accounts the Vatican art treasures as public property—in the words of the Riforma, holds that "all the works of art contained in the palace of St. Peter are national patrimony, and that it is but just that Italian students be empowered to consult them at will, without being subjected to the formalities and humiliating inquiries necessary now to open to such the Vatican doors."

In the German parliament there has been condemnation of the maintenance of large cavalry forces, which hav been decried as antiquated inheritances of chivalry. But Von Moltke in an elaborate article in the Kreuzzitung cites instances in the American civil war to prove the value of large masses of cavalry. "Both the Northern and the Southern armies," says the article, "had only a few mounted troops at the outset of the operations, but their leaders soon learned that it was impossible to do without . . . cavalry, and Lee confessed that lack of cavalry lost Gettysburg."

Gems of Thought.

Ignorance is the principal cause of crime, as well as of misrule. The untrained person is not likely to hav his morals developed, any more than his intelligence. With a good education one can do not only his private but his public work better, and so be in a condition to be ruled as well as to rule.—Bierbower.

If we are to change the conduct of men, we must change their conditions. Extreme poverty and crime go hand in hand.—Ingersoll.

Ignorance and servitude are calculated to make men wicked and unhappy. Knowledge, reason, and liberty can alone reform them, and make them happier.—D'Holbach.

Every expansion of intelligence has proved of advantage to society. —Guizot.

The destruction of Christianity is essential to the interests of civilization.—Reade.

Christianity set itself against all popular advancement, against all civil and social progress, against all improvement in the condition of the masses. It viewed every change with distrust, it met every innovation with opposition. While it reigned supreme, Europe lay in chains, and even into the new world it carried the fetters of the old.—Annie Besant.

How can that be received as a trustworthy guide in the invisible, which falls into so many errors in the visible? How can that giv confidence in the moral, the spiritual, which has so signally failed in the physical?—Draper.

Let us see what the church, within a few years, has been compelled substantially to abandon—that is to say, what it is now almost ashamed to defend. First, the astronomy of the sacred scriptures; second, the geology; third, the account given of the origin of man; fourth, the doctrin of original sin the fall of the human race; fifth, the mathematical contradiction known as the trinity; sixth, the atonement—because it was only on the ground that man is accountable for the sin of another, that he could be justified by reason of the righteousness of another; seventh, that the miraculous is either the misunderstood or the impossible; eighth, that the Bible is not inspired in its morality, for the reason that slavery is not moral, that polygamy is not good, that wars of extermination are not merciful, and that nothing can be more immoral than to punish the innocent on account of the sins of the guilty; and, ninth, the divinity of Christ.—Ingersoll.

Man will never attain his full powers as a moral being until he has ceased to believe in a personal God and in the immortality of the soul.—Reade.

We are convinced that it is contrary to all moral ideas to teach that the guilty may be pardoned, because the innocent hav suffered. —Robt. C. Adams.

To the World's Columbian Exposition Commission:

Learning that there is an organized movement among the more conservative church people—manipulated by a "Sabbath" organization—to induce your honorable body to close on Sundays the World's Fair, to be held in 1893 in Chicago, the undersigned respectfully put in this counter petition, and ask that the Fair may be open to the public on each Sunday of its continuance. We ask this for the following reasons:

1. That the American principle of separation of church and state may be maintained.

2. That public morality may be subserved by providing a substitute for the immoral places to which men may resort when no moral amusements are available.

3. As a matter of justice also to the people of Chicago who have given of their means to make the Fair possible, tens of thousands of whom can visit the Fair only on a general holiday; and as a matter of justice also to the visitors to the Fair, whose time or means may be limited, and who certainly are entitled to great consideration at your hands.

4. For the public good. The opening of the Fair on Sunday will be for the benefit not only of Chicago, but of the whole country. The rights of no one are infringed, the happiness of no one disturbed. Those who wish to attend can do so; those who do not can otherwise spend the day. This is a solely humanitarian question, a question of human relations and human welfare, and, therefore, the only standard by which you can decide is that of the public welfare.

5. It will benefit the Fair, attracting a much larger attendance, interesting more people in it, and increasing its receipts.

6. To the objection that Sunday opening of the Fair will destroy the day as a rest-day, we affirm that the tendency would be exactly the opposite. The more beautiful you make Sunday, the more attractive, the more noble and varied in its pleasures and instructions, the more difficult it will be to change its character, the less danger there is that employers will ever have the power to transfer it from its present position to the days of toil. With choice of Sunday occupation restricted to attending church or visiting a saloon, the average workingman would choose to keep on laboring.

7. Finally: Opening the World's Fair on Sunday will harm no one but the keepers of immoral places, while it will benefit the Fair itself, the people of Chicago, and the visitors to the Fair, thereby conducing to municipal prosperity, individual education, public morality, and the development and good of the whole country.

THE WORLD AS SATAN WOULD HAV IT.

Notes and Clippings.

LACK of knowledge as to the powers of civil government is leading our country into grave and compromising positions. Leave religion alone, is the spirit of our Constitution—a motto that comes down to us in blood and flame from the past ages.—Moral and Scientific Companion.

GLADSTONE has addressed this letter to the Jewish Chronicle: "I hav read with pain and horror the various published statements respecting the sufferings of the Jews in Russia. The only recommendation I can make is that the activ exertions of the press should be invited to sift reports and establish facts, and when this is done to rouse the conscience of Russia and Europe with regard to them."

A CHATTANOOGA dispatch says: "So far this week J. F. Conyer, a colored minister in this city, who runs a saloon as a side issue, has had a lively record. Sunday morning he preached; Sunday afternoon he had his whisky mill in full blast; Sunday night his barkeeper knocked a man in the head in his presence; Monday afternoon he broke a heavy teacup over his wife's head; Monday night there was a lively row in his house; Tuesday he fired at a man, and Wednesday he was before the recorder."

To a reporter in St. Louis who asked his views regarding the presidency in 1892 Colonel Ingersoll replied: "I think it is between Blaine and Reed. That is, as the situation stands to-day. Reed is growing in popularity wonderfully. I would like to see my friend, Judge Gresham, nominated for the presidency. But it makes no difference who is nominated; the Republicans will win anyway. The McKinley bill is sure to increase the Republican vote. The Democratic party is like a man riding backward on a train, who never sees anything until he has passed it, but the Republican party rides with its face to the engin and knows a good thing when it sees it, and sees it as soon as it gets in sight."

As an indication of the attitude of the church in the Wisconsin campaign over public or sectarian schools may be quoted a circular issued in German by the leading Polish priest of Green Lake county, which is almost entirely peopled with German and Polish Roman Catholics. This treasonable circular is literally translated in these words: "To the faithful—The time is not far, when the Roman Catholics, by order of the pope, will refuse to pay the school taxes, and sooner than to pay the agent or collector, will put a bullet through his breast. This order may come at any time from Rome, and it will come as suddenly as pulling the trigger of a gun, and of course this order will be obeyed, as it comes from God almighty."

A NEW YORKER who is friendly with Ingersoll, while repudiating Ingersollism, talks in this way: "It seems surprising to many people that Colonel Bob Ingersoll, with his large practice at the bar, his many legal duties, and his application to the business of his office, is able to find time for literary work, and lecturing, and benevolent service of many kinds, and banqueteering and club life and sociability in his household. He left his practice here the other day to deliver a eulogy upon Walt Whitman in Philadelphia; a short while ago he delivered a discourse entitled, 'Crimes Against Criminals,' and it would take time to tell of all his other operations outside of the bar this year. Here is a pointer for you: He can do his hard work because he is a hard worker, and because he does it when it ought to be done. There is no nonsense about him when he has work to do; he goes at it with all his brains and muscles; and thus he gets through more in a week than other men scrapple over for a month."—Sun.

AN important case that may seriously damage religious orders, says a Canada dispatch to the Sun, is before Judge Andrews in the superior court, Quebec, with a brilliant array of legal talent on both sides. Two cloistered nuns hav been under examination as witnesses, this being the first instance, it is said, of nuns of a cloistered order appearing before Quebec courts of justice. The suit is the result of effort by the nuns of the Sacred Heart convent to break or repudiate a contract of sale by which they purchased from the widow of the late J B. Renaud valuable property at Beauport, near the city, paying $25,000 on account of its price, and since then taking large quantities of stone from its quarries. Finding, however, that their bargain is not so profitable as they expected, they are now asking the court to cancel, on the pretext that the contract is null because, according to the rules of the institution, the whole community was not consulted about the purchase and Cardinal Taschereau did not ratify it, though the deed was signed by the lady superior and five other nuns composing her advisory council. The action has aroused considerable feeling among Roman Catholics, who deplore the proceedings.

THE pope's latest encyclical is addressed to the bishops of Italy. Its contents hav only just been made known to the public. The holy father refers to the many attacks which hav been made on the church of late years and draws special attention to the homage which has been paid to the Agnostic, Giordano Bruno. Then, speaking of the dangers of Socialism, he says that, owing to the strength of its organization, it can only be successfully opposed by a thorough union of all the conservativ elements of society, and that true religion is the best rampart against the fury of lawless mobs. "Enmity toward the holy see," he continues, "is fraught with the greatest dangers for Italy. The result will be a lack of harmony between the Italian officials and the true Italian Catholics. From this discord will ensue a prolonged religious war, which is bound to prove hurtful to the public weal. Moreover, this conflict will not only deprive Italy of the prestige which she has acquired through her pacific relations with the pontificate, but it will also alienate from her the Catholics of the entire world. Nay, it may at any moment giv her enemies a pretext to take up arms." The pope concludes by saying that two governments are impossible at Rome, and that Rome ought to be given back to the pope if the world wishes the holy see to exercise as heretofore its influence for good.

What Are They Driving At?

Can anyone tell what the National Reform Association is aiming at, when it states in the second article of its constitution that "The object of this society shall be to maintain existing Christian features in the American government, . . . and to secure such an amendment to the Constitution of the United States as will declare the nation's allegiance to Jesus Christ and its acceptance of the moral laws of the Christian religion; and so indicate that this is a Christian nation, and to place all the Christian laws, institutions, and usages of our government on an undeniable legal basis in the fundamental law of the land?"

We will pass over, for want of space, any reference to "existing Christian features in the American government," whatever they may be, and call the reader's attention to the proposed amendment, which is to "declare the nation's allegiance to Jesus Christ and its acceptance of the moral laws of the Christian religion," i.e., that the nation shall "declare its acceptance of the moral laws of the Christian religion." Now, what are the moral laws here referred to? Evidently the Ten Commandments—or rather I should say the latter six of the ten—for it will hardly be contended that the first four, which relate to the worship, reverence, and honor of God, can be called moral laws; for they are more properly religious principles or laws. But these parties doubtless mean to include the whole ten, under the head of moral laws of the Christian religion. But these moral laws, as we will contend for the argument's sake, are to be "placed upon an undeniable legal basis," i e., are to be made "the fundamental law of the land." Now, we will understand that law requires penalty, otherwise it would not be law, but counsel or advice. Blackstone asserts that "Where rewards are proposed, as well as punishments threatened, the obligation of the law seems chiefly to consist in the penalty; for rewards in their nature can only persuade and allure. Nothing is compulsory but punishment." Now, we all know that it is the nature or the true character of law to be compulsory. And without punishment law cannot exist—that is, it is not law, but advice or recommendation. Now, one of the moral laws is an operation of the mind only. And how the executors of the moral law, or "the fundamental law of the land," are going to discover the violators of that item of law, will be a tough question to settle. They will require a faculty that they claim is one of the attributes of the deity—that is, the power to discern the thoughts of the heart. I refer to the law which says, "Thou shalt not covet." But I may be answered that covetousness can be discovered by the act of the one who covets, in stealing the thing coveted, or getting unlawful possession of it in some way; as, for instance, a man covets another man's horse, which he finally steals. But he then breaks another law, which says, "Thou shalt not steal," and the law of the land in every state already forbids that, and thus far has already adopted the moral law. Or if the covetous man desires his neighbor's wife and succeeds in seducing her, he breaks another law of the land, which says, as does the moral law, "Thou shalt not commit adultery." But for the thought of the heart, wherein covetousness finds its seat, who can discover the transgressor and punish him? The moral law says, "Thou shalt not commit adultery," but Christ adds to that law, and makes a part of it, this sentiment, namely, "He that lusts after a woman commits adultery." Will not our law executors be kept busy in detecting the sinners in this direction? And may not the blow fall in unexpected quarters? May it not reach many of the law-makers? Hatred is added by Christ to the original moral statute against murder. Mormon haters, Jew haters, Infidel haters, among Protestants and Catholics, must be punished, but who among the clergy can cast the first stone at the sinner in this direction? And Protestants hate Catholics—at least multitudes do, as do multitudes of Catholics hate Protestants.

But is it the idea to enforce these moral principles so much as it is to compel the acknowledgment of "allegiance to Jesus Christ?" This is emphatically declared to be the intention of the amendment. But can anyone declare allegiance to Jesus Christ and not submit to his laws, observe his institutions and ordinances, and practice the usages that he has appointed, and which his disciples of former days obeyed, or honored, or observed? Now, Christian laws, institutions, and usages are those which belong exclusivly to the Christian religion, or those that are particularly and exclusivly a part of Christianity. To say that these "laws, institutions, and usages" refer to those which were peculiar to the Mosaic economy, such as circumcision, sacrificial offerings of bulls, goats, lambs, etc., and divers washings, etc., will be denied most energetically by these National Reformers, for to a man they declare that these are all "done away," "blotted out," "nailed to the cross," etc. They cannot call the moral law or Ten Commandments "Christian laws, institutions, and usages," for two reasons: 1. There is but one of the ten that could be called an "institution" (even if that could properly be so called), and that is the Fourth Commandment relating to the Sabbath day. And no "usages" are found in the "moral law" so called. 2. If they were Christian law, etc., then these National Reformers must admit that Christianity began with Moses on Mount Sinai, and not with Christ in Galilee. But they stoutly affirm that Christianity began with Christ (and they must say so to tell the truth). And if so, then "Christian laws, institutions, and usages" are those that belong particularly and peculiarly to Christianity or the religion established by Christ. Is not this logical and fair? Is it not the simple truth? No one can deny it. What then? Why, that the "laws, institutions, and usages" referred to that are to be "placed upon an undeniable legal basis in the fundamental law of the land" are such laws and institutions and usages as Jesus Christ enacted, instituted, and practiced. Now, I cannot take space to refer to all the laws that he gave, so I will refer to one only, but a prominent one, however. He commanded thus: "Go ye into all the world and preach the gospel to every creature." This command affects a certain class only—that is, the ministry.

It reads in another place thus: "Go, and teach all nations"—i.e., teach the gospel—"baptizing them in the name of the Father, and of the Son, and of the Holy Ghost." Now, right here we must stop and ask a pertinent question. It is this, Must they baptize the people against their will, or baptize only those who are willing? The whole question at issue hangs on the answer. If against their will, will it be by using physical force, or by the threatening of fine or imprisonment, or stripes, or confiscation of property, or disfranchisement, or some other form of punishment? If by physical or brute force, can God accept such baptism? Never. Would not Christianity be abhorred by every free and thoughtful mind? Would it not be resisted unto death in a multitude of cases? If men and women are baptized through pecuniary loss, or physical pain, or loss of citizenship, would not their act be hypocritical, unless performed under protest? And in either case it would be unacceptable to God. But on the other hand—now mark it—if only those who are willing are baptized, and thus freedom of will and action and freedom of conscience is allowed on this question, or as regards this law, which is so important, as all who profess to believe the Bible must admit, and if God approves of this liberty of conscience, will, and action, then it must be allowed by man, and will be allowed of God in regard to other laws, less directly connected with a man's salvation; and particularly ought liberty be allowed on the Sabbath question, as the observance of this day of rest seems to concern a man's physical well-being more than his spiritual necessities. But admitting that force is used, or people are coerced through fear of physical suffering or pecuniary loss, or loss of civil rights, etc., to be baptized, what form of baptism shall be the one adopted? Now, here will come a home question—and if Infidels shall suffer, so shall either one of two classes of religionists be made to violate their conscience—Shall Congress decide that sprinkling a drop or two of water on the head is baptism, and shall be the mode adopted? What will the two million (at least) of believers in immersion alone, as the true baptism, do? They will hav to submit, or suffer the penalty, whatever it may be. If they submit through fear of punishment, they are cowards or hypocrits; if they are physically forced to submit, they can quiet their conscience, but will they ever consider themselvs baptized by an act which, in their very souls, they believe is in no sense baptism? It will not be so bad on the other side, i.e., if immersion is made the national mode, for about all sprinklers concede immersion to be valid baptism, but they will demur when called upon to be immersed, for they think that they hav been baptized by an equally valid form, i.e., by sprinkling. Now, baptism is one of the acknowledged "Christian institutions," and must be made obligatory upon all citizens and inhabitants of the land, and it will be so declared when this religious amendment is adopted. And some mode must be made the national form of administering the ordinance or institution. And Congress will hav a fine time in settling a question that the religious world hav been disputing about for the past three hundred years at least, and upon which they hav divided into sects, and because of which they will not fellowship each other, or, at least, some will not eat the sacrament with those not immersed. Can a Congress be elected that can settle this question? Not until the Catholics are strong enough to aid the sprinklers in every Congressional district to elect those who will vote for sprinkling. But the idea of an arm of a secular government deciding upon a disputed theological question!

But would it be a secular government, when that and similar steps are taken? Of course it would not be, but it would be a religio-political government, if not really a theocracy, and therefore no longer a republic. And when it becomes a theocracy, Infidels will be disfranchised. That this is contemplated, we will now prove. First, I will quote from the Christian Statesman, the organ of the National Reform party, Oct. 2, 1884, "Giv all men to understand that this is a Christian nation; and that believing that without Christianity we perish, we must maintain by all right means our Christian character. Insert this character in our Constitution." Again, "Enforce upon all who come among us the laws of Christian morality." Now, what does enforce mean? It means to force; to constrain; to compel; to execute with vigor. And now what shall be the penalty to be inflicted upon the disobedient, that is, those who refuse to obey the laws of "Christian morality"—not Mosaic laws of morality, bear in mind, but the Christian laws, institutions, and usages, that is, baptism, the Lord's Supper, or eucharist, public worship, prayers, etc., and such of the Ten Commandments as are by them incorporated into the Christian faith? And these commandments that would be incorporated would be those that are not already in force in every state and territory in the Union, such as the laws against stealing, perjury, murder, and adultery. They would be, of course, those not already enacted in statutes by the states or general government, such as the commandment requiring the acknowledgment of God or Jehovah; the law against making and bowing down to images; the laws against profane swearing; against Sabbath breaking, and dishonoring of parents. But I insist, and insist in most emphatic terms, that the Christian laws and institutions and usages are such as acknowledging Jesus Christ as king; faith in him as the son of God, as the savior of the world, as the only mediator, etc. Repentance, baptism, the partaking of the sacrament, attendance at church, and support of the ministry, etc., these are all contemplated, and are included in the "Christian laws, institutions, and usages" to be enforced; and I ask again, what is the penalty for disobedience? In the Christian Statesman of Nov. 1, 1883, this sentiment is found, viz., "What effect would the adoption of the Christian amendment, together with the proposed changes in the Constitution, hav upon those who deny that God is the sovereign, Christ the ruler, and the Bible the law? This brings up the conscience question at once. . . . The classes who would object are, as THE TRUTH SEEKER has said, Jews, Infidels, Atheists, and others. These classes are perfectly satisfied with the Constitution as it is. How would they stand toward it if it recognized the authority of our Lord Jesus Christ? To be perfectly plain, I believe that the existence of a Christian Constitution would disfranchise every logically consistent Infidel." There you hav it, Mr. Infidel. These people propose and deliberately intend to deprive you, and not only you but Jews and others, yea, all others who dissent to their proposed laws, institutions, and usages, of the inestimable boon of citizenship in this glorious (at present) republic; to save which from destruction many thousands of dissenters, Jews, and Infidels—and Atheists even—risked their lives, and lost, or many of them did, legs and arms and health; and for the salvation of which republic the husbands, fathers, brothers, and sons of thousands of Freethinking and dissenting women lost their lives; and to save which countless millions of dollars were freely spent. This boon for which our forefathers fought and bled, and for which many died, is to be snatched from us, by these blinded religious zealots, because we may object to some or all of their so called Christian laws, institutions, and usages, many of which cannot be sustained by the Bible, which they pretend to so much reverence. I am a Christian minister; I believe in the one living and true God; I acknowledge Jesus Christ as the only begotten son of God, and the savior of the world, and as the only mediator between God and man; I believe in the gospel of faith, repentance, baptism by immersion; I believe in the holy spirit as a comforter and guide; I believe in the resurrection of the dead and in eternal judgment (but not in eternal suffering), but I do not, I cannot, and I will not, so help me God, accept the so-called orthodox idea of the godhead, nor of their popish doctrin of infant sprinkling, absurdly called baptism, nor their dogma of eternal torment and other unscriptural theories; for judging from the names of most of the chief men of this National Reform party and the churches which are most prominently represented in it, and knowing what the creeds of these men and churches are, I know that I cannot conscientiously indorse many of their definitions of "Christian laws, institutions, and usages," because, simply, I am confident that they are unscriptural, and many of them illogical.

Do these fanatics suppose that we who are more consistent and firmer believers in Bible Christianity than most of them are, will tamely submit to be deprived of citizenship because we cannot agree with their dogmas? My ancestors fought under Washington at Germantown, Brandywine, and elsewhere, and endured with him the rigors of the winter at Valley Forge. Physical disqualifications prevented me in three different attempts from taking activ part in the war for the Union, and I do not propose to be deprived of citizenship without a struggle, and I think there are several hundred thousand more who hav the same determination. If a struggle for civil and religious liberty comes, it will be a battle forced on Jews, Infidels, and "others," and we belong to that class, for we are not Jews, Infidels, Atheists, nor National Reformers. But let us hope of these Reformers that the eyes of their understanding may be opened in time to see where the current of their madness and folly is fast drifting them, even to the whirlpool of a fierce and relentless civil war from which Protestantism will emerge crestfallen and crushed, rendered so helpless that Rome, who has simply looked on an interested yet unsympathetic spectator, will quietly assume the reins of government in the whole country, and finding the Constitution committed to the enforcement of the laws, institutions, and usages of the Christian religion, will speedily change them to suit her interpretation of the Christian religion, and then Protestants will hav to swallow their own medicin, bitter as it may and will be.

Now, why is it that the Catholic church looks on so complacently, and even offers its aid and sympathy to this movement to amend the Constitution and make the Christian religion the national spouse, when it knows that some of her cherished traditions will be struck at and some of her usages positivly prohibited? Now I can tell your readers just why it is. But let me say first, do not be deceived with the idea that Rome has changed and has become more liberal and tolerant. That is all bosh and the country will find it so. It cannot be so under the rulership of an Italian pope and a Jesuit. It might be if Cardinal Gibbons was chosen pope, which is not probable. No; the true reason why this movement is indorsed by that church is, because it firmly and not unreasonably believes that by the time this constitutional change is made and decision reached by Congress as to what "Christian laws, institutions, and usages" shall be made legal and enforced, they (the church of Rome) will be strong enough in numbers in the United States to either prevent Congressmen from being chosen who will be inimical to Romish interests, or they will in all quarters choose men who will incorporate positiv Romish laws, institutions, and usages into the fundamental laws of the land. The sacred college of cardinals at Rome are smiling broadly, and rubbing their hands with glee, at the sight of the Protestants playing so unwittingly into their hands. Why should they not rejoice, when they know that their church can never be pushed to the front and made the nation's faith, or receive especial governmental aid, so long as the Constitution remains as it is? Therefore, if it can be altered by others in such a way that it can be employed after a while to the great and sole advantage of their church, without exciting suspicion and alarm at their intentions, they can well afford to giv the National Reform movement their sympathy and aid, knowing at the same time that these Reformers really mean to put the brakes on them as well as on Jews and Infidels and "others;" but they expect to "turn the tables" on the Reformers after a while, and they surely will. And what need Jews, Infidels, Atheists, and others care, for they will receive as much mercy at the hands of the Catholic church as they will at the hands of the National Reform party, if not more? The church of Rome of course wants the Constitution changed, so that it will permit an establishment of religion, or the establishment of a national religion, but it well knows that it would not do to undertake to advocate the change in the interest of that church, for then Protestants would heartily unite with "Jews, Infidels, Atheists, and others," to keep the Constitution as it is, but if they can quietly aid these Reformers to do their work, and use them as cats-paws to pull their chestnuts out of the fire, they of course will cheerfully do it, but keeping in mind all the time the one sole object—the interests of the church of Rome, no matter at what cost (to others especially). But we hav not done with Christian laws and institutions. There is another institution called the Lord's Supper which will be contended for, and this the National Reformers and Catholics cannot at all agree upon, but they can compromise for awhile.

But the point I wish to make is, that baptism and the Lord's Supper may form a "mark"—one, that of sprinkling, being on the forehead; the other, taking of the bread and wine, will be a "mark" in the right hand, with the hand of fellowship given at the same time. Another and a most important point is, that these "institutions" will hav to be observed by all. But here comes a grand difficulty, and it is this, viz: These Reformers will not permit baptism to be performed or the Lord's Supper to be partaken of except upon a public profession of faith in Christ and an open statement on the part of the applicant for these church favors that he has received "remission of sins" and the "baptism of the Holy Spirit" and is a "child of God" and a "truly converted" person. He must make some such confession or declaration. If it is an honest, genuin statement, all right. But suppose it is made under restraint, or made through fear of punishment, loss of property, loss of citizenship, etc.? What then? Is it not lying? Is it not hypocrisy? Is it not blasphemy? Is it not sinning against the Holy Ghost? These Reformers will all say that if the above declarations are made falsely, and knowingly so, it would be all that. Yet they propose to compel people to thus lie and act the hypocrit, and to thus blaspheme and sin, by requiring them to be baptized (as they would call it), and by requiring them to openly profess faith in Christ, repentance, remission of sins, birth of the Holy Spirit, change of heart, etc., before they could be baptized. The next thing after baptism would be reception into the church by the right hand of fellowship being given to the candidate. The next thing would be the continual or regular attendance at church. The next thing would be the regular systematic giving of money for the support of the minister and foreign missions, and to build new and costly edifices, etc. And now, may it not be asked if the real object of all this effort to make this a Christian nation, by compelling everybody to make an open profession of Christianity, is not to fill up the churches and make the minister's salary sure? Are not selfish, sordid, mercenary motivs at the bottom of all this attempt to Christianize this nation? Is not pride, love of ease and love of power, love of popularity and love of money, the true foundation of this religious amendment movement? If not with the masses, is it not the case with the leaders, or many of them, at least? But they will be grievously mistaken—they will neither fill their churches nor their purses by this method. They will, however, deplete both in the end. They are sowing to the wind, they will reap the whirlwind. Instead of a harvest of souls and greenbacks they will gather dragon's teeth in the terrible by and by. We think the answer to our question, "What are they driving at?" is, they are aiming at the destruction of the liberty, the peace, the prosperity, and continuity of the republic, and that for purely selfish and ignoble purposes.

Items of Foreign Freethought News.

In our last week's Freethought News it was stated through a typographical error that the income of the Society of Holy Childhood was in 1888, 12,966 francs. It should hav been 912,966 francs. Let us giv the scarlet lady her due.

The Federation of French Freethought Societies is steadily growing. During the month of September two new societies were added, besides several individual members, among whom there were three Parisian aldermen.—Bulletin Mensuelle.

In Frankfurt a. M. the Social Democratic editor Hoch has been arrested for offense given to the majesty and God.—Freiheit. Some German authorities must hav séances with their God; how can they otherwise know that his feelings hav been hurt?

The agitation tending to a leaving of the state church in a body is spreading over Germany. Dr. Rüger has delivered lectures in several cities and thereby created a great scare among the "shepherds," who are causing circulars to be distributed calling upon the sheep to organize "men-societies [women cannot be intrusted with such matters] for the preservation of the religious and worldly peace of society."—Freireligiöses Sonntags Blatt. Even the thoroughgoing Freethinker loves peace, but not the peace of slavery. Break the chains!

A clerical reaction, or, less dreadful, a fishing for orthodox votes at the coming election, has induced President Carnot, who is a Freethinker, to start a small flirtation with the holy mother church. He has restored the mummery called the Mass of the Cardinals at the National Lyceum, which his predecessor prohibited. Benedictines, Capucines, nuns of various orders—all these clerical loafers hav returned, to begin anew their conspiracies against the republic.—La Verité. What will the shade of Paul Bert say? It behooves the French Freethinkers to be on the alert now. Organize!

In the smaller cities of Belgium the climate is very unhealthy not alone for Freethinkers, but even for ordinary individuals possessing a grain of common sense. A policeman in the city of Meenin was careless enough to state, in a restaurant, that Virgin Mary was mother to divers other youngsters besides Jesus, and when contradicted he backed up his statement with Bible quotations. That was too much for the priest-ridden city fathers, and on instigation of the clergy ten striking arguments were applied upon the heretic's back with a whip. The forcible character of the clerical arguments no doubt convinced the sinner that teaching theology was not his vocation.—De Voorwacht.

Our Swedish friends are, in spite of a section 13, not idle. Mr. Berghell's sentence of three months' imprisonment for blasphemy by the Jönköping city court has been sustained by Göta Hofrätt, but as there is a supreme court and a king left, we hope he will escape. Although the Swedish Freethinkers hav contributed freely and largely to his defense, yet the defense fund was not very great, and in Sweden as everywhere else money is required. Let us help our brethren. There are plenty of Scandinavians here in the United States who cannot read English; send them Fritänkaren for a year. It will giv their orthodoxy a good shaking, and at the same time help our transatlantic friends. It is but $1 a year. Address your letter to Captain Thomson, Bryggaregatan 25, Stockholm.

The Roman Catholic paper El Bandere Catolico, published at Madrid, rejoices over the attitude of President Carnot and the defeat of the Liberal party in Spain. The quantity of editorial gush being rather great, we will confine ourselvs to the following, quite characteristic, extract: "Thanks be to God, we are returning to the times when those who promulgate false, heretical opinions are exemplarily punished. The re-establishment of the Inquisition appears in the near future. Let her actions be more shining and teeming in results than they were in years of the past! Our Catholic heart is overflowing with faith and zeal; the immense joy felt by us from contemplating the results of our actual campaign surpasses all imagination. What a treat will it not be for us to behold our enemies writhing in the flames of the Inquisition!" If we in the year of the world's curse 1890 are treated to such sentiments, what must the loving spirit of Christianity hav been when she stood at the pinnacle of her power?

When the Swedish authorities framed section 13 in the law for "preservation of order in the cities of the land," they evidently intended to produce a modern illustration of the infamous "peace reigns at Warsaw." According to section 13, it is prohibited Miss Hilda Ekelöf to start a meeting where subjects like, The Bible is a Divinely Inspired Book, Morality depends upon Christianity, were to be defended. A social gathering in Helsingborg is contrary to section 13, when a man like Victor Lennstrand is to participate; section 13 prohibits lectures by Lennstrand on subjects unknown to the authorities; it prohibits the reading of a chapter of the Bible without comments; it punishes the man who finishes a lecture at 7 A.M. in place of 8 A.M. as he had notified the Visby authorities he would; in Eskildstuna and Visby it prohibits lectures, no matter what the subject may be; it condemns a man to a fine of five crowns for not informing the authorities in time that he intends to lecture (in two instances the announcement was given eighty hours before the meeting was held); in Stockholm it fines a man fifty crowns for daring to accept an invitation to spend an evening, without informing the police, with friends in the private home of one of them; it prohibits the public reading of a lecture deemed blasphemous by sky-pilots and a bigoted little king and his creatures, and yet the same lecture is pronounced all right by a jury and is for sale in most bookstores. We would like to know wherein consists the right of free speech and meeting in Sweden. GUSTAVE NELSON.

THOUGH not without a bitter resistance on the part of the clergy, men began to think that pestilences are not punishments inflicted by God on society for its religious shortcomings, but the physical consequences of filth and wretchedness; that the proper mode of avoiding them is not by praying to the saints, but by insuring personal and municipal cleanliness. In the twelfth century it was found necessary to pave the streets of Paris, the stench in them was so dreadful. At once dysenteries and spotted fever diminished; a sanitary condition approaching that of the Moorish cities of Spain, which had been paved for centuries, was attained. In that now beautiful metropolis it was forbidden to keep swine, an ordinance resented by the monks of the abbey of St. Anthony, who demanded that the pigs of that saint should go where they chose; the government was obliged to compromise the matter by requiring that bells should be fastened to the animals' necks. King Philip, the son of Louis the Fat, had been killed by his horse stumbling over a sow. Prohibitions were published against throwing slops out of the windows. In 1870 an eye-witness, the author of this book, at the close of the pontifical rule in Rome, found that, in walking the ordure-defiled streets of that city, it was more necessary to inspect the earth than to contemplate the heavens, in order to preserve personal purity.—Professor Draper.

THE conception of witchcraft, which had existed in England from the earliest period, assumed for the first time a certain prominence amid the religious terrorism of the Reformation; its importance gradually increased as the trials and executions directed public attention to the subject; and it, at last, reached its climax under the gloomy theology of the Puritans.—Lecky.

The Fourteenth Annual Congress of The American Secular Union.

The Freethinkers of Portsmouth, Ohio, deserve a great deal of credit for their efforts for the fourteenth annual Congress of the American Secular Union. The Portsmouth Secular Union is young, but its energy has been fully demonstrated. Its secretary, W. S. Andres, is what the Westerners call a hustler, and, aided by the president, Mr. J. L. Treuthart, he gave the speakers the largest audiences that ever attended a Secular Union congress, except the audiences that greeted Colonel Ingersoll whenever he was able to be present. The Opera House in which the sessions were held is a large building and a thousand people barely fill it. At the evening sessions, when speeches were on the program, it was crowded, as it was all day Sunday. The stage was prettily decorated with flags and banners and portraits of prominent men—Grant, Garfield, and others—a portrait of Colonel Ingersoll occupying the center position. The music was excellent, and the local press were respectfully friendly, the Blade warmly and the Times discreetly so. With the exception of the ministers, and the proprietor of the Biggs House, where the visitors made their headquarters, who gave the delegates more spiritual than material food, the citizens of Portsmouth greeted the Secularists very cordially, though they didn't quite understand what the heretics were driving at. However, they found that out before the Congress closed.

When the Congress opened on Friday evening, besides the life members and delegates present there were visiting Liberals from many points. S. W. Devenbaugh, of Brimfield, Ind., and John Downs, of Steubenville, Ohio, were on hand, as they hav been for many consecutiv congresses. Voltairine de Cleyre and Paul Carus, editor of the Open Court, came from Chicago. D. H. Smith and R. G. Smith, of Alliance, Ohio, were present to take L. K. Washburn in tow and keep him busy lecturing for a week when the Congress closed. G. B. Van Ess dropped in from Mechanicsburg, Ohio, to pay up his subscription and see the Editor of THE TRUTH SEEKER. S. M. Bower came down from North Baltimore, and there were also Mrs. Ames, of Chicago, W. W. Wilson and daughter, of Spiceland, Ind.; J. M. Shank, of Hurricane, W. Va.; S. S. Dean, Mrs. F. D. Dean, and Miss A. M. Dean, who came a long distance to see Mr. Washburn; Ralph Taylor; Geo. E. Light, president of the Eureka Heating and Ventilating Co., with a friend who looks at Heston's pictures every week; S. D. Moore, of Adrian, Mich.; Mrs. Lyndall, and a great many others.

The first thing on the program Friday evening was music by Miss Sarah Stevens, a young lady of beauty and skill, and Messrs. White and Miller, who possessed the same attributes with variations. Throughout the Congress they made harmony for the delegates, and sometimes it was badly needed. The hall was well filled to hear their townsman, J. L. Treuthart, welcome his fellow-Freethinkers. He began by paying compliments to the president of the Union, and the president's home city, and referred to the secretary in a graceful way, as became both parties. The Portsmouth Union, he said, welcomed the Congress as a child receives a visit of a parent. There was also a large public sentiment favoring the objects of the Union, foremost in promoting which were the newspaper men. This sentiment was an indication of the progress of the age, when newspapers can afford to tell the truth. The business men of the town also realized that Portsmouth was outgrowing the narrowness that might hav been once charged to it. He also welcomed the Union on behalf of the school-children who were entitled to know that facts never contradict truth. For two thousand years the astronomers had been making almanacs, and calculating eclipses and other movements of the heavenly bodies. What would become of astronomy, he asked, if some Joshua could take hold of the spokes of the wheel of time and stop the revolution of the earth?

At the conclusion of Mr. Treuthart's address, Judge F. C. Searl, of Portsmouth, read a poem. The judge is a pantheistical Deist, and his poem expressed his sentiments. It is long, but we will print it shortly. When he had finished President Westbrook thanked the Portsmouth Union for its splendid welcome. When he reflected that the local Union was only six months old he was astonished at its energy. In Methodism new converts were placed on probation, but he thought the Portsmouth Secular Union could be taken at once into full connection. In response to the compliments paid his city he referred to Girard College, and said the case against the Christians who are perverting that magnificent charity is under way. The sixteen hundred orphans there were not getting the kind of education Girard intended they should. They were to be taught the principles of the purest morality, but instead were indoctrinated by lay Christians who went there to preach. The Secular Union was engaged in preparing a Manual of Morals, and the thousand dollars prize for the best book on the subject would probably be awarded about Christmas.

The Congress had not met to discuss theology, but to protest against the union of church and state. The Union had a great variety of membership—Spiritualists, Materialists, Agnostics, Deists, Atheists, but all united in opposing the connection between the government and the church. He thanked the Secular Union, the press, and the people of Portsmouth for their hospitality.

Four manly young fellows—Messrs. Miller, Rice, Kennedy, and Adams—with guitars hung to their necks by red ribbons, then rendered "The Spanish Students," and tried to retire, but the audience objected and compelled them to repeat. When they finally got away, Miss Ida Craddock, secretary of the Union, read her address, from which we take a few paragraphs. Her ideas are worthy to be practicalized, and her recommendation of the pansy as a distinct but unobtrusiv badge, following the example of our brethren of France, has reason in it. She said:

MR. PRESIDENT, MEMBERS OF THE AMERICAN SECULAR UNION, AND FRIENDS: I hav been asked to speak to you tonight on methods of extending our work. I will, therefore, not occupy your time with any discussion of our Nine Demands; nor will I make any special appeal to you on the necessity for union among Liberals. We hav done that already by circular. Besides, I know that you hope for more thorough organization, or you would not be here tonight.

I want to take this opportunity of thanking my fellow-members for their uniform kindness and patience with me during this year of my apprenticeship and especially for the many encouraging letters sent me as I began to grow up to the work. Dear friends, you who hav dropped in just a word or two of sympathy, of counsel or encouragement, in your letters, you will never know how often you hav lightened the labor of the whole day for me by your friendly interest.

Before entering on the business of my address, I had hoped to say something to those of our Liberal friends who are so interested in the labor question as to feel that even the cause of the American Secular Union is dwarfed before it. I had hoped to show them the importance of our work as a means to the end of industrial reform. I had hoped to show them that, before industrial reform of any sort can be accomplished on a sure basis—whether Socialistic or individualistic, or, as is most likely, on a compromise of the two—we must make it impossible for any churchly power to get its grip on the throat of the state. But our president has warned me to confine myself strictly to methods of organization to-night.

At this time the American Secular Union is confronted with two distinct lines of policy from which to choose. One is the policy which it has steadily maintained during the past year, of strict non-partisanship in religious matters, and open-handed hospitality to all who believe in total separation of church and state, whether the applicant for membership be Deist or Atheist, Freethinker or churchman.

The other policy looks further than the mere separation of church and state. It demands perpetual and unflinching hostility to the Christian religion, and an aggressiv warfare whose aim is finally to cripple the church, if not to kill it off entirely.

One important means of extending our work has been agitated considerably in the Liberal papers of late—the formation of a lecture bureau.

Another matter which I hope to hear discussed to-morrow, and to which I can spare but a brief passing notice, is the idea of a mutual aid society among Liberals, under the auspices and fostering care of the American Secular Union, and pledged in turn to spread our principles everywhere, to circulate our literature, and to win fresh recruits to our ranks. Such a society, if properly managed, could be made a powerful engin for the good cause.

Another method of extending our work is by securing alliances with organizations which are striving for religious liberty; and this is something in which all Liberals should help, no matter how those other organizations may differ from us in the matter of greater conservatism or greater radicalism. Our constitution provides a welcome for all auxiliaries who will accept the Nine Demands, no matter what principles they may hold in addition. Among others, there occur to me two societies whom I should like to see our allies. One is the Woman's National Liberal Union. Its platform, which denounces the church as "that ever most unscrupulous enemy of freedom," is far more radical than ours, which strictly holds to non-partisanship in religious matters; and yet there is every reason why a union of that society with ours would be of advantage to both—especially when it is remembered that the American Secular Union requires of its auxiliaries nothing but coöperation in the work so dear to us all, and that it leaves them perfectly free in other matters. The Woman's National Liberal Union is a noble movement; and I trust that the day will come when that society will stand foremost in the ranks of the great army of the American Secular Union.

Another society whose coöperation, it occurs to me, would be a good thing, is the National Religious Liberty Association of the Seventh Day Adventists. These people, like ourselvs, protest against the bigotry which would compel us all to observe Sunday in a religious way, and which already makes it a penal offense, in many places, to do an honest day's work or to indulge in such innocent recreation as ball-playing on that day. Unlike ourselvs, they protest because they believe in keeping Saturday as a Sabbath—although they hav never yet advocated enforcing its observance on other people. Unlike ourselvs, their declaration of principles contains a religious bias. But upon the work of total separation of church and state we stand shoulder to shoulder; and it does seem a pity that we should not join forces in behalf of this great principle of religious liberty, even though we work from different motivs—they from the desire to uphold their special Christian doctrin, we to uphold the principles of Freethought. Dear friends, can we not bring about an alliance in this direction also?

But my great concern is: How shall we reach the young? How shall we save them from falling into that religious superstition which puts the cross higher than their moral duty as good citizens, and which teaches them to consider what the church sneeringly calls "mere morality" as of little account in the sight of the deity whom they worship? How shall we fire them with the desire to make a heroic stand against the iniquitous union of church and state? How shall we fit them to take the vacant places in the Liberal ranks—places left vacant almost monthly by the death of our gray-haired veterans?

One means of reaching the young, it seems to me, is through our Liberal papers. THE TRUTH SEEKER has already made a move in this direction, with its bright and pleasant "Children's Corner," so ably conducted by Miss Susan Wixon. I hav noticed in this department more than one crude, childish letter, evidently written in an outgush of youthful Liberalism, which has received, in a footnote by Miss Wixon, a few judicious and kindly comments which cannot fail to strengthen the chain between the child's heart and the Liberal cause. The Investigator, too, has a warm spot in its heart for the children, and never fails to remember them with well-chosen and effectiv selections. But even these, with some scattered efforts by other papers, are not sufficient. They are a beginning; but we need more.

Another means—which at first may seem insignificant—is the adoption of a universal badge by all Liberals, old and young—a badge which shall be simple, inexpensiv, easily obtained, and which can be made as conspicuous or as modest as the taste of the wearer may dictate. The Freethinkers of France hav already adopted the pansy as a symbol of Freethought, and they propose to recommend this at a coming international conference of Freethinkers. The word "pansy," as you are doubtless aware, comes from the French word "pensée," which means "thought," and there thus seems a fitness in its adoption as a symbol of Freethought. It is a flower which is easily raised in pots or window-boxes; it occurs in a variety of colors; it is effectiv as a decoration on ribbons or banners; and last, but not least, it has been duplicated in all sorts of tiny and inexpensiv pins, suitable for gentlemen's badge-pins—some of them retailing as low as three cents in the trimming stores. Were the pansy adopted by Freethinkers as a universal badge, there is no reason why the poorest of us might not display the Freethought symbol at all times in a suitable and modest way. Think what it would mean to our ecclesiastical opponents to meet the pansy at every turn, as they certainly would, for the people in the United States who do not really believe in the church, and who do really believe in freedom of thought, vastly outnumber the church people. Do you doubt it? Here are some figures by churchmen themselvs:

Rev. Dr. T. P. Stevenson, editor of the Christian Statesman, in an address this summer at Lakeside, O., stated that Christians had every reason to congratulate themselvs, as far as numbers go. He stated, as an encouragement to his hearers, that "one person in every five professes the religion of Jesus." Remember that this is the estimate of one of our leading opponents, a gentleman every way qualified to speak with authority on the subject, and remember also that he was turning the fair side to London when he made that remark. It is but right to add that he felt justified in assuming a larger proportion of those attached to the church, were the relativs and dependants taken into account. And, after roughly estimating these at forty-five millions, he adds, exultingly: "Imperfect as is the organization of the church on account of her sectarian divisions, the remaining twenty millions hav no organization to compare with it. Nor hav they," he goes on still more exultingly, "intelligence or social influence, or the capacity for united effort, or any other element of social preponderance at all in equal measure with the followers of Christ." But we hav more definit figures from others.

In a little pamphlet entitled, "Dying at the Top," compiled by the Rev. Dr. Joseph Waddell Clokey, Presbyterian pastor in New Albany, Ind., I note the following:

"At the first convention of Christian Workers, held in Chicago, June, 1886, Rev. J. W. Weddell gave statistics showing the population of each of the wards in Chicago, and the number of churches in each ward. . . . Of the whole city he says: 'I simply get 650,000 population and 151 churches. In this population one in ten is a Christian, and we hav 65 000 Christians.' . . . Dr. Strong . . . quotes Dr. Dorchester as saying, that though the evangelical church membership in the country at large numbered in 1880 one in every five of the population of the United States, yet in Colorado it numbered but one in twenty; in Montana, but one in thirty-six; in Nevada, one in forty-six; in Wyoming, one in eighty-one; in Utah, one in 224; in New Mexico, one in 657; and in Arizona, one in 685. From such statistics as the above, which might be multiplied indefinitly, it is plain that the estimate which allows five young men out of every hundred for membership in the church is not too low. . . . Said the assistant secretary of the Young Men's Christian Association, in a city of 200,000 population: 'We hav 452 activ and associate members in our association, yet we cannot muster ten consecrated workers out of them all.' Here, then, we hav seventy-five out of every hundred young men in this country who do not attend church; ninety-five out of every hundred who do not belong to the church, and at least ninety-seven out of every hundred who are carrying no cross and bearing no burden for the redeeming of the world to Christ. . . . The young man of our day is substantially figured out as a factor in Christian evangelization, and, were the whole population to come to his standard, the church would almost be figured out as a factor in the molding influences of this great land. From the Christian standpoint, this state of things is simply astounding, and will stagger the most hopeful for a speedy evangelization of our country."

When Liberals can present something like an organized, united body to the world, we shall be surprised to see how the influential men of business will hasten to ally themselvs with us. And, as one means to a common open testimony of our principles, I recommend the adoption of this badge which I am wearing to-night, the pansy. I hope the time will come when the seal of the American Secular Union, which is now stamped on a gilt paper cut to resemble that old Christianized pagan symbol, the sun, shall be stamped, instead, upon the background of a huge golden pansy, and affixed to all charters issued to our auxiliaries. The great seal of a corporation which upholds total separation of church and state, backed by the symbol of Freethought—that would indeed be something to be proud of!

I come back now to the little people whom I had in mind when I began this subject. Personally,

I should like to see established throughout the country Freethought Sunday-schools, where children could be saved on Sunday from the allurements of the church. We may be quite sure that, if we don't look out for our children on that day, the church will draw them in. The greatest latitude should be allowed as to what ism these schools shall teach, according to the belief of the special set of people who are controling any special school. But upon three things all Freethought Sunday-schools should be united: 1. They should unite on the right of every human being to freedom in seeking the truth. 2. In order to secure that right, they should unite upon a total separation of church and state. 3. The American Secular Union should be held up to the children on every possible occasion as the great army which is contending for these things, and in which they should all be encouraged to enlist. The Nine Demands, in their modified form, should be as familiar to the Freethinker's child as are the creed and the so-called Lord's prayer to the churchman's; and the pansy (should we adopt this as our symbol) as familiar to the youthful Freethinker as is the cross to the young Christian.

I should like to hear songs sung at those Freethought Sunday schools, elevating in tone, inspiring in their music, and joined in by all the children with a will, such songs, for instance, as we find in the "Cosmian Hymn-Book," compiled by Mr. L. K. Washburn. Believe me, Liberals take the emotional side of our nature too little into account. In their passionate reverence for reason, reason, reason, pure and simple, they too frequently ignore the value of emotional culture to the growing soul. When I was a very little girl I had the good fortune to occasionally attend a Spiritualist lyceum under the superintendency of Mr. and Mrs. Dyott, of Philadelphia. I was too young to understand much of the doctrin taught; but the music—ah, how beautiful that was! How I used to enter into those songs with all my heart! And how many, many times during later years they hav come back to me in hours of despair or temptation, and, in spite of me, hav sung themselvs into my brain until the mists were cleared away! And I believe that I hav that Spiritualist Sunday-school to thank to-day for my being sufficiently radical to be admitted among you as one of your executiv officers.

And now, to briefly recapitulate possible methods which suggest themselvs to your secretary for extending our work:

We hav then, before all, the work of reaching the young. As means to this end, I hav suggested the establishment of Freethought Sunday-schools, supplemented by plenty of stirring music and by a series of international lessons; and, as another means of reaching the young, attractiv stories and essays inculcating the principles of Freethought, to be published in a special department in our Liberal newspapers; and last, and most important of all, the Freethought lyceum for girls and boys in their teens. So much for the work among the young. A second means for extending our work would be a mutual aid society for Liberals which shall at the same time be a missionary society for Freethought and a recruiting ground for the American Secular Union. Third, the establishment of a lecture bureau under the auspices of the American Secular Union. Fourth, overtures to secure alliances with other organizations who are working along the same line as ourselvs, i.e., total separation of church and state, even though they may be more radical or more conservativ than ourselvs. Fifth, and finally, the adoption of the symbol recommended by the Freethinkers of France, the pansy, as the universal symbol of Freethought and of the American Secular Union as well.

After more music the committee on credentials was appointed—Leonard Geiger, Lucy N. Colman, E. M. Macdonald. Then Voltairine de Cleyre recited a poem which would hav been considered incendiary in any other than poetic form. Then four jubilee singers, varying in color from oliv brown to midnight darkness, sang their peculiar melodies, and the audience with difficulty refrained from patting time.

SATURDAY MORNING.

The first thing Saturday morning was the report of the corresponding secretary, which Miss Craddock read as follows:

MR. PRESIDENT, FELLOW-MEMBERS, AND FRIENDS: The corresponding secretary of the American Secular Union submits herewith a brief summary of the work during the past year:

At the beginning of this term, the executiv committee, by order of the board of directors, announced that the first three of the "Nine Demands"—i.e., taxation of church property, secularization of the public schools, and no Sabbatarian laws—would be especially emphasized this year by pamphlets and otherwise, and they called upon our members everywhere to sustain this work. Many of our people hav responded nobly; but a large proportion hav remained unaccountably deaf to all appeals, whether by circular or through the newspapers. This is perhaps due in great part to our not having the correct addresses of many of our members. When the secretary entered upon her duties last November, there was no address book whatever in the possession of the society, save a fragmentary list which the president (while Miss Craddock was en route overland from California) had compiled as best he could from the backs of envelopes, torn bits of paper, and floating memoranda of various sorts. The secretary is gradually revising and adding to that list; but it is still far from being complete. We hav appealed by circular and through the papers to our members to send us their names and addresses; but this appeal has been heeded by very few. This fact has greatly hampered us in our work during the past year, and we hope that those members who hav not heard from us during this term will understand the cause.

The first of the points intended to be emphasized this year—the taxation of church property—has been met by the publication of a pamphlet on "Church Taxation" by Dr. R. B Westbrook. This pamphlet is now in its third thousand; but this represents but a small part of its circulation, as several newspapers hav published it entire (among them, one of the Philadelphia law magazines), so that its readers hav reached up into the tens of thousands. It has been well received everywhere, not only by Liberals but by many orthodox Protestants; and in many cases within the secretary's personal knowledge it has proved to be an entering wedge for the promulgation of our principles. Through the generosity of William Smith of Geneva, N Y., we were enabled to print the third edition; but this edition is nearly exhausted, and we shall soon need more. We hope that some other friend will be equally generous in providing for the fourth edition of this most valuable missionary pamphlet.

The second point—the secularization of the public school—will be probably met by the publication of a pamphlet, also by Dr. Westbrook. We hav not attempted to deal with the question of Sabbatarian laws this year, owing to lack of funds.

The manuscripts for the prize Manual are all in, and are being examined by a committee consisting of Dr. R. B. Westbrook, chairman, Dr. D. G. Brinton, Professor Felix Adler, Dr. Frances Emily White, and Ida C. Craddock. Owing to the scattered condition of the committee during the summer, and the fact that one of them is not expected back from Europe until this week, we shall be unable to make the award until about Christmas at the earliest. Among the many excellent manuscripts sent in, we hav already found several of an exceptionally high order; and we feel that the American Secular Union may congratulate itself upon being able to lay before the public a book which shall show beyond a doubt how morality can be taught in the public schools without religious dogma, and without the slightest irritation of either Christian or Agnostic sensitivness.

Owing to he scattered condition of the directors of the American Secular Union, it has been impossible, except once, to get even a quorum together, although we hav made several attempts. The executiv committee hav therefore been obliged, very much against their expectations, not only to execute, but to plan, nearly the entire policy for this past year. The responsibility on our shoulders has been great; and we trust that our friends will make due allowance.

The policy of strict non-sectarianism in religion, which we hav zealously striven to maintain during the past year, is already bearing good fruit, notwithstanding the gloomy prophecies of some few of our more radical friends through out the country. By adopting a moderate and persuasiv tone, we hav succeeded in getting our principles advertised prominently in several of the leading Christian papers of the country, thus bringing our ideas before thousands of church people who would not otherwise hav known how very reasonable are the demands we make; and we hav some more work of the same sort in hand now, of which we are not at liberty to speak.

We also may congratulate ourselvs on the presence at this Congress, by invitation, of the corresponding secretary of the National Religious Liberty Association, Prof. J O. Corliss. Whether the organization which this gentleman represents—an organization of the Seventh Day Adventists—will feel that they can consistently join us, remains to be seen; but at least we can rejoice in this evidence of good feeling between their organization and ours, working as we both are for religious liberty, even though it be from different motivs—they from devotion to Christianity, we from devotion to Freethought. We are all in the same boat, after all; we are all liable to the same persecution from Sunday bigots; and it benooves us to help one another in making a stand against the common enemy.

The lack of funds has hampered us seriously during the past year. Three separate months hav seen a deficit in the treasury. My brethren, these things ought not so to be. There should be a guarantee fund of $2.000 raised at the beginning of each fiscal year, to meet expenses of office rent, secretary's salary, publication of missionary pamphlets, and the principal outlay of the next Congress, so that we may not be compelled to trespass unduly on the generosity of the city which invites us, as delighted as they may be to do everything in their power for us. With such a guaranty fund, the American Secular Union could move forward along something like a definit line of work; and the stray dimes and dollars that come in during the year would do twice as much good as they do by the present skimping, hand-to-mouth way of providing for our current expenses.

We feel that we cannot close this report without a passing tribute to the generous hospitality of the city within whose gates we are now gathered, and especially to the untiring zeal of the local auxiliary here which has made this Congress possible. If this Congress be not only a success in the ordinary acceptation of the term, but a veritable turning-point in the history of our cause, the praise will be due before all to the little band of Portsmouth Secular Unionists who so nobly came forward with their pledge of $500 without waiting to know whether other Secularists throughout the country would help financially or not. At a time when the financial resources of the National Society were at the lowest ebb, they bravely flung themselvs into the breach; and it is the uplifted standard of the Portsmouth Secular Union under which the disheartened forces of our people are to-day rallying to victory. And so I close this report by saying, "All hail to the banner auxiliary of the United States, the Portsmouth Secular Union!" Respectfully submitted.

Portsmouth, O., Nov. 1, 1890.

President Westbrook said the secretary had been too modest. She was, he said, a most capable young woman, and half of what she had done did not appear in the report. Most of her time in the preceding fall and early winter had been occupied in finding out where the Union's friends were, but she had now a good list of the Liberals who supported the Union. They were paying only $100 a year office rent. All financial matters were kept in the most orderly manner, and Miss Craddock conducted the correspondence with distinguished ability.

Treasurer Mende's wife, Dr. Westbrook reported, was very ill, consequently the treasurer was not present, but his report was, which Miss Craddock read:

Dr. Westbrook said that wishing to giv the Liberals of the country due credit for their generosity he had made inquiries of the various Liberal editors and others, and had received replies from all but the Washington Union. Besides the money sent the Union he found that the Freethinkers had given over seven thousand dollars to various public enterprises. Judge Waite and Mr. Treuthart were appointed an auditing committee.

President Westbrook said he had no report of the board of directors. Virtually, there was no board, as they had been unable to hold regular meetings. With the exception of Dr. Severance, who had met with an accident, the directors had met once on the occasion of Mr. Remsburg's visit to New York, but at that meeting they did little or nothing except get out a pronunciamento of the principles of the Union. They wanted, he said, to appoint a traveling secretary, but Mr. Remsburg did not favor it, as the lecturers in the field had difficulty in finding sufficient support. The appointment, therefore, was not made. It was supreme folly to elect a board scattered so widely as at present. Mr. Remsburg was a comet which could not be caught; Dr Severance was unable to get East; Dr. Foote was tremendously busy; Mr. Wakeman ditto, and therefore the board as a board was of little account. The president and secretary did the business, which had received the approbation of all. The board, he said, ought to reside in one place.

As to the Prize Manual, though some folks might think him slow, he had got it well along. The money was on deposit, drawing two and a half per cent interest, and the award would be made shortly. It was too great a work to be done in a few weeks. He had over a hundred manuscripts by college professors and presidents, superintendents of schools, and others. It was hard to get a competent committee of examination. He had asked James Parton, but Mr. Parton could not serve, and other well-known Liberals were equally unobtainable. He got Professor Adler, and that gentleman went off to the Adirondacks; Dr. Emily White accepted, and sailed for Europe. But Dr. Brinton of the University of Pennsylvania had proved a most judicious and discriminating reader. He himself and Miss Craddock had read all the manuscripts, and he was astonished at the ability shown by the writers. They hav exhausted the subject and the problem is finally solved of how to teach the purest principles of morality with no reference to religion. The former secretary, Mr. E. A. Stevens, had rendered very important service to the project by collecting the funds.

Another thing he had done, Dr. Westbrook said, was to obtain a charter for the American Secular Union, so that donations could be legally held and used. One friend of the Union, Mr. J. Sedgebeer, of Painesville, O., had desired to leave the organization a thousand dollars, but while methods were being devised to accept his generosity Mr. Sedgebeer had passed away and the money was lost to the Union. Pennsylvania corporation laws, he said, were the most liberal of any state, but no court would incorporate a society the business of which was done beyond the borders of the state. He had, therefore, obtained a charter in that state, and by changing the Union's constitution to by-laws the work could be carried on. Officers, however, must be elected in Pennsylvania, but that could be arranged by a system of proxies. The East, he said, contributed the greater part of the funds of the Union, New York and Pennsylvania leading in the order named. Oregon, however, gave more than Massachusetts or Illinois or Indiana. Leonard Geiger, of Hudson, N. Y., and Wm. Smith, of Geneva, N. Y., were royal friends who responded magnificently when called upon, and N. F. Griswold, of Connecticut, was another large contributor. Last year, Dr. Westbrook said, he did not want to take the presidency of the Union, because he was writing a book to be called "Skeleton Keys to Theological Closets," but it was well along now. He, perhaps, had been slow about the Girard College contest, but he had that campaign all blocked out; and, besides, his failure to move was largely because of the enforced delay in the matter of the Prize Manual. When that was out he could show the officers of the college how to do what Girard wanted done. He would then draw the papers in the case and engage able counsel to prosecute.

A Rail at Things in General.

I send you the following "open letter" for publication. It is addressed to a lady whose name is withheld.

The Democratic party reminds me of a rattlesnake. I venerate its principles but abhor its personality. Its principles must be preserved, and therefore I am a Democrat at the polls; but the prevailing party which givs suffrage to the New Yorker and the negro denies it to your sex on the ground that you do not know enough to use it intelligently; and I do not understand how you can be a Democrat—or even a free woman. Hav you a voice in formulating the laws that govern you, or in selecting those who make or enforce them? If you marry you become the slave of your husband by the laws of God and man, and the Bible assures us that what the Christians bind on earth shall be bound in heaven (See Matt. xviii, 15–19). Therefore it seems best to employ an Infidel to conduct the marriage ceremony; or to do it "oneselvs" by executing a civil contract somewhat like the following: "In pursuance with the laws of the state of New York, we, the undersigned, become husband and wife by mutual consent on signing this article."

Do not tell anyone else that you are a Democrat, but do what you can for the cause of equal rights, and leave the uncleanly work of fertilizing the field of politics to those who are permitted to use that electoral pitchfork, the ballot. Unless you do this I may be tempted to say to you what Moses is said to hav told his superior—that the course in question will injure your reputation and you had better repent of it—and I fear you would not accept this advice as gracefully as God did (See Ex. xxxii, 9 15). It ought not to compromise you to say, "I respect Democratic principles and Prohibition morals," or, "I think the Democrats are as much superior to the Republicans in national principles as they are inferior to them in personal morality," but if I were you I would not say anything unless some one asked me about it. I always try to explain under these circumstances that I am not a Democrat because it is the party of an outgrown, outworn, and patched up constitution, nor because it is synonymous with rum, Romanism, and rebellion, and Italy, Ireland, and ignorance. I am not a Democrat because six-tenths of the constituents of that party owe a greater allegiance to the church of Rome than to the land of their nativity or adoption, nor because every New Yorker or Irishman that ever assaulted me belongs to it. I am not a Democrat because they belonged to this party who enslaved their species, outraged the soul and violated the body; who sold their own flesh into bondage, opposed its emancipation with bullets and scripture, and put into the treasury of the church "money that was the price of blood." I am not a Democrat because of any of these things, but I am one in spite of all of them. I believe that negro slavery is a thing of the past and monopolistic and social slavery will continue so long as all or any of the present political parties can perpetuate them. As the Republican party was organized to free the blacks, Socialism is designed to free the laborer, and this generation will not pass away until its mission is fulfilled. I am a Democrat because I consider Democratic principles better than Republican ones, and realize that one party must prevail. I believe in the motto of my nativ state, "State sovereignty in national union." I believe in the reduction of the tariff, and think that the sooner it is reduced to nothing the better I believe in the Democracy of individuals in protecting the rights of all, and in doing the greatest good to the largest number. Therefore I am a Democrat. My father was one before me. I also believe in many principles that are not indorsed by my party. I believe in the maxims: "All for each and each for all," "No rent, no interest, no profit, the cost is the price." I believe in free land, free trade, free men, and free women. I believe in free love, and I am personally a stronger monogamist than any New Yorker that I ever set my eyes on. I hav observed the evils of our present systems in various ways and many places. A short time ago I stood on the Locks at Sault Ste. Marie and watched the laden vessels pass by me on their way to Lake Superior. One was surmounted by carvings of the cross and crown. Those, thought I, fitly symbolize those other figureheads whose votaries hav exerted the most potent influences that hav cursed humanity. With religion they constrain the body by enslaving the mind; with authority they restrict the mind by enslaving the body. They hav conspired against mankind for general plunder, and coöperated with each other for mutual help and protection. Like the late Siamese twins, they derive vitality from the same source; must exist under the same conditions, and when one dies the other will not survive long. The boat passed northward to sink in the waters of the lake, but the reflections it suggested liv in my memory. I looked around me. I saw in the south the gilded cross on a neighboring spire, and thought of the large black one that marked the location of the more distant cemetery, and my mind was impressed by the "eternal fitness" of some things—especially colors. I watched the busy attendants as they performed their duties at the Locks, showing good will to all, and courtesy to those that addressed them. They worked for the government, and life went well with them. At my side a small group of New Yorkers was begging its way back to the East. These men were in the prime of manhood, but life went poorly with them. The fire had faded from their eyes, and energy seemed eliminated from their spirits. They looked as though the inherent cussedness of their nature had been knocked out of them by adversity, and they could appreciate rest in Lake Superior whose icy waters never giv up the dead. The laws of their nativ state declare that suicide is a crime. The laws of the various states declare that it is a crime to be without visible means of support, or to beg or steal the means of subsistence, or to violate the restrictions they impose on labor which make it impossible for men like these to produce the necessaries of life.

Under our present system they who hav means own those who hav no means. The latter must importune the former for permission to work, to create the wealth that must support the creator, that ought to enrich him and revert to society. For this privilege the laborer is robbed systematically in behalf of the capitalist, the church, and government. The first demands a share of the value created for allowing the workman to create it; the last imposes a tax on the value he produces, on the goods he sells, on those that he must buy; the church pays no taxes. And this laborer pays all taxes. If he objects to working under these conditions he may starve; in some cases he does so. I know of no law against starvation, nor do I know of any that can benefit a man who has not sufficient means to employ counsel or pay other legal expenses. I looked toward the West. The northern peninsula of Michigan lay before me. It is mainly a wilderness; and a large portion, perhaps the greater part of it, is owned by a land company. Some years ago, this company built a short railroad, and in consideration on this received a large grant of land from the government which exempted it from taxation for a term of years. Then this company sold its railroad to parties who extended it at each end and made it a part of a great system. The company still retains the land and is holding it for a rise. The available land of the West is being rapidly taken up; perhaps within ten years it will all be appropriated. Then the tidal wave of immigration will break on the Rocky mountains and be diverted to the North and the South, where a considerable amount of cultivable land now lies ignored. Then this land will be valuable and its owners will realize their anticipated profits which are made possible by the protection of a government that keeps thousands idle to enrich a few—one whose emblem is a bird of prey, and whose colors are suggestiv of the injustice of its laws. Let the government redeem the land, for it cannot confiscate it, and is bound to protect the right of those who hav purchased it with their money or labor. "The land for the people." Let our government purchase it at its actual worth by a tax levied on actual values and make its use free to those who will utilize it. Please think of this.

JULIAN MARCELLAS.

Lecturing.

I hav just returned from a lecture trip through Oregon and parts of Washington. It was an all summer's campaign. Riding over dusty, mountainous roads in the burning heat was a trying ordeal, especially when it was almost of daily occurrence during most of the summer. There are many good Liberals throughout these states, but they are not in many cases well "bunched," that is, they do not liv near each other; hence the lecturer has to travel long distances between appointments. I had to ride four hundred miles on buckboards and stages in eastern Oregon, giving fifty lectures. Oregon and Washington are on the boom. Thousands of people from the East and South are flocking thither. Land speculation leads all other interests. Everywhere new towns are springing up and great efforts are made to boom the towns already in existence. I am well aware of the fact that Richard Grant White would frown the word "boom" out of use, but in the West the word has come to stay. Among other words it has a boom of its own.

In most of these new towns one finds but little interest in Freethought lectures. The people are too full of excitement over their business to giv much time or thought to the Nine Demands of Liberalism. It is only here and there that the lecturer gets good, attentiv audiences. It is astonishing the vast amount of indifference there is manifested everywhere on the questions of Freethought by those who hav no religious convictions, but who hav some anti-religious sentiments. The first time the Freethought lecturer comes along he generally gets a good audience, but afterward the number that comes out to hear him is less, and not unfrequently grows less on each successiv trip. There are many reasons for this falling off. In the first place, there are thousands of people outside of the church who are not Freethinkers—in fact, they are not thinkers of any kind. I am astonished almost every day of my life to find these people classed as Freethinkers. Such people do not subscribe for any of the Liberal papers or read any Liberal books or support the lecturers. They are not free from the stupidity and narrowness of the creeds. Again, there are many who cannot be classed with these who are wretchedly penurious, and hav no enthusiasm of liberty and truth. With them nothing is so large and grand as a dollar, except it be another dollar.

There is a different class from these, constituted of public and professional men, as lawyers, doctors, teachers, merchants, and politicians, who fear public opinion, and hence dare not openly support the Freethought lecturer. In private they denounce the wickedness of the Christian people and the demoralizing tendency of the dogma, and the superstitions that go with it, but in many cases they do not put their hands into their pockets to help us. I am free to confess that it is often impolitic for such public men to make themselvs conspicuous in our meetings, but they could help us financially, and that is just where we need help the most. I remember that once I went to a certain town in Illinois and was introduced to a dentist, who greeted me kindly and said, "Now, Brother Bell, I can't go around town with you to get a hall for you, and to introduce you to our Liberal friends. Brother Black will do that. Here are ten dollars to help you, and if this is not enough do not hesitate to come back and let me help you out." Such men, however, are hard to find. When the time comes that Liberal ideas are popular, then these lawyers, doctors, teachers, merchants, and politicians will stand in the front ranks and boastingly point out the fact how "Betsey and I killed the bear."

I read with not a little surprise in a recent issue of THE TRUTH SEEKER, an article entitled, "Random Notes," by our esteemed friend Will S. Andres, of Portsmouth, O. I will quote but a sentence or two. He seeks to persuade the Liberal lecturers to make more moderate demands upon the Liberal public for their services. He pleads with us to travel as the itinerant preachers did in early times, for the sake of the cause. He asks, "Will they tour the country the coming year at lower rates than heretofore? Will they for once travel under the guidance of the American Secular Union and at living and not gilt-edged prices?" I can only answer for myself, and will say, Yes; I will travel under the guidance of the American Secular Union at very moderate prices. But if I am to put myself under the direction of the Union, I shall look to it for my moderate support. Will the Union guarantee me such support? If not, with what show of reason should it seek to giv direction to my labors?

One material fact that escaped the attention of our good brother Andres is, that the Liberal lecturers are not getting "gilt-edged" prices for their work. In fact, their pay is not only meager, but very meager pay for their time and expenses. We make the poorest kind of a living out of it. The truth is, I hav to work outside of the lecture business in order to support myself. I read proof, sell books, and do what else I can find to do. To talk about "gilt-edged" prices is nonsense, when one has to liv more in common with Lazarus than with Dives. And what is still worse is that the lecture business is paying less every succeeding year, while the amount of work is increasing. Like all other work, the demand is, more labor and less pay. I hav had during the past summer more to do, more expenses to pay, more roughing to endure, and less remuneration than hav fallen to my lot any season during the past fifteen years that I hav been in the lecture field. Mr. Andres is not acquainted with the lecture business. He was, however, aware of the fact that he was writing "Random Notes." The painful truth is they were entirely too random. One more year in Oregon and Washington of such hard work and poor pay will cause some of us to hunt for better pasture.

Let Mr. Andres change about front, and exhort the people to sustain us wherever we go. Let him persuade the rich Freethinkers to do something for Freethought. We hav rich Liberals in the country who are doing comparativly nothing for the cause of liberty, equality, and fraternity. Our Liberal papers should all receive generous support from those who hav the means to aid.

Our wealthy men and women might do a vast amount of good if they would leave something for the papers after they hav got through with it. They seldom do. I should greatly rejoice to know that a handsome bequest was made to THE TRUTH SEEKER. And why should not our Liberal institutions, such as the papers are, receive aid in this way? See how the Christians dying leave vast sums of money to support what they regard as good and desirable. It does seem to me that as Liberals we are away behind in this matter. Our well-off Liberals can do more, and it is a shame that they do not.

Oakland, Cal. W. S. BELL.

After the Lecture.

From the World.

Around the table in the dining-room of the Lafayette Hotel, Philadelphia, Walt Whitman, the aged poet, and Col. Robert G. Ingersoll, discussed religion and death.

The clock struck midnight while they were talking.

It was Tuesday night, after Colonel Ingersoll's address in Horticultural Hall for the benefit of Whitman.

With a deal of care and tenderness the crippled poet, who cannot stand upright, and who must be handled as carefully as the daintiest glass, was removed from the platform of the hall back to the hotel.

He was put into his invalid-chair on descending at the hotel and rolled through the long corridor to the dining-room, where he was to partake of some light refreshment.

A dozen of the poet's friends, who heard that Colonel Ingersoll was to chat with him while he ate, accompanied him to the dining-room. As the little procession followed the chair through the corridor it had a funeral look. The old poet, suffering from the reaction after the excitement of the ovation he had received at the hall, looked thirty years older than his seventy-one years. Some said he was the oldest-looking man they had ever seen. He realized one's ideal of the Old Man of the Sea—long, white beard "breaking in venerable flood upon his breast," unkempt locks as white as snow tumbling over ear and temple, and half-dimmed, mild eyes looking out beneath frosty eaves, hands thin and trembling as they lay upon the arms of the chair.

In the dining-room Walt was drawn up to a table whereon was placed a glass of champagne. Into this, during the evening, the poet dipped pieces of bread, which he munched with difficulty.

Colonel Ingersoll sat beside him in a light overcoat, his high silk hat laid aside. Walt's broad-brimmed felt partially covered his long hair. The colonel had a glass of apollinaris before him.

The conversation was fragmentary for half an hour. The large dining-room was half dark except where, here and there, a late diner was seated.

Suddenly Walt's right hand fluttered feebly into his right pocket and he drew forth a crumpled, well-worn piece of paper. He opened the sheet and a look of surprise lighted up his pallid face.

"I found this in my coat," he said. "I don't often put on this coat. This poem is a translation of mine from the French of Henri Murger. I'll read it to you."

This he said with difficulty and with much hesitation. All through the evening he seemed to be making an effort to pull his great mental forces together. The sight was sad.

Raising his voice he began to read in a childish treble. The scattered diners left their seats and flocked about the long table at the head of which sat the two gray-haired men.

The room was dark save where one chandelier threw a patch of light upon the reader's yellow paper.

The waiters in their white aprons flitted about on the edge of the listening group like semi-ghosts.

The words whistled through the poet's thick beard as they came in aspirate puffs from his thin lips. Several ladies looked around at the darkness, and, shivering, moved up closer to the patch of light. Here are the lines he read:

THE MIDNIGHT VISITOR.

"Whose steps are those? Who comes so late?"
"Let me come in, the door unlock."
"'Tis midnight now; my lonely gate
I open to no stranger's knock.

"Who art thou? Speak!" "Men call me Fame;
To immortality I lead."
"Pass, idle phantom of a name."
"Listen again, and now take heed.

"'Twas false. My names are Song, Love, Art.
My poet, now unbar the door."
"Art's dead, Song cannot touch my heart,
My once love's name I chant no more."

"Open then now, for, see, I stand,
Riches my name, with endless gold,
Gold, and your wish in either hand."
"Too late—my youth you still withhold."

"Then if it must be, since the door
Stands shut, my last true name to know,
Men call me Death. Delay no more;
I bring the cure of every woe."

The door flies wide. "Ah, guest so wan,
Forgiv the poor place where I dwell;
An ice-cold hearth, a heart-sick man,
Stand here to welcome thee full well."

Not a sound had disturbed the reading. When he had finished Whitman looked up at Ingersoll, who had never taken his eyes off the old man, and said with a cracked inflection: "Isn't that funny?"

Ingersoll shrugged his shoulders, drew his head down, and said slowly: "I don't think there is anything funny about death. It's so sort of cold, so white. I don't like it."

Walt nodded his head slowly. There was a pause, as if he were trying to make a connection between death and what he was about to say. At last he said: "I believe religion has done more good to the world than harm."

This unchained the dialog that followed. Ingersoll, who addressed the group more than the poet, quickly replied:

"It might hav done so had it only stuck to the good. It didn't; it taught what was mean and cruel. It puts me in mind of my visit to a church when I was a boy. It was a Presbyterian church, and the preacher was in a high box over my head. I fell asleep, and at last rolled off the seat, which awoke me. I awoke just in time to hear the preacher tell the story of Dives and Lazarus. He dwelt on every detail with vividness. I was filled with an awful fear as I heard him speak."

Ingersoll's facial play here was superb. Expressing his fear, his eye gradually widened, and he half rose, peering into the darkness.

"I can remember," he went on, "how I looked up at the pulpit with an ever-growing fear as the preacher told of how Dives suffered the tortures of hell and how he was mocked with the cry that he had his good things in this world and must suffer in the next. I hated that God then, and when I came to be a man and realized that in the two thousand years God had never sent Lazarus out of Abraham's bosom to put a drop of water on Dives's tongue—bah! If religion had kept to the good for this life it might hav done much less harm."

Whitman: "Sometimes it is better to soar."

Ingersoll: "No, the reason why I like you, Walt, is that you hav written for people here and now."

Whitman (raising his bony hand in air): "I think I hav soared in the clouds a great deal, and——"

Ingersoll (interrupting): "Yes, but you hav taken lots of dirt up with you."

This sally brought a burst of laughter from the group.

Walt only raised his bushy brows and shook his head. He saw he could not make front against a man whose repartee came like flashes.

Ingersoll: "My grandfather was the sort of man who believed all the world would be damned except himself. He was sorry for it, but couldn't help it. My grandmother thought all would be saved except herself, and—here Ingersoll half rose from his chair and extended his hand aloft—she was as much above the man as the stars are above a duck's tracks in the mud."

Whitman: "Do you believe in all I hav written?"

Ingersoll: "No; far from it. Much you hav written I do not believe in, but you hav made men and women stronger, and I like you for it. There is only one thing I hav against you, Walt."

Ingersoll took hold of the old man's sleeve. Those who had heard Ingersoll say in the lecture that "the most indecent word in our language is celibacy," half expected what followed.

"I hav only one thing against you, and that is that you didn't marry. You ought to hav got a girl, Walt."

The old poet looked at him puzzled, as if he had long since forgotten the meaning of the word girl.

"The religion I bow to," went on Ingersoll, "is the one that teaches men to love their wives more tenderly, to hold their children on their knees a little tighter. As to worship and prayer, if I saw a savage kneel before a stuffed snake praying that wife or child might be given back to him, I would kneel and pray with him, but that cruel God in heaven I cannot pray to, I hate him."

The old poet's bread had absorbed all the champagne and he began to look fatigued. The party gathered around him to say good-bye, probably the last one. Tears were in the eyes of some as they watched the poet utter his feeble good-bye.

When Ingersoll's turn came to go he tapped Walt's hand and said, cheerily: "I hope you'll liv many a year yet."

To this Walt replied: "You might wish me something better than that."

He Registered with His Hat on and Hands Down.

From San Francisco Freethought.

The members of the board of registration for the Fourteenth precinct of the Forty-fifth assembly district for the city and county of San Francisco hav been taught a lesson which it is hoped will be useful to them hereafter. The board met at the corner of Nineteenth and Howard streets to register the names of such voters as had not been recorded at the city hall, and the chairman was instructed to administer the following oath to all applicants:

You do solemnly swear that you will truly answer all questions touching your qualifications to register as an elector in the city and county of San Francisco. "SO HELP YOU GOD."

This "So help you God" is printed on the card, furnished by the bureau of registration, in heavy black capital letters, and is inclosed in quotation marks.

Mr. F. S. Luce, a painter by occupation, residing at 321 Camp street, applied to the board in the Fourteenth of the Forty-fifth for registration, but when the oath was repeated to him he declined to take it on the ground that it was a religious obligation. He, however, expressed a willingness to affirm. The board thereupon unanimously refused to receive his name. A dialog something like the following then occurred:

Inspector: "Where were you born?"

Applicant: "In Texas."

Inspector: "Is there no God in Texas?"

Applicant: "I never saw any during my residence in that state."

Chorus of Entire Board: "No man who does not believe in God can register or vote in this country."

Mr. Luce left the board and applied to the editor of Freethought for advice. From the editor he was referred to R. Guy McClellan, Esq., attorney at law, 331 Montgomery street. Mr. McClellan gave him an introduction to the chairman of the Republican central committee, who heard Mr. Luce's complaint with a good deal of indignation, and sent him to Register Smiley. Mr. Smiley characterized the registration board of the Fourteenth of the Forty-fifth as a board of ignoramuses, and gave an order to Mr. Luce directing them to register his name. Thus, after spending a day's time in the vindication of his principles and the rights of conscience, the applicant returned to the precinct board and again presented himself for registration. In a very surly manner the inspector directed him to remove his hat. Mr. Luce declined, and an order to "hold up your hand" met with a similar refusal. The board was in a quandary, but having been once rebuked the members did not care to risk a further stretch of authority, and Mr. Luce was registered with hat on and hands down.

The matter has been passed over in complete silence by the press, and an opportunity has thus been lost to giv a little new light to those public officers who are required to administer oaths. The trouble ought not to occur again. It is the plain duty of the registrar's office to instruct its employees that an affirmation is as good as an oath in all cases, and that nothing more than a simple promis to speak the truth can be required of any who object to the religious formula. The removal of the hat is optional and a matter of comfort or taste; the elevation of the hand is a species of invocation of some higher power than truth and has only a superstitious significance.

Mr. Luce deserves the thanks of all Secularists for claiming his rights as a citizen and for taking the trouble and expense of vindicating them.

Mr. Henry Winehard's Gift.

The Oregon State Secular Union thankfully acknowledges the receipt of a check for $75 from Mr. Henry Winehard, proprietor of new Arion Hall, the meeting-place of the last state convention.

Mr. Winehard thus effectivly indorses the grand principles promulgated by the Union.

It is such aid as this that enables us to successfully thwart the pernicious organizations which are threatening our glorious principles of liberty. KATIE KEHM,

Assistant Secretary Oregon State Secular Union.

GEOLOGY has conclusivly disproved what was once the universal belief concerning the origin of death. That this fearful calamity appeared in the universe on account of the transgression of man, that every pang that convulses the frame of any created being, every passion or instinct or necessity that contributes to the infliction of suffering, is but the fruit of the disobedience in paradise, was long believed with unfaltering assurance, and is even now held by many who cannot be regarded as altogether uneducated. And this general proposition became a great archetype, a center around which countless congenial beliefs were formed, a first principle or measure of probability guiding the predispositions of men in all their inquiries. If all death and all pain resulted from the sin of Adam, it was natural to giv every particular instance of death or pain a special signification; and if these the greatest of terrestrial imperfections were connected with the history of man, it was natural to believe that all minor evils were no less so. But geology has now proved decisivly that a profound error lurks in these conclusions. It has proved that countless ages before man trod this earth death raged and reveled among its occupants; that it so entered into the original constitution of things, that the agony and the infirmity it implies were known as at present when the mastodon and the dinotherium were the rulers of the world. To deny this is now impossible; to admit it is to abandon one of the root-doctrins of the past.—Lecky.

The next thing on the program was the election of officers.

The committee on credentials reported the following authorized voters present:

Life Members.—Lucy N. Colman; Leonard Geiger; Mrs. Leonard Geiger; Dr. De Lespinasse; Mrs. De Lespinasse; E. A. Stevens; E. M. Macdonald.

Friendship Liberal League.—R. B. Westbrook; Mrs. R. B. Westbrook; Ida C. Craddock.

Newark.—John R Charlesworth.

Portsmouth Secular Union.—J. L. Treuthart; W. S. Andres; Benjamin Wood; Alex. Cross; James Feurt.

Chicago Secular Union.—E. B. Waite; Mrs. M. A. Freeman; E. M. Greer; Joseph Greer.

Manhattan Liberal Club.—T. B. Wakeman.

Ingersoll Secular Union.—L. K. Washburn.

Judge Waite, of Chicago, moved that Dr. Westbrook be unanimously reëlected. The motion was carried. It was also moved that the secretaryship be disposed of by making Miss Craddock the unanimous selection. Mrs. Colman seconded the motion. She was glad, she said, that the Union had the good sense last year to elect a woman—glory to God!—and she had no objection to the same woman for another year. If she, Mrs. Colman, were only young, she would see who would be secretary, for she would run against her. She had been a member of the Secular Union for many years—had been in all its quarrels, borne the burden of the day, and would bear five thousand times as much to bring the Union up to its present efficient status. She would always vote for the extreme side. There were more gray hairs to be seen before her than black, but the gray hairs must teach the black. One of these days the American Secular Union could face the Women's Christian Temperance Union and say, stand back. If one wanted to sin as the Bible commands, let him sin. He would learn in time that sin is its own avenger. She would, she said, make a speech on this, but had to stop to elect a secretary.

Mr. John R. Charlesworth asked that the rules be followed and the secretary chosen in the regular way. He desired to discuss the last year's work of the Union, and had some criticisms to offer. He could commend Miss Craddock for the manner in which her report was prepared, but he saw no practical work accomplished. One of the first things the administration had done was to quarrel with Mrs. Gage and the Women's National Liberal Union. The Manual manuscripts had not been submitted to the board of directors. The Union ought to hav a Liberal at its head who could go into the field. One of the points it ought to press is the rationalization of Sunday. What, he asked, had the Union done? Had it not been for the Editor of THE TRUTH SEEKER nothing would hav been done by the Liberals in the matter of the World's Fair. He wanted some organizing done. He would move, therefore, for the adoption of the secretary's report as the regular order of business.

Mr. Wakeman was asked to take the chair. That gentleman said he had first a few words to say about the characterization of the present board of directors as useless. Personally he was always ready to act when called upon, and there was no difficulty in acting together. The incorporation of the Union ought to hav been submitted to the board. The president, however, had assumed that all the officers did would be ratified by the board, as had been done. Dr. Foote and himself would do anything for the Union. As to Mr. Remsburg and Dr. Severance, it was understood they could not personally attend to the business of the Union; neither were they required to do so. The executiv officers were the ones to transact the business of the Union; the others were only advisory.

Miss Craddock said she agreed with Mr. Wakeman as to the loyalty to the Union of himself and Dr. Foote. But they could not, it seemed, attend meetings of the board. She had tried to get them to Asbury Park, when the incorporation would hav been submitted, but they could not attend. They were too busy men. No one, she added, wanted to assume authority.

President Westbrook also disclaimed any intention, direct or indirect, to reflect harshly upon any one.

Judge Waite explained that when he moved to suspend the rules and elect the officers by acclamation, he only moved to do what he had seen done hundreds of times in all sorts of societies.

E. A. Stevens seconded the motion to adopt the secretary's report. The chaotic state of the records were no fault of his, but the secretary had done well in reducing them to order. It is a great work for a new secretary to get into harness. He could wish though that more aggressiv work had been undertaken, as the people who sustain the Union liked that sort.

Mrs. M. A. Freeman rose to say that she hoped that the secretary would long continue to fill the office.

Judge Waite moved to reconsider the vote to elect the president.

W. S Andres opposed the motion, and it was lost.

Miss Craddock said she desired to be voted for by secret ballot. She believed in the Australian system. There were delegates there opposed to her, and she wanted them to hav a chance to vote against her. They might be unwilling, she thought, to publicly record their opposition.

Mr. Mitchell, of Portsmouth, who was not a delegate, said that it was important to make progress. If the officers were efficient reëlect them. He was in favor of the present officers.

A motion to elect the secretary viva voce was made and carried, and Miss Craddock was the unanimous choice. She thanked the Congress for its vote of confidence. She wanted all Liberals to write her, so that the Union would be in touch with all its friends. She was prepared to do more aggressiv work if she had the assistance of the people.

Mrs. Colman advised the secretary to do as she thought right; for she couldn't expect to please everyone, and must first please herself. She, the speaker, had been talked to till she, the speaker, was sore, but always did as she pleased. Let the secretary hav time.

Mr. Charlesworth moved the reëlection of the former board of directors. Mr. Wakeman said he did not care to serve, but desired a board which could get together often. Dr. Foote's devotion was well attested, and no better man than he could be found.

Messrs. Stevens and Charlesworth protested against the resignation of Mr. Wakeman.

President Westbrook said that as the workings of the board must be somewhat different under the charter than formerly, it might be well to consider the charter first. He moved that the election of directors be postponed and taken up when a treasurer was chosen. The motion prevailed. Dr. Westbrook read the charter, adding that if the Union didn't want it he would pay the bill ($94) for getting it himself.

Mr. Sharpless—not a delegate—moved the acceptance of the charter. To get it before the house Mr. Charlesworth seconded the motion. Mrs. Colman moved that the charter be referred to a committee. The motion was adopted, and Judge Waite, E. A. Stevens, T. B. Wakeman, L. K. Washburn, Dr. Greer, J. L. Treuthart, and Mrs. Colman were appointed a committee.

Mrs. Colman rose to a question of privilege. She had a little book—forty-seven of them in fact—which she wanted to sell and otherwise dispose of for ready cash. Mr. Geiger had brought them to the Congress, but positivly refused to carry them away, and when she was dead the folks who purchased them would consider that the most virtuous act of their lives. The book was her "Reminiscences," price one dollar, for sale by all Liberal publishers. She also proposed to print other reminiscences in Mr. Green's Magazine, but the Editor of THE TRUTH SEEKER needn't get offended, as she still considered his journal the paper of all papers. The best thing Colonel Ingersoll ever did was to write "Crimes Against Criminals," and she proposed to supplement it by an article on "Crimes Against Witnesses," as she had recently been a witness in a divorce case.

The fifth subject on the program for the morning was then taken up—discussion of methods for promoting the efficiency of the American Secular Union. The secretary's address was the text, and in that she advised affiliation with other organizations working for the same purposes. Mrs. Ames, of Chicago, said she was opposed to all affiliation. The Union could not agree with them, and she did not want the Union to lose its identity. Miss Craddock agreed with the latter remark, but thought that all societies working for the separation of church and state could unite on that basis. Auxiliary societies could take charters if that was one of their objects, no matter what else they believed. The more lines out, the more fish would be caught.

Dr. Lespinasse asked the secretary how many state Unions there were. The secretary could not say. There were only a few auxiliaries formed the past year, chiefly organized by Mr. Remsburg, as follows:

Wheeling, W. Va., Secular Union.—President, D. G. Crow; secretary, Allen Noe; treasurer, F. A. Morris; vice-presidents, O. C. Miller, Chris Beck, J. O. Brosius; executiv, H. B. Bogaley, M.D., John Hutchings.

Ashland Secular Union, Oregon.—President, H. S. Evans. Organized by Mattie P. Krekel.

Portsmouth Secular Union, Ohio.—President, J. L. Treuthart; secretary, W. S. Andres. Organized by W. S. Andres.

Newark Secular Union.—President, Henry Bird; vice-president, John R. Charlesworth; secretary, Cora B. Flagg; treasurer, Francis Kieb. John R. Charlesworth, organizer.

Rogers Secular Union, Rogers, Ark.—President, Mayor E. R. Morgan; secretary, Q. N. Bixler; treasurer, H. M. Gaughey. Organized by J. E Remsburg.

Flatonia Secular Union, Texas.—President, Henry W. Yeager: vice-president, J E. Faires; secretary and treasurer, T. E. Tanner. Organized by J E. Remsburg.

San Antonio Secular Union, Texas.—President, Charles L. Sauer; secretary, Otto Praeger; treasurer, Benj. J. Mauermann. Organized by J. E. Remsburg.

Columbus Secular Union, Texas.—President, A. C. Zamalt; vice-president, R. W. Putney; secretary, W. A. Matthews; treasurer, Louis Weete. Organized by J. E. Remsburg.

Cuero Secular Union, Texas.—President, Wm. Westhoff secretary, August Holzapfel. Organized by J. E. Remsburg.

McKinney Secular Union, Texas.—President, H. C. Smith; vice-president, E. W. Kirkpatrick; secretary, F. C. Thompson; treasurer, M. B. Rexrole. Organized by J. E. Remsburg.

A good many of the auxiliary societies, said Miss Craddock, were dead or asleep. Dr. Lespinasse said that it seemed that the Pacific coast Liberals were doing all the work. He thought each state should hav an organization. Miss Craddock agreed with him. Judge Waite asked for statistics on organization. Voltairine de Cleyre wanted to know what the secretary meant by coöperation. Mrs. Lyndall desired information as to how the Union proposed to build up. She represented two or three societies in favor of the Nine Demands, but could not vote in the Congress because the societies had no charter. Miss De Cleyre rose again, and was called to the platform. When she concluded the debate was energetically resumed by nearly all present, but the girls carried off the honors.

SATURDAY AFTERNOON.

Saturday afternoon Miss Sarah Stevens sought to soothe the disturbed spirits by her harmonies, and Dr. Henrietta P. Westbrook read a short and excellent discourse on "Common Sense." Dr. Paul Carus, of the Open Court, briefly commended the work of the Union, followed by Mrs. Colman, who thanked her stars that she knew enough to join the Secular Union away back when it was the National Liberal League. Some of the people were a long while coming in. The Union had had trouble, but she was satisfied with what the Union had accomplished. Despised once, poor, quarrelsome—she had done her share of the quarreling, too—the Union had at last become something of which to be proud. Lately she had done a very foolish thing—again read the Bible through from Genesis to Revelation, to refresh her memory as to whether it is fit to be read in the public schools. She had in her life read all English literature condemned as erotic, but everything paled before the filth of the Bible. When she was a school-teacher and a boy from the slums used such language as is found in holy writ, she made him wash his mouth.

Mrs. Colman was followed by Samuel D. Moore, of Adrian, Mich., who wanted to say something because he was older than Mrs. Colman. He had taken her in his buggy scores of miles in antislavery days to appointments to speak. Mr. Moore went away back to the days of the Revolution; then coming back to the Abolition times added several interesting chapters to Mrs. Colman's reminiscences.

The president cut him off to hear the report of the auditing committee, which was favorable to the treasurer.

The committee on charter was also ready to report, after a somewhat stormy session in the parlors of the hotel. The report was unfavorable. The lawyers of the committee found legal objections, and the others did not favor it because it did not sufficiently set forth the objects of the Union. The committee desired to sustain the president in his work in Philadelphia, but did not see how the charter could be utilized by the national society.

President Westbrook recalled that an eminent lawyer of England once said that no body of legislators could enact a statute through which the lawyers could not drive a coach and four. The committee had driven the coach and four through his charter, but he bowed most submissivly to their decision and hoped the report would be adopted, which it was.

Mr. F. C. Mendes was then reëlected treasurer.

W. S. Andres said he hoped that in selecting directors those who would work would be chosen.

T. B. Wakeman was nominated. He declined. Mrs. Colman said she had worked with Mr. Wakeman for fourteen years. He never neglected his duty, and he should not be removed. Miss Craddock said no censure of Mr. Wakeman had been intended, but that now to vote for Mr. Wakeman would be to censure the president and secretary. Mrs. Colman made another passionate speech, and endeavored to put the question to a vote, but Mr. Wakeman, who was in the chair, would not permit it. He would not accept office, he said, after what had been said by the officers, and Mrs. Colman made a third appeal to him to accept and the Congress to elect him. Dr. Westbrook again said that Mr. Wakeman had misunderstood his (Dr. Westbrook's) remarks, and had no cause to be sensitiv. Mr. Wakeman retorted that he had been ignored in procuring the charter, while Chicago Liberals were consulted. He would hav left any business he had to attend to the Union's affairs had he been notified. He therefore thought it better to put in new men who could meet with the board in Philadelphia. Mrs. Colman rose again, still insisting upon the reëlection of Mr. Wakeman, and this time put the motion to the Congress, and it was carried. The secretary asked that it be done over again and done regularly. Mrs. Ames queried why Chicago was consulted and not the board of directors. Dr. De Lespinasse insisted on transacting business, and the secretary still insisted upon her motion for regularity. Dr. Westbrook called for the nominations of four men for the board. Dr. Foote, Jr., T. B. Wakeman, J. O. Bentley, and T. Morris Parot were named. Mr. Wakeman said that in deference to Mrs. Colman and the wishes of the audience he would swallow all personal feeling and accept. The board was then elected unanimously, after which Dr. Westbrook said he was pleased that it was so, and heartily welcomed Mr. Wakeman to office.

The Congress then disposed of the following business in rapid order. John R. Charlesworth was recommended by the Congress for appointment by the board as field secretary. W. S. Andres declined a similar honor. The board was instructed to select for vice-presidents men who would help the organization. A motion was passed to call through the Liberal papers for a guarantee fund of five thousand dollars to push the work of the Union. All societies were invited to become auxiliary which are in sympathy with its work. A vote of thanks to the Secular Union and to the press and people of Portsmouth was passed. The board of directors were instructed to publish protests against the closing of the World's Fair on Sundays.

SATURDAY EVENING.

After music by Miss Stevens and Professor White, Mr. Wakeman, in a felicitous speech in which he announced the burial of all heartburnings, introduced President Westbrook, who was to answer the question, "Shall the Bible Be Read in the Public Schools?" Dr. Westbrook said in part:

The reading of the Bible as a religious exercise in our common schools is exciting universal interest, and has become one of the live questions of the day. Multitudes of earnest religious people are deeply concerned at the thought of excluding the Bible from the state schools, as a religious authority, to be read every day to the pupils, and deem such a proposition as little less than religious treason. Other multitudes are equally strong in the conviction that such reading of the Bible is highly improper, and they insist in the most determined manner that the state schools shall be conducted on strictly secular principles, without any religious exercises whatever. . . .

Now let us formulate our objections to the reading of these sixty-six little tracts, known as the Christian Bible, in our state schools.

We object:

I. Because there is no common agreement as to what constitutes the Bible.

The Jews come forward with their thirty-nine little leaflets, mostly written by nobody knows whom and nobody knows when or where, and say that these, bound together into one book, are the Bible. Orthodox Christians respond in chorus: "Not so; these little pamphlets are only part of the Bible, and while they contain the substance and promis of sacred things, we hav the fulfillment and realization in the New Testament. You must accept our twenty-seven little leaflets [mostly anonymous and without date] before you claim to hav the whole Bible."

Then come the Catholics, and with a tone of authority exclaim, "You are both wrong. You hav omitted fourteen other little books, and hav dubbed them 'apocryphal,' and we insist that the Bible is not complete without these. Moreover, the Bible was never intended to be read by the common people, as it cannot be understood without an authorized interpreter, and the church is such an interpreter, and we [priests] are the church, and you, the people, only belong to the church. You must bring in the writings of the fathers of the church, and also tradition. We do not want even the Douay Bible read in our schools without giving the church a chance to interpret it." . . .

Modern critics make sad havoc with the canon (which means list) of both the Old and New Testament books. Only four of the fourteen epistles ascribed to Paul are now admitted to hav been certainly written by him, and several of the epistles (the Acts, Revelation, and all of the gospels) are regarded as anonymous. Now, we respectfully submit that, until we certainly know what constitutes the Bible, we should cease to clamor for its reading in the public schools. The canon (list) of neither the Old nor the New Testament books was generally accepted, according to Dr. Lardner, until about 556 years after the Christian era. The epistle to the Hebrews, the Acts, the epistle of James, the second epistle of Peter, the second and third epistles of John, the epistle of Jude, and Revelation, hav all been doubted as canonical scripture, and by many eminent Christian scholars hav been entirely rejected. . . .

The canon of the New Testament is equally defectiv. The councils that accepted four gospels and seventeen epistles as canonical, rejected more than fifty other gospels and nearly one hundred other epistles that claimed to be inspired. Besides the canonical and apocryphal books now extant there are sixty-eight New Testament books mentioned or quoted by the Christian fathers of the first four centuries, which are now not known to be in existence. More than fifty other books written by twenty different authors in the second century hav mysteriously disappeared. Now, we respectfully submit that if only one inspired book is lost, or only one is added without authority, suspicion is thrown upon the whole. What shall we say, then, of the scores, and even hundreds, that are not now extant? . . .

We object further to the reading of the Bible in our state schools:

II. Because there is no common agreement as to what parts are historical and what parts are allegorical.

Plato said that he would not hav the poems of Homer read in the schools of his republic, because the children could not properly judge between history and allegory. Then, it should be remembered that the Bible is to be read in our state schools "without note or comment." Suppose that the teacher reads the first and second chapters of Genesis. Here we hav two distinct accounts of creation, contradicting each other in six particulars, and each of these accounts is absolutely inconsistent with what science teaches in our school-books. Suppose we read of the fall of Adam and Eve and inquire, is this a fact or a fiction? Philo and Maimonides, celebrated Jewish writers, say fiction—while the early Christian fathers say the same. . . .

But we object to the reading of the Bible in our state schools:

III. Because there is no common agreement as to what doctrins are taught in the Bible.

For about fourteen hundred years we hav had these little tracts called the Bible, and men are today more uncertain as to what to believe than ever. We hav about two hundred different sects, each declaring that its particular doctrins are drawn from the Bible, and each quotes pages of proof-texts in support of its dogmas. At the same time Calvinists denounce Arminians as holding doctrins that are "delusiv, dangerous, and destructiv" of human souls. Arminians retort that the Calvinists' God is worse than the devil, and say that they would rather be Atheists than Calvinists. . . .

Now, we submit that a book which produces such a medley of opinions should not be read as a religious authority in our state schools. . . .

But we object to reading the Bible in our state schools:

IV. Because it contains so much that is cruel and obscene.

The Bible begins with a cruel murder and a bitter curse—Cain and Abel. The flood of Noah, involving multitudes of innocent children, was a most cruel and desperate device. The raining of fire and brimstone on Sodom was a most despotic act, involving the innocent with the guilty, and no wonder that the patriarch expostulated with Jehovah against it. The fate of Lot's wife, when she cast a last lingering look at her home, was cruel in the extreme. Achan and his sons and daughters (and all his dumb animals) were commanded by Jehovah to be stoned because Achan had stolen the wedge of gold. Jehovah is made to sanction the hanging of Saul's seven sons and grandsons because Saul, a long time before, had done wrong to the Gibeonites, after which Jehovah stopped the pestilence! God approved of the cutting off the heads (by Jehu) of the seventy sons of Ahab. He destroyed 70 000 by pestilence because David did what Jehovah told him to do. He directed Moses to exterminate the Midianites, men, women, and children—except the 32,000 virgins kept for the purpose of gratifying their lusts. He slew 20,000 Israelites for flirting with the daughters of Moab, and mercilessly killed 50,000 men because they peeped in a little wooden box, called the ark of the covenant. But time would fail us to tell of all the cruel and barbarous acts ascribed to Jehovah in the Old Testament. We hav not time to speak of the savage wars, and the merciless murder of thousands upon thousands of men by their brothers. It is enough to say that the Bible contains the most disgustingly detailed accounts of cruel and atrocious crimes of any book extant, and it is not fit to be read in the hearing of children.

It is difficult to speak to ears polite in a promiscuous audience of the obscenity of the Bible. There are more than one hundred passages of the most coarse and vulgar description. To print these in a book and send it through the United States mails would put a man in the penitentiary. There are entire chapters that reek with obscenity from beginning to end. I will not specify them, lest I assist the young and vicious in finding them. "Leaves of Grass," by Walt Whitman, and the "Kreutzer Sonata" of Tolstoi, are immaculate purity by the side of these passages! Early editions of Shakspere hav been revised and purified, but, though Noah Webster undertook to expurgate the Bible, Christians were so prejudiced in favor of the old book that they could not giv up its nastiness. I cannot tell you about Onan, and Tamar, and Lot and his two daughters, and scores of other obscene matters. There are passages even in the New Testament, such as are found in 1 Cor. vii, that cannot be mentioned in the presence of a virtuous woman. If these indecent tales should not be perused by mature persons, should innocent childhood—mere boys and girls in our state schools—be polluted by them? When I enter a lady's parlor, and see the richly gilded Bible upon the center-table, I shudder when I remember the obscenity that is contained between its costly lids. When I see maiden purity tripping along our streets, Bible in hand, I wonder if she knows that she carries more obscenity than Byron ever wrote, than Shelley ever dreamed of, than the vilest French novelist ever dared to print? Shall the children in our state schools be made familiar with all forms of licentiousness and uncleanliness?

But it is said teachers will skip these passages. Yet children will be sure to find them, and will laugh at their guides when they blunder on them by mistake. This matter of skipping offensiv parts calls to view the fact that only extracts are, in fact, read from the Bible in our schools. If it is infallible inspiration why not read it all right out? What right has a teacher to suppress God's word? Are not Solomon's Song, and Ruth, and Esther, just as sacred as the Psalms or epistles? If only extracts are to be read to children, let us hav an expurgated Bible, and let not the extracts be made only from the Jewish and Christian Bibles, but let them be made also from pagan sacred books, in which many things are found as good and pure as anything found in the Hebrew and Christian Bible, and let us thus hav a Sacred Anthology, which shall be pure, chaste, and beautiful.

We should not read the Bible in our state schools:

V. Because the moral is so mixed up with the immoral that there is great danger of contamination by contact.

Some portions of the Old Testament contain beautiful stories and sound moral maxims, but right in the same connection we often hav (without condemnation) stories of uncleanliness, fornications, adulteries, and incests that the Police Gazette would not dare publish. Jael meanly murders Sisera, and is praised for it, while the deceit and treachery of Rahab are commended in the New Testament. The story of Boaz and Ruth is only fit for a dime novel. Solomon's Song is full of lasciviousness. Abram lies. Moses gets mad. David commits adultery, and murders Uriah. Jacob is deceitful, and a trickster—and so on to the end. Polygamy is shown to hav been the rule, and not the exception, among Jehovah's favorits. War is everywhere tacitly justified, and slavery is practiced, and not an abolitionist opens his mouth. We go to the New Testament, and he who is called the "perfect one" curses a fig-tree for not bearing fruit out of season, drives out with small cords men engaged in legitimate business, upsets their tables, and uses the most violent and reproachful language toward them. He shows want of respect for his mother, and is ambiguous and evasiv in conversation with the woman of Canaan; says he does not know whether he is going to the feast at Jerusalem or not, and then straightway sets out for the holy city and makes believe by his actions that he is going to one place when he is actually going to another.

VI. We might just as well go one step further and say that we object to the reading of the Bible in our state schools because of its defectiv morality. We are asked, is there anything defectiv in the morality of the Sermon on the Mount? . . .

The Sermon on the Mount, in its composition and construction, shows that it is not a connected discourse, but that it is a compilation of well-known and familiar maxims in common use in that day.

In many of those sayings, we see nothing wise or moral. "Lay not up for yourself treasures on earth," is not good advice and has never been practiced. "Take no thought for to-morrow," is improvident, even with the unauthorized interpolation of the word "anxious." Turning the other cheek to the smiter, the lending to every borrower, and absolute nonresistance is about as foolish as indiscriminate almsgiving; and could only be uttered by one who believed that the end of the world was at hand and would surely come with that generation. Only a partial keeping of the commands of the Sermon on the Mount would upset every industry, and turn the people into a crowd of tramps and vagabonds.

We want something for our state schools that is more practical, and better adapted to this commercial age. We want a higher morality than is taught in the New Testament. We want higher and more noble conceptions than are given in the parable of the "Unjust Judge," and more just and equitable principles than are taught in the parable of the "Unjust Steward," or the "Laborers in the Vineyard," or the "Ten Talents." We want a morality that relates to this life rather than to the next. We do not want the possession of property held up as a crime, and poverty represented as a virtue, entitling one to a seat in the future kingdom. We want good homes to liv in now, rather than "mansions in the skies." We do not want a morality that appeals to selfishness only, that discriminates in favor of celi-

Letters from Friends.

CAMPBELL, IA., Oct. 16, 1890.

MR. EDITOR: I hav been reading so much about the "gem of a book" called the "Freethinkers' Pictorial Text-Book," that you may send the undersigned subscriber to THE TRUTH SEEKER for about fifteen years a copy of said book.

Yours for the cause, L. T. WOMACKS.

DEL NORTE, COL., Oct. 15, 1890.

MR. EDITOR: The "Pictorial Text-Book" was received by express, and it fills my expectations completely. I am very sorry the ANNUAL for 1890 is out of print, as I hav all the numbers before it on file. I will pay double price or more for one if any person having one to spare will send it to me. Please send me the next out when issued.

ETHAN A. GATES.

CANFIELD, COL., Oct. 8, 1890.

MR. EDITOR: I inclose $2, for which please send picture book. To THE TRUTH SEEKER readers I wish to say that at the last meeting of the Longmont Secular Union by a unanimous vote the name of the society was changed to Friends of Progress. Lecturers and others desiring to correspond with our society should address Miss Georgie Rice, secretary Friends of Progress, Longmont, Col. GEO. X. YOUNG.

XENIA, O., Oct. 10, 1890.

MR. EDITOR: Every Liberal should pay his debts, and that promptly. Inclosed find check for $5—$3 for THE TRUTH SEEKER and $2 for the picture book.

This town contains about eight thousand inhabitants, sixteen churches, twenty priests, one Young Men's Christian Association, thirty missionary and mite societies, and yet times are hard. I expect to hav a picnic among my neighbors with the picture book. HENRY FISHERING.

TYNGSBORO, MASS., Oct. 18, 1890.

MR. EDITOR: Miss Gibson has my thanks for her correction of my inadvertence about Candidate Phillips.

Say to Mr. Walker I am quite well aware there are scamps and shams in the Prohibitionist, Republican, Democratic, and other parties, but that no more condemns a principle than a rascally schoolmaster vitiates the multiplication table. In the matter of hearsay I select the best testimony of the professors of right before that of the doers of wrong and advocates of iniquity. J. P. GUILD.

WEST SUPERIOR, WIS., Oct. 13, 1890.

MR. EDITOR: Forward THE TRUTH SEEKER. I hav been getting it here through a news agent, but he seems to hav suddenly awakened to the heinousness of his crime in handling such a paper, and refuses longer to procure it for us. I could almost wish the powers he does homage to might put their Sunday screws unto him and his business, as he keeps open all day Sunday, and if he says any prayers it must be with one hand on his cash-box and his eyes on customers. O ye hypocrits and generation of vipers! We cannot do without your paper and the company of your fellow-voyagers.

M. M. ROSECRANS.

ANTRIM, N. H., Oct. 15, 1890.

MR. EDITOR: I now send to you to get the Pictorial Bible, and I also want the book to use at burials.

I was thinking the other evening while I was reading about the church-members trying to control the World's Fair as regards keeping it open on the seventh day of the week. Now my advice to them is this, that they come out of the world, hav nothing to do with the world, for they are not of this world but of a place called heaven. That is what they hav been preaching ever since I was a boy and went to their Sunday-schools, and if everybody was as willing as I am they would all be dead long ago and be up in their home along with that infernal-looking image that is so plainly described in their old law-book. H. B. RALEIGH.

LONGMONT, COL., Oct. 12, 290.

MR. EDITOR: Will you or some one of your many learned readers please giv a truth seeker "the truth, the whole truth, and nothing but the truth," in answer to the following questions?

1. Did any Christian sect, before the Quakers, ever oppose chattel slavery?

2. When, and by what authority, was polygamy abolished among the Jews?

3. When—if at all—and by what authority, was polygamy first prohibited among the Christians as such?

4. When, and by what authority, was a priestly ceremony first required among the Christians, as such, in the forming of the marriage relation? JOHN R. KELSO.

SAURIES, ORE., Oct. 4, 1890.

MR. EDITOR: Inclosed find $5—$3 to go on subscription and $2 for the "Freethinkers' Pictorial Text-Book." Be assured if my means were in proportion to my good wishes for the Freethought movement there would be few larger contributions than mine.

I hav been negligent in instructing my four-year-old daughter on who was the architect of her bodily structure, consequently a female relativ told her that God made her. My little girl commenced to question me about it. I had to tell her that I did not remember of having any acquaintance with the person alluded to and never had received any information from him on the subject. She then asked me who made God. On that question I referred her to the person that told her that God made her. Next she wanted to know which was God, a man or woman. To this I could only say that I had never heard of but one sex of the Jehovah kind. I supposed he was of the oyster kind, neither one nor the other, or both. I hope that by continuing to take THE TRUTH SEEKER I may be able as she grows older to giv her some definit knowledge on the subject.

STEPHEN HUTCHINSON.

CORTLAND, O., Oct. 16, 1890.

MR. EDITOR: Please send Heston's picture book. I shall try and do a little missionary work here in this priest-ridden and church-taxed village. I shall try to get orders for the book named. I hav always admired the pictures and considered them as deadly weapons against religious superstition, our foe.

By the way, about six weeks ago we had a fair here of horse-trotting. The day was somewhat rainy. Some Christians here who opposed the fair said that God was on their side and had sent the rain at their request, but on the following morning, to their chagrin and mortification, it was discovered that God glorious had sent a stroke of lightning demolishing the spire to the Methodist church.

I. H. SPELMAN.

NEW CAMBRIA, KAN., Oct. 20, 1890.

MR. EDITOR: I rise to inform Mr. E. C. Walker why I support the People's party of Kansas. Besides the reasons already given in the letter he refers to, I will add the following: 1. Charles Robinson ran in the People's party convention and was defeated by J. F. Willits for governor, therefore he is a bolter, and that ought to condemn him. He should hav stood by the nominee, this Mr. Walker admits. 2. J. F. Willits is also a Liberal. He was born of Quaker parents, and has been called a blaspheming blackguard, which has not been denied by his most intimate friends. 3. "The question [in Kansas] is not whether a man shall get drunk or not, but whether he will hav a home to go to drunk or sober." 4. Prohibition and resubmission is not an issue in the People's party. We hav four cardinal points from which we work, viz: labor, land, transportation, and finance. 5. The chances are just in proportion that there are more E. C. Walkers in the Liberal rauks than there are John P. Guilds, that J. F. Willits is a resubmissionist. And the People's party is a-going to carry the state, "and don't you forget it."

JOHN W. ABBOTT.

DES MOINES, IA., Oct. 15, 1890.

MR. EDITOR: Inclosed I send $5 for renewal and the picture book. My parents were conservativ Unitarians of the old school. They believed that Jesus Christ was a kind of a one-horse God, and worked the miracles recorded in the Christian mythology. But I suppose I must be a natural-born skeptic, for I was turned out of Sunday-school when I was nine years old for unbelief, which was fifty-eight years ago, and I hav been an Agnostic ever since. I pity these Christians. They believe in a hell and they are so afraid to die for fear they will go there. But times hav changed since my youthful days. At that time nearly all the orthodox sky-pilots preached damnation. Now many of them are actually preaching salvation, and quite a number of them preach the doctrins of their different creeds for the same reason that was given by an elderly gospel-pounder who when suspected of preaching what he did not believe and being questioned in regard to it, acknowledged the charge and said he had seven reasons for doing so, having a wife and six children. But why should you expect more from a sky-pilot than from a lawyer, who will advocate his client's cause when he knows the law and the facts are both against him, for the money that is in it? Both must liv, and human nature is the same the world over. M. D. PRIESTLEY.

BRADFORD, O., Oct. 19, 1890.

MR. EDITOR: Will you be so kind as to allow me to hav a say in your paper of right and justice, THE TRUTH SEEKER? It is needless to say that I am a Liberal, one of the uncompromising lot. I hav noticed several letters from friends who seem to think it is time for Liberals to form a secret order where all could worship without bowing to an imaginary being. I will say to Liberals of the world that on June 8, 1890, five Liberals of this place, after due consideration, formed themselvs into a society known as the Independent Order of Freemen, and since that time hav been adding strength. We now number fifteen members. The order is founded on purely benevolent and moral principles and progressiv in character. The object of the order is to elevate mankind to a higher plane of civilization, that truth, virtue, and honor may become the leading characteristics of the human soul. Vis, unita, fortioris, is our motto. All Liberals the world over who wish to learn more of us will do well by corresponding with Dr. B. G. Inman, secretary of the Independent Order of Freemen, Bradford, O.

Has not some one of the Liberal publishers a book that would be suitable as a family record? If there is not such a publication, there should be one, that all could accept.

J. W. SMITH.

[The "Freethinkers' Pictorial Text-Book" is furnished with blank interleaves when requested, and will meet your desires.—ED. T. S.]

FINDLAY, O., Oct. 25, 1890.

MR. EDITOR: Inclosed please find $2 for a copy of the "Freethinker's Pictorial Text-Book." This book is a great "hit," and by your hearty indorsers one cannot but feel out of the ring not to hav one also. I am sure I can get other subscribers for the work by showing the copy to them. Being a new subscriber, but, however, an old sympathizer at heart, I feared my recent query would not see the light of day in your paper; but I am glad to know it has, and expect a reply in your next issue.

For the sake of a modest but intelligent lady here, I beg leave to lead her to the light by having a couple of queries answered for her through your paper. She says, "I hear so much that matter is inert; that it has no power inherent to move itself, and if this is so, how do the nebulæ or any other particles of matter obtain the original motion that sets them revolving so swiftly, and from whose rarefactions and condensations our planets, stars, etc., are said to be produced or evolved?" Also: "Hav our spirit principles existed from eternity, since according to Spiritualism we will continue to liv in spirit land after death forever, and where were their abodes before entering our bodies; or, in succinct form, where is this spirit land the Spiritualists prate over so much, for surely entities require space, and especially so many millions of them?" These may be oft asked and answered queries, and hence sound stale. But so much the better—then they will be so much easier answered.

I hav the desire for the success of Freethought at heart, and always put in my little mite for dispersing superstition from the minds of those about me. Wishing you abundant success in this recent and very popular work, and promising my aid and patronage for the success of future works, I await reply, hoping soon to receive both the "Picture Book" and also the answers by some of your readers to the above queries. S. H. ZIMMERMAN.

EAU CLAIRE, WIS., Oct. 17, 1890.

MR. EDITOR: I infer from what Dr. Ayres has lately said in THE TRUTH SEEKER that he does not think much of the American Secular Union. It is not select enough. A man may belong to it and believe in ghosts. He may also be "a debauchee," whatever that is. No one will be likely to retort these charges against the Brotherhood of Agnostic Moralists. That organization is very select. Ingersoll once remarked that a Presbyterian minister had to swear annually that he had got no new ideas on the ghost question during the year. If he ever did get any, he was fit for a Presbyterian minister no longer. The Brotherhood of Agnostic Moralists "sees" the Presbyterian minister and goes one better. A Brother of that order must be ready to swear that he never will get any new ideas on the ghost question. This makes it very select intellectually, for while many will confess present ignorance about ghosts, few probably would like to promis future ignorance. The Brotherhood of Agnostic Moralists is as particular about the morals of its members as their Agnosticism. They must declare themselvs opposed to "polygamy, Anarchy, freeloveism, and such like evils." Here again the exclusivness of the Brotherhood of Agnostic Moralists beats that of the churches. I never heard of but one church (the English) which required even ministers to swear to an et cetera. It once did require them to swear that they would support the government of the church by "bishops, prests, etc." But the Puritans ridiculed the idea of swearing to et cetera so mercilessly that the term was soon dropped. The Brotherhood of Agnostic Moralists is no place for the man who cannot swear et cetera. He might faithfully renounce "polygamy, Anarchy, and freeloveism," but unless he is clear about suchlike, he would not do for an Agnostic Moralist. On the whole it seems to me the Agnostic Moralists would do well to substitute a Saxon term for a Greek one, and call themselvs knownothings.

C. L. JAMES.

RED CANON, WYO., Oct. 14, 290.

MR. EDITOR: In THE TRUTH SEEKER of Oct. 11, 290, Mr. Benton, of the Lone Star state, deals quite fiercely with the remarks of G. N., contained in THE TRUTH SEEKER of September 20th. G. N. did very wrong to speak the truth so plainly in regard to how and why the negro population of the South hav become so suspiciously white since they left their homes in Africa only two to four generations ago. Do not mulatto faces silently declare the truth of G. N.'s words? The South in slavery days obeyed the teachings of the holy book quite as faithfully perhaps as some of God's pets who held high office among his chosen people. The Mormons are said to do the same. G. N. has, no doubt, reasoned from these facts. He has seen mulattoes from the South. He has read the Bible. He is aware that the Bible was slavery's bulwark, and that Southern slaveholders entertained deep reverence for the book. Then he reaches the conclusion that his words express. What could be more logical?

But Mr. Benton accuses G. N. of entertaining hatred for the South. Perhaps he does not know that this individual has already scarcely lived in America long enough to become imbued with sectional animosities.

A leading divine once made the remark in slavery days that if Jesus Christ was on earth to-day, he would quite likely be a slaveholder.

Mr. Benton is quite well aware of the "spotlessness" of divines in general, and why should not slaveholders hav been like them under propitious circumstances?

It is the old, old mistake that some Southern people ever make by which Mr. Benton discerns a hatred for the South in G. N.'s remark. The fact is, if you hit a hobby of a Southern man, ten to one he thinks you hit him. The writer once came near having a personal combat with a Southern gentleman just because he remarked that the Bible was an obscene book, both immoral and untrustworthy. To-day Mr. Benton will admit that it would not be safe to repeat the words of G. N. in an assembly of Texan people. Yet in New York a man can blow the city government sky-high and even advocate slavery, and no one will get very angry about it. Once there was a place called the Holy Land, and woe to the man who in the Dark Ages dared to speak slightingly of it. Even in America to-day there are people who seem to regard certain areas as slightly Holy. Evils and abuses for which certain places hav become notorious are daily spoken of, but designate the place as South and some one will be sure to warn you to keep off Holy Ground. We hope that Mr. Benton will take no offense at this, for surely he, being a Liberal, cannot defend the book that was the defense of the slaveholder in the days when G. N.'s words, however unwise, were true. DR. C. E. BOYNTON.

ST. JOSEPH, MO., Oct. 12, 290.

MR. EDITOR: I had our bookseller here procure me a copy of the "Freethinker's Pictorial Text-Book." It is No. 1. Keep up the pictures. They are more expressiv than words.

I had the inclosed slip published in a local newspaper, but hav not had any answer yet. Please publish the same, as I would like to hear from some of my Spiritual friends in explanation of it. Yours, P. V. WISE.

WHAT WAS THIS?

About the 20th day of September, 1847, while walking through the lane between the barn and the dwelling-house on my father's farm, Siener's Creek in Grant county, Wis., I saw two persons driving a herd of about fifteen head of cattle on the road leading from Patterson's furnace and the post-office in Potosi, about five miles distant from the location where I was walking. I immediately recognized the two young men as being William Oldham and Thomas McQueen, and the cattle as belonging to some farmers residing in the valley of Boise creek.

When about half-way between Patterson's and Potosi, there was a by-road leading to the right, down the ridge to a cattle yard. McQueen called to his companion and directed him to turn the cattle to the right into this road and put them into the cattle yard, and that he would go on to Potosi. I distinctly heard a voice speak to me and declare that McQueen was the guiltier of the two, and was the one that induced William to take a part in the stealing of the cattle, but by the act would escape conviction. William drove the cattle on and put them in the cattle yard, shut the gate and went down the hill by a path and sold the cattle to a butcher in Potosi and received part payment therefor.

Afterwards on the trial McQueen was acquitted on the ground that he did not hav the cattle in his possession, and had not received any money from the butcher for them. How do you account for this?

By what means were the visual and auricular organs so enlarged that the transaction could be distinctly seen just as clearly as if the material body of the person stood by the roadside and looked on the deed as it was enacted before him, and the words were spoken by a person within a few feet of the listener?

In this there was no pre-arrangement, no fixing up of the details beforehand, for no such event had ever been anticipated by anyone, much less by myself.

Nothing could hav been more of a surprise to me. I did not believe in anything supernatural. Knew nothing of what some claimed to be the spiritual. The most singular part of the affair was that I saw it at the very moment the deed was being transacted, as was afterward proved on the trial in court. Though it made a lasting impression upon my mind, yet it did not of anything more than that I saw the whole transaction as clearly as I hav ever seen and comprehended any other actual scene or transaction during my natural lifetime. I was fully awake and walking as usual from the barn to the house. Can words be pronounced in an ordinary conversational tone without a material person of body and organs? If anyone can explain this affair in accordance with natural, or any other real laws. I will be thankful to him or her for doing so. P. V. WISE.

MARCELINE, MO., Oct. 18, 1890.

MR. EDITOR: I will once more contribute something that will probably benefit humanity. While I hav much pity for the misguided people of this earth, I can find no other resource than to fight them with reason. When I hear men and women who claim to be good Christians say that "if there is no hell there ought to be, to burn some people in," it only too truly proves to me that they possess a mean, malicious spirit of hatred toward their fellow-creatures of earth, and if it was within the limit of their power they would create a hell in which to roast the souls of those whom they dislike, and commit them to the everlasting punishment amid the brimstone flames, to remain throughout the never-ending ages of eternity. I do not infer that all Christians make such remarks. They do not. But all I hav heard make use of such language are firm believers in the Bible and the Christian faith and doctrius. Then right in the face of some of Christ's teachings, "Love your enemies, bless them that curse you, do good to them that hate you, and pray for them which despitefully use you, and persecute you" (Matt. v, 44), they say their enemies, and unbelievers, ought to be roasted. If this communication should fall under the eyes of any Christian believers who think if there is no hell there ought to be to punish some people in after death, I would hav them know why I do not sympathize with them: 1. Because they hav no feelings of mercy and would make a place to punish people in after death. 2. Because one who has no pity for one in endless agony, would without much consideration inflict pain and even death on people in this life. 3. Because they believe in capital punishment, which is in my opinion the most degrading scheme that humanity has devised. The death penalty has sown the seeds of murder in the hearts of countless hundreds. Many Christians of to-day say the death penalty is right because the Bible says, "If man sheds man's blood, by man shall his blood be shed." I would hav the Christian know that I do not believe in a hell of punishment after death; and that I do not believe the Bible to be the word of God, and as soon as I began to disbelieve these things I became more merciful. As long as man believes the Bible, that God has done all it says he has, and that he will commit his enemies to an endless punishment, just that long, for man to be Bible-God-like he must believe in punishment by death, and all other kinds of punishment. I believe the death penalty ought to be banished from the earth. And people should be taught to be merciful for humanity's sake. Once get the disposition to fight and kill educated out of the minds of the people, and I believe we will hav a better people. If there be a God, it is not probable that he would commit sinners and unbelievers to eternal punishment for the short period of existence here. Anyone who reasons cannot think it justice to punish beyond the realm of crime that has been committed. Eternal punishment when treated by reason conflicts with our knowledge of justice. Therefore no deep-thinking person that thinks and reasons for himself will want to punish beyond the realm of crime. And those who do are in most cases people who do not reason, but rely upon the preachers or priests, who are either deceived or are deceiving others. Those who rely upon the Bible, and what preachers and priests tell them, most generally lose that sense of justice which thinkers hav, and after they lose that sense of justice they are to be pitied. They, some of them, become murderers. Why, the Bible doctrin, I firmly believe, has made hundreds of criminals; has stirred up wars and caused the death and bloodshed of thousands of good and noble people. I believe if every lawyer when called upon for counsel would urge the people to settle their difficulties by arbitration rather than by lawsuits (and I believe they could in most cases be settled with far less expense by arbitration), a better feeling would exist between the people after they were settled. But so to do would injure the lawyer's profession. I believe everything possible should be done to get people to reasoning for themselvs; if all the people would reason for themselvs instead of listening to and believing the teaching of the Bible, people I believe would grow better, crime and murder would decrease, and the world would become better.

Yours for liberty of every kind that will be to the elevation of mankind, CHAS. A. GLENN.

DELAVAN, MINN., Oct. 23, 1890.

MR. EDITOR: If it will not consume too much of your valuable space, will you kindly insert the following article, to show the readers of THE TRUTH SEEKER how our brothers and sisters of the faith look at some things? The accompanying article, clipped from the Chicago Saturday Blade, is self-explanatory, and I will therefore add it in full.

A few weeks ago an editorial appeared in the Blade under the head of "Jonah and the big fish." The object of it was apparent to every Bible student; and that it answered the purpose intended we hav no doubt. We hav before us now a friendly criticism of the article from the gifted pen of W. L. Horton, of Delavan, Minn. We acknowledge the same with many thanks and would gladly publish it were it not for the fact that it would lead to extended discussions that might be dry reading to the vast majority of the Blade's many patrons, most of whom are already well up on Bible questions.

In closing his interesting communication Mr. Horton asks the religious editor to be kind enough to explain to him the beautiful lessons that were inculcated by Christ's sermon where it is said: "And when he was alone, they that were about him, with the twelve, asked of him the parable, and he said unto them: "Unto you it is given to know the mystery of the kingdom of God. But to them that are without, all these things are done in parables, that seeing, they may see and not perceive, and hearing they may hear and not understand, lest at any time they should be converted, and their sins should be forgiven them."

And Mr. Horton further asks, "If that multitude were afterward punished for disbelieving, who was to blame for it?"

Now the religious editor has decided views relativ to the matter, and would very cheerfully express them, but fearing they are not in accord with those of the questioner, who possibly seeks argument rather than light, he would be pleased to hav the explanation made and the questions answered by any or all of the Bible students who read the Blade. They may address Mr. Horton by letter, and the explanation and answer that he deems the most satisfactory of those he receives the Blade will most gladly publish. It will also giv the name of the successful person, as well as the names of all others who attempt to satisfactorily explain and answer. Address, W. L. Horton, Delavan, Minn.

As it would consume so much time and valuable space that might much better be used for nobler purposes, I will not ask for a review of the whole of my different tiffs with the faithful protectors of "divine" law, etc., but will take a single communication and my reply.

DECORAH, IA., Aug. 24, 1890.

W. L. HORTON, Delavan, Minn., Dear Sir: I noticed your question in the Saturday Blade of late date where you quote Mark iv, 11, 12, viz., "And he said unto them, Unto you it is given to know the mystery of the kingdom of God; but unto them that are without all these things are done in parables; that seeing they may see and not perceive, and hearing they may hear and not understand, lest at any time they should be converted and their sins should be forgiven them." Then you ask, If they are lost, whose fault is it? I answer, their own and Satan's fault. See verse 15: "But these are they by the wayside, where the word is sown; but when they hav heard the word, Satan cometh immediately and taketh away the word that was sown in their hearts." Notice, They see, they hear, but will not understand "the mystery of the kingdom of God," for the mystery is only revealed to those who will gladly receive the word. Observe that they may see, they may hear, also observe the word was sown, but they allowed Satan to take it away ere it could convert them. If you are not a member of the order of Freemasons, you know they hav mysterious signs in their order that you do not understand. You may see their ritual, even stand by when they identify each other by their mysterious signs, but do you perceive, do you understand? No. But if you gladly accept that word and with your heart allow the seed to take root, then is revealed the mystery. Is not God as wise as man? Will he allow a wicked man as a spy to come into his camp and after drawing a map of the mysteries of God's plan and his kingdom, go and deliver it to the devil? "Be not deceived, God is not mocked." The Freemasons deliver to you the mystery of their order when they know positivly that you are worthy, and will cherish it while life lasts. Just so with God, only he never makes a mistake, for he knows the motivs and interests of the heart. Yea, he knows more, "he knows his own" from the beginning. He knows whom you will serve, God or the devil. Nevertheless, we hav the choosing, for he says, "Choose this day whom ye will serve." God created "the covering cherub" who was "the sum full of wisdom" and "perfect in beauty," who "was in the Eden of God" and without sin till "iniquity was found in him." Then he "was cast to the ground" (Ezek. xxviii, 11-19), and since that time has been called Satan, devil, prince of darkness, etc. Did God put iniquity into his heart? No. This being was "the sum full of wisdom," and chose to rebel against God rather than love and serve him. Man was created a perfect being, and life and death set before him ("the tree of life, and the tree of knowledge of good and evil"). But man obeyed Satan rather than God, he chose darkness rather than light, he chose death rather than life. He saw the truth, he heard the truth, but would not perceive or understand, because he allowed the devil to sow untruth in his heart. There stood the tree of life. All Adam had to do was to stretch forth his hand and eat. God had given him free access to it, and so he does to-day. Jesus Christ is the tree of life. He is the mystery kept secret from the foundations of the world. Whosoever believeth that Christ is come in the flesh, is of God. God is no respecter of persons. Whosoever will may come and drink of the water of life freely.

If you say this is hard to believe, I answer that if you believe in a supreme being in whom is all wisdom, all power, and all glory, then with one spark of faith you can believe that he framed the worlds by his word (Jesus Christ); that he sent his son into the world, in the likeness of flesh, begotten by a virgin, and that he died and that God raised him from the dead, and that belief in him saves our souls alive. If you do not believe in this supreme being, then you are not consistent, for you know that matter exists, you know that matter is an effect, you know that there can be no effect without a cause, so in that very cause I point you to the everlasting, all-wise, all-powerful God. So I conclude that man is personally responsible to God for his every act, every word, every thought, and for receiving or rejecting the word of truth and Jesus Christ as his savior.

Respectfully yours, R. N. ADAMS.

DELAVAN, MINN., Aug. 26, 1890.

R. N. ADAMS, Minneapolis, Minn., Sir: According to the article in the Chicago Blade of August 16th, I hav no right to answer your letter, but as they arranged this affair without my consent I claim the right to be heard before judgment is passed, as it leaves me in a defenseless position.

As an entering wedge to your article you use Freemasonry as an illustration. I will also make an illustration.

We advertise that we are preparing for a grand mass meeting, and that good speakers will be in attendance, and above all others we emphasize that the Hon. John Lind will speak to the people upon the beauties and benefits to be derived from the McKinley bill. A few perhaps hav heard Mr. Lind speak upon this subject, but the great majority hav never heard a word from him or of his subject. Mr. Lind comes before the people, talks to them for an hour or so, and instead of talking to them in plain English he talks in Latin, or "speaks in parables." Even his own chosen followers do not understand him. And when asked why he thus talked, he explains that he did not want to enlighten the people, he did not want them to understand, and he did not want them to know the merits of the bill, lest they should know as much as he (or words to that effect). I ask you, what would you think of Mr. Lind?

I can see no explanation in your answer, and I reiterate my former query, "If that multitude were afterward punished, who was to blame for that punishment?" Remember I am talking of the very identical horde of people who listened to Jesus that day, and not to what or who listened to him after his parable had been explained to them. These people showed their willingness to learn the word of God, or they would not hav been present at this meeting, and then as now would they not hav left disgusted and refused to accept the meaning when made plain to them, as we certainly would do in the case of the political speaker? Your assertion not only will not hold water, but farther shows that the godhead you mention was completely at the mercy of the imp of darkness, as you style his satanic majesty. "Is not God wiser than man?" After careful perusal of his book I am forced to answer in the negativ, and I base my decision upon facts. If God is as wise as man, why do our theological scholars continually keep revising and changing the inspired word of God, who is so much wiser than they? You cannot deny but that the Bible is continually undergoing repairs at the hands of men.

"And will he allow a wicked man, as a spy, in his camp to draw a map of its mysteries and carry it to the devil?" God's camp should be so run that there would be no need of spying. Here you admit that God was afraid of the devil.

You say "God never made a mistake." Why, my dear sir, did not the flood furnish a receipt in full for his first fatal error? And did he not repent his making man?

"God created the covering cherub, who was perfect in beauty, who was full of wisdom, and who was without sin, who was in the garden of Eden, and the iniquity was found in him." Your one assertion severely belies the other. How could a being without sin be full of iniquity? And now answer me, if God had the power to cast Satan to the ground, why did he not keep him there and not allow him for ages to drag nine-tenths of the human race down to perdition? You claim God is all-powerful, yet you acknowledge his utter defeat at the hands of the devil.

You claim that if I believe in a supreme being in whom all wisdom, all power, and all glory are embodied, then with one spark of faith I cannot but help believe he framed the worlds by his word "Jesus Christ." I believe a part and a part I do not believe. Allow me to explain.

My God is Nature pure and simple, stern and exacting. She made this world all by herself without the aid of anyone, and she can run it without the aid of anyone. Faith I hav none; I believe in demonstrated facts. And I am confident that the God of nature is not revengeful, and will punish no one for what they are not blamable for. My God will not put a tempter in my path and then punish me if I be tempted, and I am just as confident that the cause I became the effect of, and which placed me here helpless and took care of me in my helplessness, will never allow me to go to some other world without providing for me there. I further believe my God will never punish me only as I punish myself. If I stick my finger in the fire, nature recoils and I am punished for my rashness, so I am confident that if I obey the laws of nature she will ever be kind to me. I base my belief on demonstrated facts, and nothing more.

Now for some more of your questions. Yes, sir, I know that matter exists and has so existed for hundreds of thousands of years, and not a paltry six thousand, as the man-made Bible would hav us believe.

These are all legitimate questions and should hav careful and considerate study, and as a searcher after Truth I propound them in all the candor at my command.

Yours searching for Truth, W. L. HORTON.

It is unnecessary to add that Mr. Adams is carefully considering these questions yet, and I think that it will be some time before he makes up his mind to reply.

Yours truly, W. L. H.

bacy, and that only tolerates marriage as a remedy for lust, as taught in the seventh chapter of 1 Corinthians. I repeat, that we want a higher morality than the morality of the New Testament.

The Bible should not be read in our common schools:

VII. Because the teachers can so manipulate it in reading as to favor their own particular views.

Now suppose we submit to the reading of the Hebrew and Christian Bibles in state schools, "without note or comment." Catholic teachers will read those chapters which speak of Peter as the rock upon which the church is founded, and of priests of whom it is said, "Whatsoever ye shall bind on earth shall be bound in heaven," and many similar passages which seem to favor the claims of the Romish hierarchy. Calvinistic teachers will giv prominence to the eighth and ninth chapters of the epistle to the Romans, and many other passages which teach election and reprobation, and eternal damnation for a majority of mankind. Orthodox teachers generally will hav no trouble in finding chapters which teach total depravity and vicarious atonement. Methodists will hav no trouble in finding "free grace and dying love" chapters. Universalists can fairly revel in universal salvation selections, while the Unitarians and Hicksite Quakers will hav no difficulty in finding passages going to show that Jesus was a mere man, and not a God. The Bible is very accommodating. You can find authority for anything in it! I knew a very conscientious Trinitarian teacher who told me that she read to her pupils a certain chapter in which occur the words, "There are three that bear record in heaven, the Father, the Son, and the Holy Ghost, and these three are one." This passage she always read over twice every day with emphasis, that her pupils might hav no doubt about the trinity. She afterward found out that orthodox scholars admit that that passage is an interpolation, and for this and other reasons she has become a first-class Unitarian, with a strong leaning toward Freethought.

The Bible should not be read in the public schools:

VIII. Because it would not secure the object contemplated.

The difficulty is that the mere reading of the Bible, in promiscuous selections, teaches neither morality nor religion; it amounts to nothing; it is a "sounding brass and a tinkling cymbal;" and this is why the Catholics very wisely object to it, and propose to hav parochial schools where they can teach religion. They hav a perfect right to do this, so long as they pay for them out of their own pockets, and do not ask the state to furnish the money, not even by asking exemption from just taxation. Let all the sects who want to teach religion do the same thing. . . .

The Bible should not be read in our state schools:

IX. Because it is a violation of the secular principle of the Constitution of the United States, and of the constitutions of the several states, which forbids the teaching of sectarianism at the public expense.

The United States government is a purely secular institution. Everybody knows that, and nobody knows it better than the people who want to put God and Christ and the Bible into the Constitution—which would be absurd if they are already there. Several state courts hav decided that sectarianism cannot be taught in our public schools, and that no religious exercises should be held, and that the reading of the Bible is a religious exercise, and that even "without note or comment" the Bible is a sectarian book. The danger is not that holy water and the counting of beads will be introduced into our state schools, or that the Westminster Catechism will become a text-book, but that Roman Catholics, Presbyterians, Episcopalians, and other sectarians will unite in the hue and cry against "godless schools," and go on organizing parochial or church schools, and ultimately demand a per capita division of the state school funds, and thus cripple, if not entirely destroy, our common school system. This is the main point we should consider; and we hav no time to lose. The question is now upon us, and the promis of votes for demagogs already threatens success. Our only safety is in a general amendment of the federal Constitution, so as to make a division of money raised by taxation for educational purposes in the several states impossible.

Dr. Westbrook was followed by Mrs. Freeman, whose subject was "The Battle for Bread." Some of the many bright things she said were:

In Chicago a young Catholic priest in the excitement of debate said: "You Secularists will never succeed in the taxing of church property, for we control the money, we control the power, and we control the votes."

During the month of July, in the United States Senate, a debate arose on the Indian appropriation bill. There were two or three bills demanding money from the government for the support of Catholic schools. These had passed the House. In the debate that ensued it transpired that Congress had been making appropriations to the various religious denominations—Catholic, Episcopal, Presbyterian, and Methodist—until the donations had reached the enormous sum of $1,238,786 to the Catholics within four years, and $761,583 to all the other denominations combined. And the Senators, the people's representativs, debating this question, dare not oppose the demand, because of the political power of the churches, and especially the Catholic church. The protest against the appropriations came from the Protestant sects, not because they had any scruples of conscience in regard to stealing from the people, but for the reason that the Catholics had secured a greater amount of boodle than themselvs. They demanded a larger share of the spoils. Is it not time that every American citizen should arouse to the gravity of the situation? . . .

In Chicago two Sisters of Charity offered to a real estate dealer two hundred lots near the city limits. Their price was $24,000. He regarded it as too high. We will get that, they said, or we will not sell. We do not hav to pay taxes and can afford to keep them until we secure our price. The church cannot grow richer without leaving the people poorer. Every stone, every pillar of gleaming marble, every illuminated temple window, every statue of saint that remains untaxed, rests a dishonest burden on the home of the toiler. . . .

The American Secular Union opposes all Sunday laws. Neither church nor state can justly deprive the people of their inalienable right to life, liberty, and the pursuit of happiness. The limit of that liberty is reached when it infringes on another's right. It does not reach that limit in the Sunday opening of parks, the theaters, the museums, or any legitimate place of public resort. It also opposes the reading of the Bible in the public schools. The people are taxed to support the schools, Protestant, Catholic, Jew, and gentile. No preference, then, can morally or constitutionally be given to any religion. There are other and grave objections to the reading of this old book. The doctrin of the divine right of kings is not healthy reading for future American citizens. It is not in accordance with the true spirit of democracy. Servants, obey your masters, is not the teaching requisit to the development of heroes ever ready to struggle for liberty. I am opposed to the reading of the Bible in the public schools, because it indorses the inferiority, the subjection, the enslavement of woman. Man needs no supernatural stimulus to sustain him in his egotistical claim to superiority. He inherits that instinct abundantly from his savage ancestor, who, taking advantage of the helplessness of his companion, relegated her to the position of slave. . . .

"Thou shalt not covet thy neighbor's wife." It does not say anything about the woman not coveting her neighbor's husband. The woman had no possession, no property, in a husband. The man might buy one wife or two, as Jacob served seven years for Rachel, and in the end was deceived into accepting Leah; then he served another seven years, and as probably there were no more girls in old Laban's family to be provided with husbands, he got the one he wanted—or like Solomon he may hav a thousand wives. And if these do not please him, do not find favor in his lordship's sight, he may write them a bill of divorce and send them away. The woman, the wife, had no power to send the husband away. She wrote no bill of divorce. As well expect the donkey to sell his master. She was his possession, his property, and he disposed of her at his will and pleasure. However low the man may hav been crushed in his battle for bread, there always remained the wretched, degraded, helpless woman of whom he was the owner. He has never been reduced to so absolute a servitude but that beneath him woman has not cringed, the slave of a slave. My Christian friends, in conclusion permit me to assure you that I hav not wished to say anything that might seem to you sacrilegious, but if your religion is a reality, if your God is a God of justice, might we not expect to find something of this in your works? When we behold you indifferent and the people starving, we question if you are the followers of him who enjoined that the hungry should be fed and the naked clothed. If you wish to assure us of your honesty, you can best do it by being honest. If you wish to demonstrate to us that your God is a reality, you can do this by conduct in conformity to what a just God would demand of you. If we do not find this justice, this honesty, in your acts, it proves an alibi for your God!

If you are sincere you will not permit the people to assume one penny of your just burdens. There is not a single industry exempt from taxation—from the consolidated trusts, the wealthy manufacturer, down to the wretched child selling matches in the street, each and all pay tribute to the government. And that just proportion, my Christian friends, which you do not pay on your temples, is added to the people's burden as a tithe. Is there any good reason why Trinity church, a wealthy Christian corporation owning millions of dollars' worth of property, should be exempt, and the poor man compelled to assume the burden by an additional tax levied on his home? And in possession of this corporation is to be found wretched, ill kept, ill ventilated tenement houses, where the human rats and the four-footed rodents tumble in together.

"Let the reformer hitch his wagon to a star," said Emerson. Secularism, more daring than this, has hitched its wagon to a galaxy of stars. An old flag flung to the breeze a hundred years ago, blown hither and thither by many adverse winds, blood-red at first, then changing from crimson to red, white, and blue, tattered and torn, rising and falling amid shot and shell on many a battlefield—that flag waves over the peaceful tents of the Secularist's encampment to-day.

SUNDAY MORNING.

A large share of this morning was given up to the church champions who also advocate the reforms of the American Secular Union. The first was Rabbi Phillipson, of Cincinnati, an eloquent and pleasing speaker who defended the Jewish faith and the Jewish people, and then ardently advocated the Nine Demands. He was followed by Judge Waite, of Chicago, who brought forward the facts which urgently demand the support and multiplication of Secular Unions. In a subsequent issue we intend to print his address entire. The judge was succeeded by Professor Corliss, the secretary of the National Religious Liberty Association, a Seventh Day Advent organization. Professor Corliss also defended the Bible, and made several bad historical slips in so doing, but made amends by describing the work of his society and how it has opposed the iniquitous legislation of the church.

SUNDAY AFTERNOON.

In the afternoon, Mr. Washburn and Mr. Wakeman were down for speeches, but they shortened them up a little to giv Mr. Charlesworth an opportunity to be heard. Mr. Washburn's subject was "The Sunday Question:"

The ground of sacredness upon which all holy days rest, he said, is religious ground. Most people see nothing sacred in man or man's work, but to them God is holy and all that is done in God's name is sacred. The only sacredness that is worth a cent, is that which surrounds man's life, man's home, man's rights. We hold, a day that is devoted to work or recreation is holier than one consecrated to worship. We hold that the man who labors on Monday for his wife and babes is doing a more sacred act than he does on Sunday when he goes to praise God. We hold that deed to be holiest that most benefits the human race.

We cannot protect the Sabbath with a Bible text. Men and women hav found that the pulpit has deceived them. They were once made to believe that God was a Sunday policeman who arrested everybody that did not pass the Sabbath in orthodox fashion, but they cannot be fooled again. When a man has staid away from church all day Sunday and found himself alone at night, he begins to think that somebody has lied to him, and is ready for a greater indulgence the next Sabbath. Human experience is at variance with the church's warning.

Man has found that he was just as safe on the beach or in the woods as he was in a church on the Sabbath, and that no God molested him or made him afraid. Take the word God out of the Sunday question, and it resolves itself into what is right and good for man. In discussing this question only one object should be kept in view—the good of mankind. The exaltation of what is human is the chief characteristic of this age. Let our motto be, "Sunday for man, not for God."

A Sunday law is the last weapon of ecclesiastical tyranny. The American people ought to be great enough and sensible enough and tolerant enough to hav no Sabbath. They should liv as though one day was as good as another. In this age there ought to be no chance for a set of men to stand up and claim one day in seven for their particular use. Why should Christians say every Sunday morning: This day is ours; and we will punish anyone who does differently from what we do on this day? The battle between the ministers and the people for the possession of Sunday, is still going on. It is a struggle on the one side for a private prerogativ, and on the other, for human rights. Before the dawn of the next century, it will probably be decided who owns Sunday—the Christian church or the world. I favor the abolition of an ecclesiastical Sabbath. I would take this word from the brow of Sunday. I would emancipate man from the idea that one day is holy and another day unholy. I am in favor of throwing open the whole universe to man, alike on all days, holding him responsible at all times for his behavior. What man wants to do now is, to kill every Sunday law on our statute books; he wants to redeem Sunday from superstition, take it out of the hands of the priest and minister and dedicate it to humanity.

Mr. Charlesworth followed Mr. Washburn. In introducing him President Westbrook said: "During the present Congress it has been unanimously recommended that Mr. John R. Charlesworth, of New York, should be appointed a field lecturer and organizer, and it is desirable that he should be heard by the members of the Union and its friends. I hav great pleasure in introducing him." Mr. Charlesworth said:

A fact which to-day no one can deny with impunity, a fact which must be apparent to even the most casual observer, a fact which is thoroughly established and clearly recognized by the whole intellectual world, is that the present age is a period of theological decay. Throughout the whole theological world constant internal dissensions and changes are taking place. Old faiths and the old traditional beliefs, formerly indulged in with so much pertinacity, are now surely being replaced with new ideas. They are surely and irrecoverably passing away into a museum of superstitions. The burning question to-day is not whether the essentials of faith are true, but what course of conduct is most conducive to human happiness. Moral causation, or motivs to righteousness, are not of supernatural origin, but they exist in human nature itself, and they exist independently of any theological belief. They are to be determined solely by human reason and human experience, or the common nature and the common wants of mankind. The only true definition of Secularism is to say that it is the moral conduct of man drawn from considerations purely natural as distinguished from the supernatural. Secularism bids in labor for mankind, to promote human progress, to increase human happiness, and declares that this is the only possible means of effecting the true and complete emancipation of the human race, the only course of conduct capable of uplifting a downtrodden humanity, and placing them on the road toward perfecting the practical attainment of that earthly paradise upon which many writers and speakers are wont to dwell. Secularism, while affirming man's responsibility to man, denies man's responsibility to God, and it even goes further, declaring that if man is really and truly God-made, then God should be held responsible to man for man's imperfections, that is, he should be held responsible for his own imperfect work, and not presume to mete out punishment upon those who are his creatures and who had no control over their own being. Secularism also declares that prayer to the unknown and unknowable is worse than a mockery, for it is a useless abasement of the intellect. Human supplication to an imaginary God has for ages stormed the citadels of heaven, but it has ever gone unheard; if not unheard, then it has been unheeded.

What hope, what light,
Falls from the farthest, starriest way
On you that pray? Can ye beat
Back one wave with prayer? Can
Ye move mountains, or bid a flower
Take flight and turn to a bird in the air?

The president, interrupting: "Is that the Nine Demands? What has that to do with them?"

Mr. Charlesworth (evidently annoyed): "I am sorry if my remarks are not pleasing to the president, and I think I should retire."

Mr. Charlesworth retired, but the audience and members on the stage were plainly astonished and dissatisfied.

The president proceeded to introduce the next speaker, Mr. T. B. Wakeman, of New York, as one of the former presidents of the Secular Union, a lawyer of prominence, and candidate for a judicial office at the pending election.

A large portion of the audience arose and began to leave the house.

Mr. Wakeman: "The unpleasant incident which has just occurred evidently calls for an explanation, and then for a square statement as to the nature of this Congress, its relation to the local Unions and other organizations represented in it and the topics discussed in them. Let those who are leaving to take a train do so quietly, and let all others return and be seated, and all will come out right. But before going on with any further statement let me say that I am quite sure that our venerable president, probably owing to a partial deafness, has misapprehended the remarks of the last speaker, which seemed to be in order if properly understood. I move, therefore, that Mr. Charlesworth be requested to return and finish his address, including that bit of poetry about prayer."

The burst of applause which greeted this motion from both stage and house showed that the audience was with Mr. Charlesworth, and the president at once invited him to go on with his address, which he did in this wise:

LADIES AND GENTLEMEN: I certainly must thank this large and enthusiastic audience for their kindness toward me, also for their appreciation of what I hav said, and for showing by their action that they demand for me my right to freedom of speech, but nevertheless I could only take the questions and interruption by our president as a direct insult to myself. [When the audience became reseated Mr. Charlesworth continued:] I was about to show by the few remarks which I had made upon prayer that Secularism denies the possibility of an arbitrary special providence, and affirms that science is the only providence of man; that science and a conformity with its teachings is the only lever which can upraise mankind. Morality is a natural growth, it is not a supernatural impulse. It is distinct and separable from theology, therefore the idea that our sense or conceptions of morality hav had a supernatural origin has been relegated to the realm of speculation and superstition. An earnest consideration of human wants and a deep sympathy with human needs must be the best and truest guidance of human conduct. For a person who can be influenced to do good, or restrained from doing evil, by the bribe of a heaven or the base fear of hell can only be actuated by personal and selfish motivs. Such a cause would to my mind hav a decided tendency to make mankind worse instead of better. I am warned that there are other speakers to come after me, therefore I must be brief. We are frequently denounced and condemned for our attacks upon the orthodox creed, but when we look around us and see these ghastly religious systems with their gaudy wealth, and who by their numbers and influence would consign us to oblivion, who can deny us the right to oppose the popular creed? When we see them stealing places of power, bribing the press, usurping a fictitious supervision over the education of our children, who can deny us the right to oppose the popular creed? When we see them opposing reforms intended for the improvement and the advancement of our race, when we see them dealing with supernaturalism and mythology as though they were actual facts, when we see them trying to deprive us of the right to spend our Sunday rationally, leaving us no alternativ but the church and the liquor store, when we witness these outrages and injustices perpetrated upon mankind by a superstitious and arrogant priesthood, who, I ask, and this time with more emphasis, who can deny us the right to oppose the popular creed? Our intention then is to oppose it in the future as we hav opposed it in the past, so as to make impossible a return to those dismal and oppressiv times known as the Dark Ages—a period of priestly power and intolerance, a period which never would hav been had man but known

'Twas not for him to look on high
For Eden's fabled glow,
But to clear away the weeds and make
A paradise below.
To make this world e'er better,
More noble and more true,
A fitter world to liv in
Than ever his fathers knew.
Had man but placed his heaven
On earth instead of sky,
Had he but discarded Gods,
For man to liv and die;
With noble impulse in his heart,
High grandeur on his brow,
He might himself, poor dreamer,
Been godlike long ere now.

THE PRESIDENT: "Now, you will certainly, and in a spirit of fairness, be willing to hear a few words from me. First, let me say, that no one is more inclined to favor and to maintain freedom of speech than I, and that I personally entertain substantially the same views in regard to prayer which I believe the speaker expressed. But, then, as I heard them, they seemed liable to be construed by many as outside of the objects of our Congress as expressly embodied in our constitution. Those objects are the total separation of church and state, and the Nine Demands which are set forth in detail as necessary to accomplish that result. Now, to aid in this accomplishment, we hav invited very many other societies and sects, or distinguished speakers belonging to them, who agree with us as to the necessity of the separation of church and state, but who would not at all agree with the last speaker, or with many of us, about the nature of prayer, or many other religious observances. They will say, Are such expressions Secularism? For instance, the Hebrew rabbi, Dr. Phillipson, and Prof. J. O. Corliss, secretary of the National Religious Liberty Association, delivered before us this very morning addresses in support of our main objects so able and effectiv that I can hardly imagin how anything could be more useful to our cause. Yet both of these friends spoke with no little feeling about comments which seemed to them wanton attacks upon things, to them, most sacred, which had been made by myself and others on this platform last evening. Therefore, before this large and miscellaneous audience to-day, it seemed to me that our young advocate might, to advantage, forbear a general attack upon what, to many who act with us, is still a cherished expression of religious feeling. So I ventured to intimate this to our younger lecturer in an undertone, so that he might explain the relation of the topic to the Nine Demands. My motiv was to extend, rather than to limit, his range and freedom of speech, and I know it was the furthest possible from any thought of an insult. I sincerely regret that the speaker took my suggestion in that unfortunate way. We hav no more time to spend over it, and I ask the next speaker to proceed with his address."

Mr. Wakeman said:

The incident which a few minutes ago seemed so unfortunate furnishes a happy, may I not say a necessary, occasion for a short explanation of the history and nature of the American Secular Union—its Congress, its auxiliaries or local societies, and their relation to other bodies and to Secularization in its full meaning and application.

The American Secular Union is the successor to the National Liberal League which was organized at Philadelphia July 4th, in the centennial year, 1876, by many of the most distinguished Liberals of the United States, for the main object of securing the total separation of church and state. The purpose of its founders was to establish many auxiliary societies, whose delegates should, together with life and annual members, constitute the succeeding annual congresses. Congresses of this character hav been held annually ever since, of which the present is the last. At the congress held at Cassadaga Lake, N Y., in 1887, the name was changed from the National Liberal League to the American Secular Union, and its mode and purpose of organization were sought to be made more effectiv. This was found to be necessary chiefly from the fact that besides the original object of national and state Secularization other objects, such as universal education, universal suffrage, opposition to Comstockism, and several others, had been by resolutions or otherwise added to its simple purpose of separation of church and state embodied in the Nine Demands. Many believed these additions to be sources of division and weakness. In addition to this fact Charles Watts had then come to America and was about to settle in Canada as the representativ of the Secular societies of England, which he designed to hav imitated as the basis of Liberal or Secular organization in America. It was, therefore, determined to drop the old form of the Liberal League which tried to do too many things, and to adopt the plan of the United States federal government, which might also annex and include the Canada societies if they should wish. Thus the Secular societies of all America were to be federated. The societies or unions should hav power to add to their objects beyond the Nine Demands as they should see fit, but the Congress to be composed of delegates and special life or other members should be a representativ body limited to the purpose of the separation of church and state as embodied in the Nine Demands. The local unions were to be adapted to home wants and duties, unlimited and unrestricted as to their subjects and modes of procedure, and for them the central or national body should in no wise be responsible as to their "acts or utterances." In addition to these local auxiliaries other Liberal Christian and Hebrew societies accepting our general purpose of state Secularization are invited to send delegates or speakers to our national Congress; and as our president has told you, many of our most useful advocates are thus obtained.

The national body, or Congress, is limited to Secularization in the broadest sense as applied to the state, and not to "any system of religion or philosophy." This you will see in the third and twelfth articles of our constitution. This simple imitation of our federal or United States Constitution, by which we hav unlimited home rule and expansion of state and local bodies, with union and concentration of the strength of all for the general and common purpose of all, is the best plan possible, as all Americans know, but it has, with its advantages, some disadvantages. For instance, the chief of these is the necessity of inviting those of extremely divergent views on every other topic except political Secularization, to take part in our Congresses held for that purpose. We must try to get over this difficulty by mutual intellectual and spiritual hospitality, and by cultivating a toughness of cuticle among ourselvs and our invited friends as to its apparent infractions. I say apparent infractions, for they hav been, and seldom will be, real. For as long as our theological fellow-citizens will insist upon the infraction of Secular government by forcing the Bible into our public schools, chaplains into public bodies, and the exemption of churches from taxation, all at our cost, certainly we are bound to inquire, what are their Bible, their prayers, and their churches worth? If our Liberal Christian, Hebrew, and Spiritual friends do not like to hav this done fearlessly, let them not, for that reason, abandon their plain duty to coöperate with us for state Secularization, but let them go to their orthodox brethren and induce them to withdraw their sacred affairs from that public support which makes public, secular, scientific, and hostil criticism of them absolutely necessary. The Nine Demands cover every one of these topics, and our venerable president, in his lecture last evening, was within Secular politics and the Nine Demands when he proved that the Bible is now one of the chief dangers of our country, because it is the pretense and wedge by which our common school system, the real cornerstone of our republic, is being overturned. So also was our young friend Mr. Charlesworth in order to-day in showing the utter futility and danger of prayer—of the praying system of legislation which we hav constantly to pay for at Washington, and in nearly every legislature in our country.

Mr. Washburn has just been in order in grandly exposing Sunday, because of Sunday legislation. Nay, I claim that I shall be in order when I try to show, this afternoon, that all the churches and their supernatural systems of theology are no longer worth exempting from taxation, because scientific Secularization has been extended so as to secure a sounder, safer, and in every way a better system of philosophy, religion, morals, and practical and emotional life than theologians hav inherited from their barbarous predecessors. Now it is very properly one of the objects of many of our local Secular Unions (as of the one at Newark, N. J., represented here by Mr. Charlesworth, for example) to displace the churches by a practical introduction and use of this Secular faith according to knowledge. It is certainly not best to repress these radical and complete Secularists and Liberals for fear of offending, without real cause, those who hav only begun to exceptionally apply Secularism to the state and in politics. Let them brace up and learn that what is so good in politics is equally good in religion, and in every other domain of human nature and endeavor. We never complain of what they say in reply, we take our punishment like men, but to expose the whole supernatural business is a duty from which we cannot escape as long as it is run at our expense and forced upon us by law. Without further apology, or rather justification, I shall proceed to lay before you the outline of my lecture on "The Three Saving Words of the New, the Secular Era, Commencing A.D. 1600, Era of Man 290—and Which Words Are Liberty, Science, and Humanity, or in Practice: Liberate, Educate, Consecrate."

SUNDAY EVENING.

The closing session of the Congress was given to Mr. Watts and Voltairine de Cleyre. The unpleasant effects of the afternoon episode had passed away, and again the house was crowded to the roof. Mr. Watts was announced to speak on "The Church and the Throne," but at the request of several he changed his subject in order to giv the people of Portsmouth an idea of what Freethought principles are. Had he given his lecture as first announced, he would, he said, hav dealt with three fundamental errors connected with church and state—that the alliance of church and state is necessary for the good of society; that the church is necessary for the welfare of the state; that it is the duty of the state to render special service to the church. After briefly speaking upon these points Mr. Watts began his exposition of Secularism, and for an hour the audience paid him the closest attention. The lecture was just what was needed, and gave the Portsmouth Secularists great satisfaction. As to alliance with religious societies, Mr. Watts said that the Union must, to be successful, recognize the discussion of theological subjects. The greatest obstacle to the Nine Demands is orthodoxy. Therefore its influence must be destroyed. It is a mistake to rely on the religious world for aid.

Mr. Watts was followed by Voltairine de Cleyre, who enlightened the people upon the standards of morality which men and women hav who do not recognize a supreme authority. Her discourse was mainly metaphysical, but able, and greatly pleased the editor of the Open Court, who is something of a metaphysician himself.

This was the last session of the Congress, which was marked by some unpleasant occurrences, but in the main the delegates and visitors thought it was good to be there, taking leave of each other regretfully and expressing hopes to meet again next year.

THIS issue of THE TRUTH SEEKER, owing to Tuesday's elections and the distance of the Secular Union Congress from New York, is thirty-six hours late.

Lectures and Meetings.

AT the Liberal Club, 220 East Fifteenth street, next Sunday evening, Charles Watts will lecture on "Religion, With and Without Theology"—a rare opportunity for Liberals of this city.

MR. LONGFORD, of the Philadelphia Friendship League, writes: "It gives me very great pleasure to inform you and the readers of THE TRUTH SEEKER that we had two splendid audiences October 26th to hear the celebrated Australian lecturess, Miss Ada Campbell. The only misfortune was that the hall proved to be too small to seat all the people, as the aisleways and doorways were completely blocked with eager listeners to hear the gifted and talented Ingersollian of the colonies. She held the audience spellbound for two hours with her eloquence, argument, and wit. I would advise all Liberal societies that could procure her services, to do so at once, as I learn that she is only making a short stay in this country. Her terms are reasonable, and I am sure she will fill the bill as a propagandist for Freethought wherever she goes. It grieves me to think that such talent and ability should be idle for want of employment. In her reply to her critics, she reminds me of Charles Watts, by her dealing out such sledgehammer blows, that entirely disarm her opponents. I will say in conclusion that we expect to secure her services for two or more lectures the Sunday following Mr. Watts, if possible."

What They Say About the Picture Book.

J. D. Shaw in the Independent Pulpit.

This is a wonderful book and will do effectiv work in showing the absurdity and untruthfulness of the church's claim to be a divine and beneficent institution, and in forecasting the abuses of union of church and state. It is a book of 400 pages, 12x9 inches, bound in boards, with illuminated cover, and contains 185 full-page illustrations by the artist, Watson Heston, with copious citations of fact, history, statistics, and opinions of scholars to maintain the arguments of the artist. It is published by the Truth Seeker Company, 28 Lafayette place, New York. Price: $2.

New Publications.

Unless otherwise specified, all publications noticed here can be had of THE TRUTH SEEKER COMPANY, at the prices named.

L. Fidelia Wooley Gillette has collected a lot of what she considers her brightest sayings, and Fowler & Wells hav put them into a little square pamphlet, which is dear enough at twenty-five cents, called "Editorial and Other Waifs." Fowler & Wells no doubt published the book at the expense of the author.

"Sex Slavery," for 5 cents, is a rhapsodical and rather carelessly written defense of Moses Harman It purports to be a lecture before the "Unity Congregation" of Philadelphia (whatever that organization may be) by Voltairine de Cleyre, and is published by Lucifer. The text of the sermon is that the earth is a prison, the marriage-bed a cell, women the prisoners, and men the unregenerate and much-to-be-condemned keepers.

"Human Magnetism," by H. S. Drayton, M.D., is published by Fowler & Wells Co. It considers the latest phases of the subject, including its nature, physiology, and psychology, with its uses as a remedial agent, in moral and intellectual improvement, etc. It is a work that is likely to attract a good desl of attention, and its value to purchasers depends upon whether one's bump of credulity is sufficiently developed to believe the marvelous tales it contains. Price, $1.

Mr. Green says that the Freethinkers' Magazine for November contains much valuable matter. A fine portrait of Dr. Joseph Rodes Buchanan constitutes its frontispiece, and its pages contain a sketch of his life. The leading articles are: "Aristotle's Agreement with Modern Ideas of Virtue," by Sarah A. Underwood; 'God in the Constitution," by Col. Robert G. Ingersoll; "The Sorrows of God," by George Jacob Holyoake. The Literary and Editorial Departments are unusually interesting, in which are communications from Parker Pillsbury, Lucy N Colman, Susan H. Wixon, F. May Hollaud, "Agnosticus," and other noted Liberal writers. For sale at this office. Price 20 cents.

The November Popular Science Monthly maintains its high average. Herbert Spencer opens the number with an essay on "The Origin of Music," in which he discusses the opposing views of Darwin and others. The address of Prof. T. C. Mendenhall, as president of the American Association for the Advancement of Science, appears in this number. In an illustrated article on the "Root-tip," Frederick L. Sargent tells how the root of a plant makes its way through the soil, and takes up nourishment for the plant. "My Class in Geometry," by George Iles, is a specimen of practical geometry teaching that is free from the usual dryness of the study. The other articles are also important in their several lines. In the "Editor's Table," "Hindrances to Scientific Progress" and "The Library as a Laboratory" are the topics treated. Fifty cents a number, $5 a year.

Another attempt to explain the Apocalypse has been made—this time by Charles E. Smith in a 75 cent book, published by Funk & Wagnalls, called "The World Lighted." In his preface Mr. Smith says: "It is surely not a situation to be regarded with complacency by the Christian world, that one of the principal books of the Bible remains uncomprehended and practically useless." Comprehending so fully the difficulty in which the Christian world is placed by having the meaningless raving of Revelation included in their Bible, it is also a pity that Mr. Smith cannot better help his brethren in trouble, for his explanation is as incoherent and absurd as the others. He skips words and isolated sentences without rhyme or reason, and as might be expected makes confusion worse confounded. There is no good reason for accepting any of his conclusions.

The "Agnostic Annual" for 1891, edited by Charles A. Watts, son of his father, has reached our side of the Atlantic ocean. Its contents are: An Agnostic View of the Bible, Samuel Laing. Fundamental Theses of Agnosticism, R. Bithell, B.Sc., Ph.D. Agnosticism and the Church of England, Amos Waters. Avatar, Come! A Poem, Saladin (W. Stewart Ross). The Instability of Faiths, Hon. C. K. Tuckerman. The Iron Hand Under the Velvet Glove, G. J. Holyoake. Practical Religion, Charles Watts. The Cinerary Urn: A Sonnet, author of "Cæsar in Egypt." The new Anglicanism, B. Russell. Androgynous Gods, H. J. Hardwicke, M.D., F.R.C.S. Is Agnosticism Sound? Paul Carus. Is Agnosticism Sound? Saladin (W. Stewart Ross). The Poems of Joseph Ellis, Mirabeau Brown. Price, 25 cents. For sale at this office.

Those who desire to know wherein Science and the Bible differ should send us 15 cents for a pamphlet by this title written by Charles Watts. Mr. Watts is a diligent reader of science's latest finds, and also thoroughly conversant with the collection of ancient legends and incomplete history known as the Bible. The subjects dealt with in this volume are, The Potency of Science, The Bible and Science, The Bible and Creation, The Origin of Man, Creation: Time and Material, The Bible Account of the Origin of Death, The Bible Deluge, The Mosaic Account of the Flood: Scientific Objections. Mr. Watts has brought forward a large number of authorities in science to contradict the Bible, and he arrays them methodically and reasons logically (as is his wont) to convince his readers (many of whom we hope will be churchmen) that the Christian's sacred book is by no means reliable in statement; that is to say, the relation does not correspond in its subjectiv order of thought with objectiv phenomena as now known to science, and this fault, we believe, constitutes falsehood. The pamphlet should be well circulated among believers in the Old Testament.

"One Man's Struggle" is a book by the Rev. G. W. Gallagher, once a minister of Keene, N. H., now located at Montpelier, Vermont. It is a record of his fight to put down liquor-selling in Keene, thinly disguised by the novel form. As a story it is worthless and uninteresting; as such record only has it a place in literature. It shows what one man can do, helped by law and phariseeism. What he did for the city of Keene we know from our own knowledge. He shut up the principal hotel in town; drove liquor-selling to the shanties in the dark streets on the outskirts of the town and to a bawdy house on Beech Hill; enriched the drug stores and some liquor dealers in Boston, who supply the people in bottles; made the city uncomfortable for commercial travelers and the general public who don't get drunk; and finally had to leave town himself because of the opposition his crusade excited. But he did not lessen the consumption of alcoholic drinks. Those who want Medford rum can get it in Keene in any quantity from a half pint to a barrel. Since the receipt of the book we hav taken the trouble to find out these facts, as Keene is an old residence of ours, and a place, we thought, from its puritanical habits, where Prohibition would prohibit if it would anywhere. Funk & Wagnalls publish the book for 75 cents.

Helen Weston writes in the Twentieth Century of one of our own books: "D. V. A. in 'Christian and Deist and the Prophets,' givs a business man's views upon religious and social matters. He writes for those seeking after truth in the scriptures. 'Christian and Deist' is written in the form of a dialog, though the Christian has little to say, and most of the talking is done by the Deist, who admits nothing as true without authority. He says it is a disputed question and very doubtful whether the first four books of the New Testament were written by those to whom they were attributed, or whether they hav not been changed and altered to suit the priests of a past age. He givs a few extracts from the 'Fathers of the Church,' that people may draw their own conclusions as to whether or not the 'fathers' altered the gospels to suit themselvs. St. Hermas, bishop of Philipopolis, A D. about 100, says: 'I never spake a true word in my life, but always lived in dissimulation and affirmed a lie for truth to all men, and no man contradicted me, but all gave credit to my word.' Then again Eusebius, bishop of Cæsarea, A.D. 315, says he 'has related whatever might redound to the glory, and he has suppressed all that could tend to the disgrace, of religion.' Several other extracts follow, together with much information of what is true and what cannot possibly be true in the Bible. The author ends by endeavoring to portray a vision of what this world might be were many of the old superstitions destroyed. 'The Prophets' contains much of the same thought, but the stories are told in verse and in a somewhat sarcastic manner, which renders them less interesting. When he says of the Bible, 'Mankind were better if the book were burnt,' and 'worthlessness is shown on every page,' I think he makes a mistake." Miss Weston ought to point out the mistake.

"Reminiscences." By Lucy N. Colman. With portrait of the author. Preface by Amy Post. Price $1 Published by H. L. Green; sold at this office. As these recollections of ante-bellum and anti-slavery times were first published in THE TRUTH SEEKER, our readers already know their value. Some of our Southern readers did not like them, but as they are solid facts, that fault should not be charged to the author, but rather to the infamous social economy that so long held millions of human beings in chattel slavery. To us they are extremely interesting as revealing glimpses of the hardships and dangers encountered by that splendid band of heroes called Abolitionists, of which Mrs. Colman, Elizur Wright, Parker Pillsbury, Wm. Lloyd Garrison, and a few others were the leaders. Mrs. Colman is an intense lover of liberty, a hater of meanness by whomsoever manifested, a deep moralizer, endowed with courage to say what she thinks, and with ability to make her stories read like thrilling romances. These "Reminiscences" are history and tales of chivalry combined. That in numberless instances they reflect upon churches and Christianity is to be expected. All truthful history does that. And now that slavery is abolished, and the church with her usual brazenness is claiming the credit for it, this book and Parker Pillsbury's "Acts of the Anti-Slavery Apostles" should be widely circulated, that the truth may be known. And another reason—which Mrs. Colman may not thank us for mentioning, but which the Liberals ought to know—is that as Mrs. Colman is not possessed of too many dollars, the purchase will help her to be a little more comfortable for the few (would they could be a thousand!) years she is with us. Our gatherings will sorely miss the Mother of Liberalism, as she is affectionately called, when age and infirmity shall keep her at home. Buy her book, read and keep it, and cherish the author for her magnificent services to freedom of body and mind!

FOR HER DAILY BREAD.

A NINETEENTH CENTURY NOVEL.

Preface by R. G. INGERSOLL.

For Her Daily Bread is the story of two young girls and a younger brother who were left parentless, with little money, fair education, and much courage, to make their way through the world by going to Chicago. The author is also the heroin. The narrativ is, in the main, a history of a working girl's life and experience in the city of Chicago among bluff business men, kind hearted folks, and disreputable hypocrits. It is just such a story of human life as we should expect Colonel Ingersoll to be interested in; and whatever he admires and appreciates is sure to be worth the attention of the rest of the world. Price 25 cents.

AT THINE OWN HOME.

Send 10 cents to Dr. R. P. Fellows, the noted specialist, for his "Private Counselor"—a valuable book for young and middle-aged men, suffering from a Life-wasting Disease, as the result of youthful follies, indiscretion, and excesses in maturer years. It sets forth an External Application—A POSITIVE CURE, as it matters not how long standing, how hopeless or how many remedies you hav used. The book is worth many times its cost, and should be in the hands of those seeking a speedy and permanent cure. Address the doctor at Vineland, N. J., and say where you saw this advertisment.

A GOOD WORD.

Dr. Fellows is an outspoken Liberal, a humanitarian, and a generous patron of the Freethought press. He has many testimonials to the value of his progressive and successful method of treatment, and deserves patronage.—Freethought.

TRY-SQUARE:

OR,

The Church of Practical Religion.

BY REPORTER.

This is the history of an attempt to found a church without superstition, and its success. Uncle Job Sawyer, the pastor, having established his pulpit, uses it to discuss all the vital questions of human concern, religious, political, and otherwise. The book is written in well-chosen language, and easily understood. There is just sufficient narrativ about it to interest the reader and hold his attention while the truth is being brought to his mind.

Notes and Clippings.

IT is a bare matter of fact to say that Voltaire never knew what a vacant moment was. Planning, writing, revising, or directing the performance of a play; composing some pamphlet which, read by every cultivated person in Europe, would furnish fertil food for many an hour's conversation in courts and coteries; penning or dictating letters, of which the series is so inexhaustible that Charles Nodier is reported to hav said, "What! more unpublished letters of Voltaire! The only end to them will be the end of the world!"—The Gentleman's Magazine.

THOSE orthodox people who flatter themselvs by supposing that the position of women is superior in Christian countries to what it has been in any other nation, should read the paper given at the Women's Congress by Miss Georgia Louise Leonard, of Washington, upon "Women in Ancient Egypt." She describes how the influence and authority of women then extended through all the spheres of life. In fact, women held in almost every aspect a position equal to that of men. To the recognition of female rights may be attributed the prosperity of the great Egyptian empire.

THERE are lots of distilleries in Peoria, Ill., says the Hastings, Mich., Plaindealer, but a few days ago the Lord passed them all carefully by and burnt up the Presbyterian church, and to hav his amusement more interesting and funny the time chosen was when the edifice was filled with people. The first intimation of impending danger was the falling of a portion of the roof, when a stampede occurred, numbers of men, women, and children jumping out of the high windows. Our opinion is that such sport is really more harmful than numbering hairs and counting sparrows.

THE American Spectator says: "A writer in a society journal calls attention to the fact that, 'counting all persons who hav some religious faith and attend regularly some place of worship, Christian or Jewish, there still remain fifteen million grown persons in this country who never go inside any church at all.' He further observes that the Methodist and Baptist churches combined hav a membership of about one million more than the Roman Catholic; while these three denominations contain four-fifths of the church-going people. It would be manifestly unjust to allow the fifteen millions of non-churchgoers to interfere or prohibit the rest or any portion of the religious element from spending Sunday as they see fit, providing that in so doing they are not infringing on the rights of others. It would be equally unjust for the religious bodies to attempt to close the museums, picture galleries, or in any other way to seek to interfere with the innocent amusement of any portion of the fifteen million people who never go inside a church. (By innocent amusement we mean any amusement, recreation, or exercise which society encourages during the week.) This is a fact which many people will not see; for it is hard to rise above prejudice and be just; yet justice and toleration are the watch-words of progress."

MR. GLADSTONE, we are now told on the authority of his chief London organ, has once more entered the field against Professor Huxley. A great part of his forthcoming book, "The Impregnable Rock of Holy Scripture"—a reprint of recent magazine articles—is a challenge to Professor Huxley. "With the assistance of an expert in hydraulics," says this unconsciously humorous organ, "Mr. Gladstone has even criticised those calculations respecting the subsidence of the waters upon which Professor Huxley has impugned the narrativ of the deluge." And with or without the assistance of an expert in spiritual hydraulics, the great home ruler has also given his reasons for supposing that the Gadarene pig-owners were Jews unlawfully possessed of the swine possessed by devils. If they were, Professor Huxley's argument against miracles, because employed in this case for the wanton destruction of other people's property, is supposed to be shattered in pieces. A reply from Professor Huxley on these and other points is expected. Mr. Gladstone's opponents, says the Tribune, remembering the fate which befell him in his earlier, yet still recent, controversy with Professor Huxley, expect it joyfully. But Mr. Gladstone's power of seeing only what he wants to see is just as remarkable in theology as in politics, and in both his courage is perfectly splendid.

A DISPATCH to the daily papers from Leavenworth, Kan., says: "Postmaster Ritchie again threw the mail edition of the Leavenworth Times out of the mail this morning because it reprinted the list of the Catholic fair raffles. In giving an account of the postmaster's action, Postmaster-General Wanamaker sustains Postmaster Ritchie, and in reply to his telegram of inquiry simply wired, 'Unmailable.' Suit has been filed by the Times against Postmaster Ritchie for $10,000 damnges. The claim is made that no law can forbid an American newspaper to print the news." Commenting upon this case the Herald of this city says: "There is just a little danger that we are being governed too much. We read that an Indiana postmaster has thrown out of the mails the entire edition of the Fort Wayne Daily Journal, because the paper published an account of a Catholic church fair which contained a list of members who had drawn prizes. Another journal was also stopped because it contained a short item regarding the raffling of a sofa pillow for the benefit of a poor family. President Harrison is a sensible man and should make an example of this postmaster. His interpretation of the law is that any postmaster may constitute himself a censor over the newspapers that come to his care, examin them as rigorously as a Russian censor, and, if he pleases, throw them out of the mails. No law was ever passed by Congress giving such power. We approved of the president's course against lotteries and of legal action toward the suppression of the Louisiana lottery. But it is one thing to suppress a lottery and another to interfere with the liberties of the citizen. To throw out of the mails the entire edition of a newspaper because it contained an item regarding the raffle of a sofa pillow for the benefit of a poor family is an outrage. It only shows to what extent this beautiful paternal government is going—that it is really government by going to the devil."

Is There a God?

I.

"Canst thou by searching find out God?" (Job xi, 7).

It is now ages since the above question was asked, and it has not yet been answered. It was regarded as a pertinent question then, and it remains a pertinent question still. The question of the being of a God is one to which the greatest and best of human intellects hav been directed and will be directed. It is a question which has an influence over the thoughtful portion of society, as a question of duty, and it has an influence over the unthoughtful portion of society, by the teachings of the priesthood, that is truly disastrous and sometimes painful to witness. The existence of God is not only assumed, but even dogmatized upon, and human happiness is marred and human progress prevented by this dogmatism. It has been among the highest functions of human intelligence to seek a solution to this absorbing question, and when it is approached with earnestness and sincerity it will command the attention and respect of the thoughtful portion of mankind, for the sincere and honest pains a man takes to discover truth are a better measure of his intellectual worth than any fancied possession of things revealed.

Many methods and arguments hav been employed by persons endeavoring to solve this much vexed problem, but as yet all efforts hav been without success. Every known property or quantity in nature has not only been deified itself, but has been presented to men as emanating directly from their God or gods. The sun was the universal supreme god of ancient times. It was regarded as the great life-giver and producer—a belief which closely approaches the scientific teaching of to-day—and popular tradition deified it, and then thousands and tens of thousands of animated beings were sacrificed upon the sun's altars, and even human beings died by the hand of the sacred executioner in order to assuage the wrath of that orb or turn aside the fury of its vengeance, when it was as inoffensiv and as free from either as the pure light it sheds through the wide expanse of the heavens.

Of the two principal arguments which hav been adduced to prove the existence of a God, the first is that of design, an argument which proceeds purely from inference, and being capable only of inferring, it implies an amount of facts which are incapable of solution. The second is an argument derived from consciousness. Consciousness is simply the aggregate feelings of the human mind, a kind of analysis which, unable to reason boldly, reviews all that one knows, and from this, incomplete as it is, sums up a decision. The consciousness of an Atheist can never form the existence of a God, for if he was not an Atheist, he would not be convinced, and the arguments in its favor, and his prior knowledge, would be to him the consciousness that there was not one. Of all arguments consciousness is the most weak, for is it not a growth, an educator, the conviction of a life? To use it as an objectiv argument for the existence of a God is to exalt man's feelings in the place of his judgment, and then, having divested himself of his perception, he is left to his fancy whether he sees or not. If we would revere and worship a being whom we are to regard as the author of nature, and therefore infinitly superior to ourselvs, we should clearly understand who and what that being was. And if there was such a being, and he intended us to worship him truly, he would without doubt hav manifested his presence or told us of his nature. He would hav written his name in grand and unmistakable characters upon all his works. This, however, has never been done, and the Atheist is justified in his denial as a means of instituting an inquiry whether such a being really exists. No evidence, not even the traditions of men, will tend to prove this existence, and bring us nearer to the solution of the question, Is there a God?

What is God? Is he something or nothing? Is he a world? Is he an animal, a vegetable, or a mineral? What is he? What are his phenomena, his power, and his location? Where is he? We know not, and neither hav we met anyone who did know. We hav made over and over again various appeals to those professing a knowledge of him, for the foundations of their present knowledge. But we can get no satisfactory answer.

We are often asked by the religious people, If there is no God, where did the first grain of corn come from?—a question bearing upon the argument of design. To this the Atheist is silent. Neither can the Christian answer it; neither is he aided by a critical dissertation upon the power and wisdom shown in a single grain of wheat. The Deist says that it could not hav sprung fortuitously from the ground without design. The same with vegetables and animals. These are advanced as of supernatural contrivance and undoubted design. But the question remains, Are they? A grain of wheat may show evidence of being constructed for a purpose, yet it is thoroughly useless until it is placed in the ground to fructify and grow. The soil then is necessary for its completion. So here we hav proof from the design argument that the dust of the earth is on an equality with the organized grain of corn. In every case design is a proof of imperfection, because it is subject to growth and improvement. No designer can design anything unless he knows the adaptability of each part of the material he has to work with, and this knowledge can be gained only by long years of experience and patient contrivance. Yet are we to imagin that before God made the world he must hav repeated attempts and failed each time until he succeeded? Why, the very argument itself is ridiculous, and not one present day theologian would hav the temerity to use it. The complexity of the human structure is frequently adduced in favor of the design argument. But I fail to see wherein design shows itself. We hav five fingers on each hand, but is there any necessity for absolutely any more or less than five? Suppose we had only four, the design argument could be illustrated in precisely the same way. Nay, but take away our hands, arms, legs, and shoulders, and the design argument might be taken from the rest of our bodies. Let us go further still, and suppose there were no human beings or animals upon the face of the earth, nothing upon the surface of the globe except an old bull-frog, eloquent treatises and essays might be written upon the wonderful adaptation of his limbs to the sphere in which he moved or upon the wisdom of the almighty. We are asked to grant that the arm is adapted to the shoulder, and this to every part of the human frame. We are pointed to the mechanical world for an illustration of intelligence, to the economy of the world for wisdom, and to the many enjoyments of life for goodness. These, being duly considered, are introduced as proofs that the original parents of all these various functions had a beginning—that somebody created them, and that somebody embodied the attributes of intelligence, power, wisdom, and goodness, with a second edition of attributes called omnipresence, omnipotence, and omniscience, and we are asked to believe that this great verb is God.

Such is the rapid tergiversation of logomachy by which Theists seek to be convinced of a mere "word" and not a thing. It is genuin metaphysics and not science to discuss an idea of a supposed idea instead of a representation of a visible semblance. In fact, the eternity of matter does away with the necessity of a God; the laws of analogy oppose in every step the design argument; the design argument is cumulativ in error and self-contradictory. Theists hav never manufactured a God by it complete, for they can never comprehend what they are talking about. All ideas of God are proofs of human ignorance. For the idea always corresponds to the state of education and the training of the individual holding such tenets. The deity of the New Zealander is a tattooed image, the Malay god is a cruel symbol, the Brahmans' god is typical of their extravagant ideas, the Mohammedan God is as lascivious as his prophet, while the popular idea of the Christian God is that of a great man sitting upon a golden throne, with long white robes and a flowing beard, having at his side Jesus and the Virgin Mary. Every age has had its Gods and men hav worshiped them and sacrificed unto them. But as men grow in knowledge and wisdom so their ideas of God will change. The orthodox idea of God came from a very low and barbarous age. It is totally unfit for the present race of mankind. Revengeful, cruel, ignorant, and revolting, there was the greatest inconsistency between his assumed attributes and his assumed conduct, which is sufficient to prove the falsity of all.

JOHN R. CHABLESWORTH.

Christianity and Evolution.

CHAPTER III.

Another important part of the Christian religion, viz., the doctrin of the "logos," or the "word of God," is clearly traceable to pre-Christian times; on the one hand to the Greek Plato, who lived 400 B.C., and on the other to the Jewish Philo. It will be remembered that John i opens with the declaration: "In the beginning was the word. and the word was with God, and the word was God. The same was in the beginning with God. All things were made by him, and without him was not anything made that was made. In him was life, and the life was the light of men."

Philo, describing the logos, says: "The logos is the son of God the father, the first begotten of God, the most ancient of all beings," and so on, and identifies Christ with the logos in a multitude of particulars (see De Profugis, De Somniis, De Monarch).

The Rev. J. W. Lake, in a pamphlet entitled, "Plato, Philo, and Paul," givs numerous illustrations of the resemblance between gospel teachings and the logos (these are quoted at length by Mrs. Besant, Freethinkers' Text-Book, Part II).

The logos, then, is the source from whence we get the idea of Christ as the word of God. And as this idea was formulated before the alleged birth of the Jesus of the gospels by four hundred years, it is easy to understand how it may hav been incorporated in the gospels when, years after the alleged death of Jesus, these books were first compiled. Nor did the idea of the immortality of the soul originate with Christianity, though from a study of the Old Testament it is quite clear that the earlier Jewish writers had no notion of the personal continuance of man in a world beyond the grave.

If Solomon was the writer of the book of Ecclesiastes, he certainly was opposed to the doctrin of the immortality of the soul. "I saw in mine heart concerning the estate of the sons of men, that God might manifest them, that they might see that they themselvs are beasts. For that which befalleth the sons of men befalleth beasts; even one thing befalleth them; as the one dieth so dieth the other; yea, they hav all one breath; so that man has no preëminence above a beast—all is vanity" (Eccles. iii, 18, 19).

Jesus appears to hav believed in the resurrection of the body (John xi, 44), consequently he called the decayed corpse of Lazarus from the tomb and himself appeared bodily to some of his disciples after the resurrection (John xx, 27).

On the other hand, Plato and Socrates inclined to the view of Pythagoras, that the souls of men at death took possession of higher or lower animals according as the man's life had been either noble or base, virtuous or vicious.

The Egyptians certainly entertained a belief in the immortality of the soul and incorporated these teachings into their funeral ritual (Egyptian Mythology, Sharpe, p. 52).

The Indians also had an idea of the immortality of the soul at least two centuries before Christ (see Religious and Moral Sentiments from Indian Writers, by J. Muir, p. 22; also Inman's Ancient Faiths, vol. ii, p. 820). The doctrin of the "unity of God," and many of the ceremonies of Christianity, such as baptism, confirmation, etc., were also of pagan origin (see Christian Records, by Rev. Dr. Giles, p. 129; and Diegesis, Rev. Robert Taylor, p. 219).

Even the idea of angels and devils was borrowed from Egypt by the Jews, and lastly the great doctrins of the destruction of the world by fire and punishment of the wicked are drawn from a pagan source (see Justin Martyr, Apology, 1, chap. viii; Sharpe's Egyptian Mythology, pp. 49 52; also see Dr. Kalisch's Historical and Critical Commentary on the Old Testament, p. 318).

Indeed, Mrs. Besant ably sums up this branch of the subject as follows:

Thus we hav seen that the cardinal doctrins and ceremonies of Christianity are of purely pagan origin, and that "Christianity" was in existence long ages before Christ.

Christianity is only, as we hav said, a patchwork composed of old materials. From the later Jews comes "the unity of God;" from India and Egypt the "trinity in unity;" from India and Egypt the crucified redeemer; from India, Egypt, Greece, and Rome the virgin mother and the divine son; from Egypt its priests and its ritual; from the Essenes and the Therapeuts its asceticism; from Persia, India, and Egypt its sacraments; from Persia and Babylonia its angels and its devils; from Alexandria the blending into one of many lines of thought. There is nothing original in this creed save its special appeal to the ignorant and to babes. "Not many wise men after the flesh" are among its adherents. It is an appeal to the darkness of the world, not to its light; to superstition, not to knowledge; to faith, not to reason.

Having thus discovered the various sources from which the Christians hav collected the materials out of which they hav built up their religion, I will endeavor in the next chapter to trace the evolution of these ideas during the early ages of the Christian church.

EARLY CHRISTIANITY.—CHAPTER IV.

Although there is no evidence of the existence of the Jesus of the gospels, whether considered as a God or man, it is quite within the realm of possibility that a person may hav lived named Jesus, or Joshua—or, for the matter of that, a dozen such persons—who proclaimed some unpopular doctrins to the Jews, and who, as a consequence, was persecuted by them, and ultimately put to death either by crucifixion, or by stoning, as declared by Josephus.

It seems quite clear, however, whether such a person lived or not, that between thirty and fifty years after his alleged death a number of persons appeared who called themselvs followers of Jesus, and went from place to place proclaiming teachings which, while they bore a wonderful likeness to the doctrins of the Essenes, appeared to possess an originality of their own, and were probably proclaimed with an enthusiasm which only those who were suffering from persecution could impart. In the midst of this persecuted and excited rabble stood one Paul, an able and learned man, who had once been an opponent of Christianity, but who, having been smitten by sunstroke (Acts xxvi), lost the even balance of his mind, and became just as ardent an apostle of "Christ and him crucified" as before he had been an enemy. It must be remembered that Paul never saw Jesus, and therefore, however zealously he may hav advocated Christianity, it cannot be said that he was a witness, in the strict sense of the term, of the reality of Christ. Now, for nearly a hundred years these Christians carried on their propaganda, referring to tradition respecting the teachings of their so called master.

Early in the second century some gospels and epistles were written bodying forth the alleged teachings of Jesus. These are alleged to hav been written in Hebrew, although the gospels, as we now hav them, are in Greek. What became of the originals nobody knows; no trace of their existence can now be discovered.

Now, the early beliefs of Christians differ in many material points from the Christianity of today, and I will endeavor, in this and succeeding chapters, to indicate some of the points of difference, and how they arose and developed. In the first place, I think it can be satisfactorily demonstrated that the early Christians believed that Jesus was merely a man, and rested their beliefs upon the teachings of the apostles and of the gospels as they understood them (Acts xi, 22). Christians were divided, not only into several sects, but there were Jewish Christians as well as gentile Christians. The Jewish Christians were in a wretchedly poor condition, so much so that they earned the unenviable appellation of Ebionites, which signifies poor and mean, in the same manner as many of the early reformers from popery were called Beghards, as a term of reproach (see Dr. Priestley's Corruptions of Christianity, p. 3).

Peter and Paul always spoke of Jesus as a man. In 1 Tim. xi, 5, Paul expresses his belief thus: "There is one God and one mediator between God and men. the man Christ Jesus" (Voltaire: Philosophical Dictionary). In fact, the idea of Jesus being God does not appear to hav developed into a portion of the Christian creed until the end of the sixteenth century.

Jewish Christians were treated with studied cruelty by gentile Christians; they were also held in the greatest abhorrence by the religious Jews, who cursed them solemnly whenever they met them, for having departed from the faith of their fathers. These Jewish Christians were sometimes called Nazarenes, but more often were referred to as Ebionites. Epiphanius, in his account of the Nazarenes, makes no mention of them believing in the divinity of Christ (Epiphanii Opera. 1682 (Hær 29), pp. 1 124); while Trypho the Jew in his dialog with Justin says:

> They who think that Jesus was a man, and being chosen of God was anointed Christ, appear to me to advance a more probable opinion than yours. For all of us expect that Christ will be born a man from men, and that Elias will come to anoint him. If he, therefore, be Christ, he must by all means be a man born of man (Dialog, Edit. Thirlley, p. 238-4).

This view was also taken by Eusebius, bishop of Cæsarea, "Ecclesiastical History," book 1, chap. ix, and by Tertullian in his "Discourses Against Praxeas."

Not only is it true that it took many centuries to develop the doctrin of the divinity of Christ, but this doctrin, which appears to hav been entertained by a small minority till the council of Nice, was fiercely resisted for centuries, especially by the poor and unsophisticated among the Christians, who thought that it savored of polytheism and was an attempt of the learned to foist upon them something in the nature of a metaphysical puzzle.

Tertullian expressed the hostility of the masses to the doctrin of the trinity in the following terms:

> The simple, the ignorant, and the unlearned, who are always the greater part of the body of Christians, since the rule of faith itself transfers their worship of many gods to the one true God, not understanding that the unity of God is to be maintained, but with the economy dread this economy, imagining that this number and disposition of a trinity is a division of the unity. They therefore will hav it that we are worshipers of the two and even of three Gods. We, they say, hold the monarchy. Even the Latins hav learned to bawl out for monarchy. and the Greek themselvs will not understand the economy (Praxeam, Sec. III, p. 502).

No doubt a great deal of the confusion of thought among the early Christians arose through the frequent occurrence of the term "Holy Ghost" or Holy Spirit in the synoptic as well as the apocryphal gospels. These terms were probably figurativ and did not refer to what Dr. Parkhurst facetiously termed "the foggy member of the trinity." The Holy Spirit probably meant the sincere spirit of enthusiasm by which men's conduct was stirred to activity in any praiseworthy cause. In this sense St. Paul writes in Cor. ii, 11: "What man knoweth the things of a man save the spirit of man that is in him? Even so the things of God knoweth no man, but the spirit of God."

Having by persistent advocacy and frequent votes at councils established the doctrin of the trinity, it became in time part and parcel of the teaching of the church. In the fifteenth and sixteenth centuries, the Catholic being the only Christian church, the doctrin of the trinity was incorporated as a part of the authorized creed, and when ultimately through the polygamous character of that pious monarch Henry VIII. the pope ceased to be the reigning religious head of Europe, and the Catholic church took a back seat in favor of a new organization which is now known as the Protestant church, the doctrin of the trinity was still retained and became part of the new faith, and was embodied in the Athanasian creed and is read to-day in all the churches of Christendom.

ARTHUR B. MOSS.

Organization.

Without attempting a full statement of facts relativ to the mental forces which tend to destroy Liberal organizations, I will proceed at once to giv my views relativ to how we should effect and maintain them. Our success in this direction depends mainly upon the observance of one fundamental precept—increase the desire to maintain Liberal organizations until it outweighs the resisting forces which tend to destroy them. How shall we accomplish this?

1. By holding before Liberals the mirror of the world's evils caused by religion. By observing the evils of the past. As like causes produce like effects, they can predict the dangers of the future. This calls for action.

2. They must be influenced to see more clearly that, according to the fundamental principles of this religion, wholesale murder is regarded as being moral, and that the great evil of this system lies in the fact that religious people believe that a God sanctions persecution, and that as they accept this supposed authority as supreme, they, of course, justify themselvs in any practice which a supposed God sanctions.

3. They must be made to see that human suffering is the fruit of this religion; that its fundamental evil should and must be destroyed, and that Freethought is the only instrument which will effectually destroy it, and Liberals the only class of people fitted to lead in the accomplishment of the work.

We believe the right effect can be produced, because every emotion of the mind can be warmed into increased activity by stimulation, by exercise. But a negativ policy will not do. "Milk and-water" arguments are fruitless. Nothing but positiv, determined, energetic effect will prove effectual. There is a way. We believe that every Liberal can be reached. We believe the sleep of apathy can be broken, and the sleepers, one and all, aroused to full consciousness, wide awake and full of energy. But we want men who are especially qualified to effect this grand awakening. How much of an effort has been made in this direction? In my vicinity none. Liberal speakers hav been here, but they hav not entreated the people to rally in support of the grandest cause known to the world. Their work has been confined almost exclusivly to education, to the expounding of Liberal principles.

Among all the Liberal lecturers I hav ever heard, no one has urged the people to organize and to labor assiduously for the support of their organization. The utility of organizations as equilibrious forces poised against Christian societies has not been pointed out. True, these men hav done earnest work and done it well. But not this kind of work, although it is the kind most needed. Now to the question, How shall local organizations be effected and sustained? We answer:

1. Organizations formed in large cities should be presided over weekly by Liberal lecturers.

2. All Liberal societies should be formed by men and women whose business is this kind of work, and who hav especial talents for the same.

3. These organizers should be furnished by the American Secular Union.

4. Each propagandist should giv public lectures every Sunday and devote his entire time during the week to canvassing the town and doing private work until the organization is thoroughly completed. By rightly laying the cause, the situation, and the needs of the hour before Liberal people in this private way, interest would be excited, which, with proper influence, could be maintained. In connection with this method of procedure, pamphlets and tracts of a nature to excite interest and enthusiasm in the cause should be freely distributed.

5. The business of this organizer would further be, to raise funds by subscriptions, etc., to pay a public speaker for one year's service in lecturing before the said organization; and when this is accomplished the American Secular Union shall send a speaker to fill this position for the stipulated time; and this man shall prepare the field, make provision either for himself or another lecturer for the year to follow—the organizer to be sent by the American Secular Union into a new field of labor.

6. The local speaker should, from time to time, fill engagements in the neighboring towns and other accessible fields where arrangements can be made for lectures or debates, and one-half of the proceeds from said lectures and debates shall be forwarded to the American Secular Union; the remaining half shall be given the local speaker as remuneration for extra work.

The Secular Union would, doubtless, realize from each lecturer, yearly, more than enough to pay the organizer for the time spent in effecting the organization.

The great drawback is the discouragement of those who are willing to help support an organization by reason of the smallness of the number of those who patronize the order. Yet there are plenty of Liberals in most of the large towns to form a social society equal to the best church society of the place. To get them interested, and to entertain them after they are interested, is all that is necessary, i.e., the interest must be of that degree which will overbalance all opposing interests. But this cannot be excited without private work, and that, too, of the most influential kind.

Individuals are directed and improved by the operation of their own mental faculties, and these faculties are stimulated into action (1) by natural existing influences, such as social communion, and (2) by selfish or religious influences, the latter being excited both by real and imaginary external motiv forces, which cause the individual to move in a particular way, which way is always in harmony with the nature of the circumstances by which he is controled. In view of this truth Liberals should endeavor to increase by stimulation the inactiv elements of their brethren. Earnest, persistent effort in the way of private influence, together with a judicious use of tracts, books, papers, etc., will effect the end desired. We want propagandists who are awake to the truths in human nature and who hav special talent for organizing. The outcome of organizations formed by local talent alone is usually uncertain. In small towns where Liberals are not able to support a speaker societies may be maintained by local talent; but they would, doubtless, be more successful if the organization could be effected by the special talent mentioned.

An indispensable requisit to our cause is confidence—confidence in each other, confidence in our motivs, and confidence in the success of any laid-out work. And moreover we need a greater reciprocity of feeling and unity of action. Whenever every part of the American Secular Union constitution shall be approved by a majority of intelligent Liberals, whenever its objects and aims shall be unanimously indorsed, and whenever it is made clear to the Liberals of this country that any object for which it is laboring is essential and that it can be obtained. I hav faith that money will flow into the Secular Union treasury. Whilst without this reciprocity, without this confidence and unity, without an implicit faith that the work of the Union, to an extent at least, can be attained, little or nothing will be accomplished. Suicides.

The attention of the readers of the daily papers is struck by the increasing numbers of suicides; and what is strange, the victims come from no particular class, rich, poor, healthy, or physically wretched. Religious belief has no restraint when the resolution is once taken.

The gratification arising from wealth in the millionaire, the piety of Christianity and the sanctity of the priesthood and its surroundings, act as no determent to "jump the life to come."

In the physically miserable, made so by chronic and hopeless diseases, or in men in poverty, suicide to us would not seem wonderful. Human law has tried to stop its perpetration, if the offender is detected in the act, by the exaction of a petty penalty and incarceration.

The Roman Catholic church forbids it, and withholds from the victim church burial. And in Catholic countries the remains of the victim are buried in a public cross-road, and vindictivly, as it were, a wooden stake is driven through the remains!

It is true we, with all Agnostics, know nothing of the future after death; still, we hav as a general thing a universal hope of immortality.

There are those, however, who are pleased with the conception of Atheism.

A real Atheist, if such can be found, seldom or never commits suicide, knowing full well that when done their pipe is out. They patiently endure the ill of life, be it hopeless gnawing cancers, blindness, deafness, the decrepitude of age, and the "ten thousand ills that flesh is heir to." They are heroes and heroins.

Looking at suicide from a worldly standpoint, we cannot but justify the act when our miseries become unbearable, for none of us by any conception of justice can be held responsible for a physical organization over which we had no choice. I repeat that I justify the act of suicide wholly from a worldly standpoint, but not so as a Spiritualist, for by doing so one may be doing himself a serious wrong.

Among the many communications I hav at times received, I giv the following from my old acquaintance, Mr. Charles C. Wright, the noted die sinker of New York: "On being released from my old worn-out body, I found my earthly speculations on Spiritualism were in the main correct. I found it necessary, yes, very necessary, to lay up all the knowledge you can while in your sphere, for it will be essential to you here. The spirit world is, as I expected, progressiv."

Hence, viewed from a Spiritual standpoint, I must object to a wholesale approval of suicide as long as we can add to our stock of knowledge. D. B.

The American Secular Union.

The following communications were received by the late Congress of the American Secular Union. Lack of space prevented their appearance in the report:

MONTREAL, CANADA, Oct. 27, 1890.

TO THE PRESIDENT AND MEMBERS OF THE AMERICAN SECULAR UNION, Friends: I feel it to be a privilege to send a word of greeting to your convention, and to express the wish that its deliberations may result in effectiv action and its gathering together of co-workers may tend to the increase of good-fellowship and the growth of enthusiasm for the principles of Secularism. As example is catching, we look with interest to your progress in securing needed reforms, believing that Canada will be greatly influenced by the results. The evils that we combat are common to the whole continent, and Canada and the United States can join in an American Secular Union which will be uninfluenced by political divisions and may be a happy presage of their future obliteration. With hearty congratulations upon your effectiv organization and its prospects for usefulness, I am,

Cordially and fraternally yours, ROBT. C. ADAMS,
President Canadian Secular Union.

FALL RIVER, MASS., Oct. 29, 1890.

TO THE AMERICAN SECULAR UNION IN CONVENTION ASSEMBLED, HON. R B. WESTBROOK, PRESIDENT, My Dear Friends. I hoped to hav had the pleasure of meeting with you in the beautiful valley of the Onio, and clasping hands with the earnest men and women whose words and acts in this Congress will be written in undying language upon the pages of impartial history. But circumstances hav ordered otherwise, and it is only in thought and mind that I can be present.

Never before in the history of progressiv thought has there been greater need of living exemplification of the glorious principles and precepts of the American Secular Union than at the present time.

The vótaries of superstition are making a great fight. Bigotry is silently marshaling its forces, and ecclesiasticism holds its tyrant lash over the heads of the timid and shrinking Now is the day and the hour when the forces of truth and science are to rally, to make a firm, unwavering stand for the right to reason. It has seemed to me sometimes that the enthusiasm, the strong and willing, the helpful, working hands, are in the West, that we in the East must catch the inspiration to be up and doing from our stalwart brothers and brave sisters who sit in convention to-day.

The demand of the times is for great hearts and strong, unflinching minds, for valiant soldiers who will stand shoulder to shoulder in this battle for justice.

May this Congress be a great gathering of brave men and true women. May it be characterized by calm, judicious legislation, by wise counsel, by careful and earnest decisions, and may it be a stepping-stone from a dead past on to a noble and activ future, a future throbbing with quick instincts, alive with new and grand endeavors, flushed with the light of the morning and bright with the promis of a glowing and brilliant day.

With kindest regards to all friends, I am,
Yours for Universal Mental Liberty, SUSAN H. WIXON.

Mr. Watts at the Liberal Club.

The largest audience of the season assembled at the Liberal Club hall to hear Charles Watts talk about "Religion With and Without Theology." They were well repaid, for Mr. Watts was in a peculiarly good-humored mood, and besides doing his subject ample justice, laid a lot of traps for the critics, into which they unwarily stepped, thus affording him opportunity for a bit of a lark at their expense. The latter part of the evening was very lively, and the stock critics of the club will probably be more cautious next time Mr. Watts visits the city.

The object of the lecture, said Mr. Watts, was twofold: first, to get at the meaning of religion; second, to show that theological religion is inferior to Secular religion. The term religion, went on the lecturer, does not represent merely one phase of thought, though this is the common error of religionists, who look upon all religion that does not bear their stamp as spurious. In countries where there is a state church, the members regard all other religions as spurious, because the government stamp is not placed thereon. So with all orthodox churches: they think they alone possess genuin religion.

Religion, however, has no necessary association with any phase of theology, as Max Müller has pointed out. It can exist without faith in a supreme being or in a future life. There are true and false conceptions of religion, and the church never confines itself to the etymological meaning of the word, but adds ecclesiastical meanings. Christians hav no idea that inspiration exists apart from the scriptures, yet in the etymological sense of the word Secularists are as greatly inspired as the "holy word." Homer, Shelley, Virgil, Shakspere, were all inspired and left behind them a legacy of inspiration. No one book, no one religion, no one age, no one nationality, has a monopoly of this attribute.

Everyone believes in sacred things—the only question is, What is sacred? To the Secularist, all beauty is sacred because it elevates the human race. Man is his own consecrator, and where all is good—in church, at home, at the theater—there alone is sanctification.

Theological religion is based on fear and emotions; non-theological religion on love and reality. A point for the debaters to bear in mind (and the lecturer's eyes twinkled as he said it) is that a man may possess all the virtues and still fall short of being a religious man. The thing lacking, and constituting theological religion, is a body of doctrins. A man falls short of being religious unless he has faith. Plato said that religion was crucified between two rocks—impiety and superstition. Nowadays religion is held between the two rocks of indifference and extravagance; and the religion of the churches is now an out and-out fraud—the most gigantic delusion of the age—propagated by the priesthood to keep the people in subjection.

Etymologically, as every scholar knows, religion means to tie fast—to bind back. Practically, it is to liv a good life, for men's standards of morality practically form their religion. Modern scholars base religion upon Agnosticism, and religion now is not what you believe, but what you think is right to do. As Junius Henri Browne said in the Arena, "it is simply and solely the highest morality and the rule of life: it was activ, a principle of humanity, and potent for good, ages before theology had been invented. . . . Religion has no dependence on faith or belief of the sacerdotal sort. The idea that it has is the bane of all theology. Religion is practical, not in any manner theoretic. It may hav an ideal standard to help and stimulate it; but it is occupied with deeds and facts. The religious man aims to be pure, temperate, truthful, honest, sympathetic, humane, above all charitable. In whatever he falls short, as he is most likely to, for he has an ideal, he tries unwearyingly to do better. He has no dread of punishment here or hereafter: his conscience is his guide, his self-esteem his approval. He regards fear as a miserable, degrading, slavish passion, with which genuin manhood has no concern. He totally rejects the expression, 'God-fearing,' even in the mouth of the orthodox, and asks: 'Why should any honest man fear God?' He seeks no reward, temporal or eternal, beyond satisfaction with himself and the respect of his fellows. He livs for this world, hoping, perhaps, that there may be another, but neither knowing, nor pretending to know, anything about it. The supernatural troubles him not: he is conscious that it is inconceivable. Nature is enough for him here, so long as he is here; he sees that we are constantly drawing out her secrets for the good of humanity. What is behind nature is to him, as it is to all of us, an impenetrable mystery, which may be revealed when we are ripe for the revelation. This world and nature afford, in his eyes, ample scope for the fullest and highest discharge of duty to ourselvs and our race."

Religion, therefore, is a daily life of honesty, not one day in seven; but most religionists wrap up their religion with their Sunday clothes and think no more about it till next Sunday. What we want is commercial honesty, a seven-days-a-week religion. Darwin said that it is a law of nature to "eat and be eaten," and Christians had made another, "cheat and be cheated," and that is their commercial religion.

No theological religion had ever been progressiv or experimental, for progression postulates imperfection, and religion claimed to be perfect. Religion cannot experiment, because experiment postulates knowledge, and when you know the supernatural, it ceases to be the supernatural. Reason, experience, result, are the guides of the Secularist. They teach the what, the why, the how of all action. It can be proved from Christian history that theological religion fails to make men better. Cultivated and intelligent nature is the basis of the new religion, but the theological religion takes from the worst part of nature. The first religion was phenomena worship—every phenomenon not understood by man's ancestors was regarded in fear and wonder; and so religion was born of ignorance, and fostered by a corrupt priesthood. Christianity could not originate to-day, for the people are too shrewd and too practical. Christ would be received by the officers of the law and be transported at once to a prison or a lunatic asylum. If religion was born in Palestine, it was the only thing which originated there; certainly education, science, philosophy, were not born there. But man is not necessarily a theologian. The doctrin of innate ideas is no longer believed in. Our ideas are obtained through the senses, and the theological idea is by no means universal. There are tribes numbering millions who hav no theology in their nature and no conception of it. Neither are such people the lowest type of humanity. Atheists hav no theology, and they belong to the highest types of the race. If man could always hav had what he wanted, no supernatural, says Strauss, would hav been invented, and this is a key to much of the mystery of religion. Veneration, gratitude, fear, wonder, hope, dependency, constitute the religious sentiment of man. Non-self-reliance is also another cause for religion. People who cannot guide themselvs must wake the minister up to tell them what to think. Ignorant people, says Buckle, will always incline to religion.

Theological religion, went on Mr. Watts, is inferior to Secular religion, and had been always a foe to liberty. Wherever it has dominated, liberty has been suppressed. Catholics do not believe in liberty. Protestants claim to, but their conception of liberty was the right to think and worship as they please and make others do the same. They were more dangerous than Catholics, for the latter are open opponents of freedom, while the Protestants giv you the right hand of fellowship and then rob you of your right. Private judgment with them means to think as they do, but not to go further. The essence of all theology is despotic. The religion of Secularism, or cultivated theology, is the true method. The religion of humanity has a basis we can test. True religion, said Kingsley, is justice for man, love for woman, solicitude for children. And I prefer my religion, concluded the lecturer, because it includes all the good of all religions. Secularists are free traders in truth, gathering it from all sources, and cultivate an immortality born of deeds not creeds.

At the conclusion of the address, which was received with much applause, Vice-President Chamberlain, in a neat little speech, introduced Deacons Foote and Kidney with supplicativ hats, after which Professor Perrin rose to say that Mr. Watts was behind the times in still pounding at the doors of the churches, when the Liberal Club had broken through into the holy of holies and was competing for the admiration of the world. Christianity was a religion of love, and had been such for two thousand years—that is why it spread throughout the Roman empire. Error, proclaimed Mr. Perrin, had done much good in the world, paradoxical as the statement seemed.

Professor Eccles said that the lecture was an unusual one, and the lecturer evidently knew what he was talking about. But it was special pleading. He left a great many knotty points unconsidered. How would the lecturer justify heroism, if to do good was all there is of religion? Reason says a hero is a fool. Theology said it was the will of God. Men started without moral natures, which had to be impressed psychically upon their souls. If one man cheats another as much as the first man cheats him, isn't justice done? In fact, the only men who do strict justice are the ones who cheat. The Liberal Club eats and is eaten, cheats and is cheated, every Friday night.

Dr. Gunn, who has side whiskers and looks like Anthony Comstock, as becomes a president of a vice society, next attempted criticism of the lecture. It would, he said, hav been more appropriate in Dr. Crosby's or Dr. Hall's church than in the club, which plowed that ground many years ago. Christianity was not a fraud, but a part of evolution's force, and had brought civilization up to its present high status. Dr. Gunn had been taught religion by his parents, and could not dishonor them by rejecting it now. The Liberal Club did not need such lectures, and if Christ should come back Archbishop Corrigan would make him mayor of New York. Only four years ago a Spiritualist had come here, personating Christ, and found his followers and financial backers in the Liberal Club.

Mrs. Dunleavy said that Mr. Watts's remarks about Palestine were unkind. Greece could be put into one of our Western states, and yet Greece had done much for the world. If you should meet Ralph Waldo Emerson under a tree in a shower you would know he was more than an ordinary man.

Mr. Chamberlain said he heard a theologian say that Courtlandt Palmer was a typical Christian.

When Mr. Watts rose to reply he was evidently astonished at the few things in the critics' speeches that he could lay hold of. But he made the best of his opportunities, and showed the audience how easy it was for a man who knew what he was talking about to discomfit the idols of the Club, especially Professor Eccles. The critics, he said, had been very inconsistent in denouncing his lecture, for they ought to be glad that he had given them an opportunity to show their debating powers. They had, however, been guilty of the theological sin of omission—they had not touched the question at issue, which was, Which is the superior, theological or secular religion? No speaker, not even Professor Eccles, with his vast learning, had spoken to the question. Where their points came in was, like the peace of God, passing all understanding. It was evident they knew better than to attempt answering his remarks, when they could amuse themselvs making speeches. But as they had wandered far away from the subject, he was justified in following them. Taking up their remarks sentence by sentence, and paying particular attention to the learned professor, Mr. Watts then treated the audience to an exhibition of debating power. It was evident he was doing it for his own amusement, for the criticisms were very inconsequential, and he made his point so good-naturedly yet sharply that the listeners laughed with him at his opponents and applauded his skill in straightening out plausible erroneous statements, and when he had finished, there was very little left of the learned Christian professor and the Comstockian doctor. The next lecture at the club will be by Emma Beckwith, on "Everybody's Business."

A Funeral Address.

[Remarks made by Hon. A. Schell at the funeral of Mrs. Jerusha Jennings, at Oakdale, Cal., Oct. 24, 1890.]

Remorseless death!
Fierce spirit of the glass and scythe, what power
Can stay him in his silent course, or melt
His iron heart to pity? On, still on,
He presses, and forever
Death, the tomb-builder, holds his fierce career,
Dark, stern, all-pitiless, and pauses not
Amid the mighty wrecks that strew his path,
To sit and muse, like other conquerors,
Upon the fearful ruin he has wrought.

FRIENDS AND RELATIONS: We hav come hither to perform the last rites of the dead. Within the deep, still chambers of our hearts, we will cherish the individuality, independence, and womanly virtues of our deceased friend. Society is in a transitional state, for we behold here to-day a funeral without the presence of a clergyman or priest. The deceased desired none of them to say prayers or mass over her. She had no need of their assistance in the hour of dissolution. There was no specter, no ghost, in the air, or anywhere else to haunt her in her last moments of dissolution. She was not afraid to die. Death to her was eternal rest; it was but the philosophy of nature.

Deceased was seventy-two years of age at the time of her death. She was honest, industrious, and virtuous. She respected the rights of her fellow-men and did unto others as she would that others do unto her, and thus secured the confidence and good will of all who knew her. These were her last passports at the portals of death.

"If a man die shall he liv again?" is a question asked by Job, but he never answered it. As to the future, who is there to reply? Out of the wide seabed of death no voices ever speak. Over the wild waste of carnage, Death, the tomb-builder, holds his fierce career. Across the line separating this world from the next no traveler has ever returned. No beacon light across the border on the far-distant shore illumins the unknowable.

What we believe cannot affect our future condition. As we came into this world under circumstances over which we hav no control, and as man is the creature of habit and experience, and all knowledge is derived through the channels of experience, man is simply the creature of circumstances.

In all cases the believer is influenced by geographical facts, over which he has no control, and therefore cannot be held responsible for his belief.

But in comparison with what was supposed to be known and believed of God, the important fact has come to the front, that we hav learned some grand and glorious things that hav revolutionized our opinions and beliefs, and that we need not believe any longer in such a God as the clergy hav preached to us, and that no inquisitorial guillotin awaits our want of belief. We can now bravely and unhesitatingly believe that he is not what the church says he is. He is not a selfish egotist, planning for our fall and ruin "for his own glory."

Nay, further, we feel confident we are dealing with regular, orderly universal forces, whose laws we can study, and whose movements we can calculate, so that our position and belief founded on experience is unspeakably better and more comforting than all the knowledge of the old creeds.

It is said that "death entered the world by sin." This cannot be, for death is an inherent principle of all organized matter. Many species of animals came upon this earth, lived their appointed time, died, and became extinct, a long time before man made his appearance upon earth—a long time before sin began. Death is the result of law. Life is a mystery; death is a mystery. By virtue of natural law, life came; by virtue of the same law, death followed. Whence did man come? Has he always been man, or is he developed from some lower forms of life? What is life? How long has life been on this planet?

All these are questions men still discuss, and upon which they are divided. Whatever the truth may be in regard to these subjects, one thing is apparent and needs no argument to prove, that an instantaneous adult or man is a physiological impossibility. Man attains his majority by the slow process of growth or development; and that he primarily descended from lower forms of life is now the paramount belief of the age.

But whatever our ignorance may be, we hav wrought out by experience a knowledge of right and wrong, of how to liv so as to attain something of good and happiness. After all, we can say upon these things, "how blessed" is this ignorance, as compared with what we thought we knew before the light of Liberalism and Freethought illumined our superstitious minds! At least this we know: We are no longer mere subjects for the "fires of perdition" throughout an endless eternity.

It was once believed that our sickness and death were judgments on our sins and punishments for our wickedness—perhaps for loving our children and friends too well—to weaken our attachments to this life and make us willing to die, and that this death was the result of original sin committed in the garden of Eden.

We know now that pain and sickness and afflictions are the result of broken law, and that death is the seed planted in the body at the beginning of life. If we are wise, we will not attribute death to any supernatural agency or to the wonderful and mysterious ways of an overruling providence.

We learn to recognize the fact that life, pain, and death are all under natural law. We ought to learn these laws and to regulate our conduct so as to make the forces in nature help as much and hurt as little as possible. We know many times the best often suffer the most because of inherited ills, or from circumstances over which they hav no control.

People no longer believe in the "fall of man." Early Christendom believed, without the shadow of a doubt, in the historical fact of the "fall of man." This doctrin has been preached by orthodox churches for the last eighteen hundred years, and for the sole purpose of saving man from the "supposed effects of the supposed fall."

Why do the churches hav so slight a hold upon the faith and reverence of men and women? Why do so many thousand neglect them? Why do so many of the best men and women feel that they are no longer essential to their highest and noblest life? Why is this funeral here to-day without the presence of a priest or clergyman? We might as well face the fact—the churches might as well face the fact—it is because free-minded, well-informed people no longer believe in any "fall of man." Our deceased sister did not believe it, for she requested that her funeral should be conducted by Liberals.

It is demonstrated, beyond all intelligent question, that no such fact as the fall of man ever occurred in the history of man.

What follows? Why, this follows as inevitably as day follows night, that if a man is not "fallen," then he is not "lost," and, in that case, he does not need to be "saved." Take away the fall of man, and there is no need of the "scheme of redemption," no need of a supernaturally inspired revelation, no need of an incarnation, no need of a supernatural or infallible church, no need of a trinity, no need of an old-time heaven for the chosen few—no endless hell for the doomed many. All these doctrins found their reason in the supposed fall, and with it they pass away.

In conclusion let me quote the beautiful language of Colonel Ingersoll:

"There is after all," he says, "something tenderly appropriate in the serene death of the old. Nothing is more touching than the death of the young and beautiful. But when the duties of life hav been nobly done; when the sun touches the horizon; when the purple twilight falls upon the present, the past, and the future; when memory with dim eyes can scarcely spell the records of the vanished days, then, surrounded by friends, death comes like a strain of music—it is a welcome relief. The day has been long, the road weary, and we gladly stop at the inn."

The duties of our deceased friend hav been nobly done. Her sun on earth touched the horizon at mature age, and although the day may not hav been very long, the road has been weary. She stopped at the wayside inn to which we are all traveling.

And now let the remains of our deceased sister, all that is mortal of her on earth, be taken to her last resting-place, where she can lie and be forever at rest—no one to molest or disturb her remains.

Man is taken from the general mass of matter which surrounds him, at death to that general mass of matter he is again restored; therefore matter unto matter and dust unto dust—we consign all that is mortal of her on earth to her last resting-place, and there let her hav eternal rest.

Freireligiöses Sonntags-Blatt, Nos. 43 and 44, contain an excellent translation of Col. Robert Ingersoll's "The Divided Household of Faith." The translator is our friend Dr. Voelkel, who has already done several translations from English into German, among them Paine's "Age of Reason."

Our friend Léon Furnemont, advocate of the court of appeals in Belgium and editor of the Freethought journal La Raison, asks us in his last letter why Chicago would not be a good place for the International Freethought Congress of 1892. Yes, why not? What do the American Freethinkers say?

The last number of Fritänkaren contains, among other good things, a portrait and a short biographical sketch of Col. R. G. Ingersoll. And in a private letter Captain Thomson informs us that Freethought is spreading at a good rate in Sweden. New branches are formed almost every week. The Bible lectures by Victor Lennstrand are a decided success. At the last two meetings even standing-room was not to be obtained. Our friends deserve success, as they hav invested all their time and money.

That the French authorities are flirting with the church is evident from the fact that the highest court of France has issued an "opinion," signed by the president, prohibiting the church from receiving directly or indirectly through priestly influence legacies by testament. This decision has already been enforced in the case of the archbishop of Paris, who was willed ten thousand francs, which, however, the government has now restored to the relativs. A bitter pill for the church to take!

The Freireligious Association of Berlin, Prussia, has been baptized anew. Because of the infinitesimal amount of Christian religion in the creed of said society, and a fear lest some one might from the name conclude that the members were "doxys"—which of course would be an insult—the society has taken the title of the "Free Society of Berlin." What about the rest of the "Freireligiösen?" They might just as well follow suit. Everyone of intelligence knows that at best they are Agnostics, if not Atheists.

The Oregon Convention.

The Oregon state Secular Union met in convention at Arion Hall, Saturday, Oct. 11, 1890, it being the second annual congress held in the state. There was a large and enthusiastic audience to greet our speakers, the local Unions throughout the state being well represented. Some of the delegates traveled three hundred miles to attend the convention. We were addressed on Saturday morning by Miss Katie Kehm, of New Era, Ore., who is an earnest and strong reasoner, and we think will make her mark as an eloquent Liberal speaker. Professor Bell also gave us a short address in the forenoon. In the afternoon Mrs. Mattie P. Krekel gave us one of her most eloquent lectures. She must be heard to be appreciated. We are proud and glad to know that she is to remove her family to Portland and become a citizen of Oregon. As we hav elected her field secretary for the coming year we expect some grand work for the cause of Liberalism, and we hope every vice-president in the state will take the matter in hand and assist her all they possibly can.

In the evening we were addressed by John E. Remsburg, who has been rightly named the 'Ingersoll of the West." We are glad to add such names to our list of noble workers in the Liberal cause.

On Sunday morning we were addressed by Moses Hull, of Chicago, in a very fine discourse on "Secularism."

The afternoon session was given to Elder Alonzo T. Jones, of New York city, who delivered an able address on ecclesiastical legislation. His address showed much research and a thorough knowledge of the subject under discussion.

In the evening the convention was addressed by the noted Liberal lecturer, Wm. Jackson Armstrong, of Washington, D. C. The large hall was without standing-room, and the speaker was listened to with the deepest attention and frequently applauded. We also had the pleasure of listening to Samuel P. Putnam, the champion of Freethought in this state, and who has done more than any other one man for the cause of Liberalism in this northwest country. Monday the 13th was a working day with Secularists, and business began at 9.30 A.M., the most important business being the election of officers, appointing of committees, etc.

The officers elected for the ensuing year were: President, Cornelius Beal, Portland. One hundred and twenty vice-presidents. Mrs. Mattie P. Krekel, field secretary. Miss Katie Kehm, assistant secretary. Mr. Reuben Wright, of Molalla, treasurer. Legislativ committee: Mr. C. Beal, Portland; Hon. Lee Laughlin, North Yamhill; Mrs. Mattie P. Krekel, Portland; J. Henry Schroeder, Arago; Dr. J. W. McClure, Silverton; Mr. John Long, Coburg; Mrs. D. A. Baylor, East Portland; Mrs. S. C. Todd, Forest Grove.

Their work will be to circulate and receive petitions for the repeal of all laws exempting church property from taxation; to attend the next session of the state legislature and see that those petitions are read and acted upon, and not as usual "laid on the table." The following resolutions were read and adopted:

Resolved, That the recognition of the rights and dignity of labor are necessary to the perpetuity of the American republic, and this convention recognizes the importance of all reforms the purposes of which are for the advancement of the working people. The power of the government cannot be made conducive to the success of these measures until all ecclesiastical usurpations in the state are successfully resisted, and civil and religious liberty are secured to all.

Resolved, That this convention urges upon Liberals the importance of organizing local societies for the purpose of disseminating Secular principles involving natural morality, equal rights, and impartial liberty.

Resolved, That while this convention recognizes the importance of working for all the demands of state secularization, it would advise that special efforts be made to secure the taxation of church property, and instructs the board of directors to provide, from the funds of this Union, petitions to be circulated among the people of Oregon for their signatures, asking the legislature of Oregon to repeal the law exempting church property from taxation.

WHEREAS, We hav invited the whole world, Christians, Jews, and pagans alike, to our Columbian Exposition; and, whereas, there are millions of poor people whose duties and poverty will prevent their attending the Exposition on any other day except Sundays; and, whereas, we believe it no less than a swindle on that portion of the public who desire to attend the Exposition on Sunday to close it against the public on that day for the benefit of the churches and ministers, who claim a monopoly of the amusement and instruction to be afforded on that day, therefore,

Resolved, That we enter our most earnest protest against the attempts to close the World's Fair on Sunday.

Resolved, That this convention demands the repeal or modification of all laws which can be used to interfere with the just freedom of the mails.

WHEREAS, During the past year our Liberal brother and life-member of the Oregon Secular Union has passed from life in the order of nature,

Resolved, That we express our painful regrets; and further, that we hereby extend to his bereaved family our profound sympathy and condolence.

Resolved, That we return our sincere thanks to Elder A. T. Jones for his kindness in coming so far to attend our convention, and for his very able lecture.

Resolved, That we extend to Elder Jones a cordial invitation to lecture before the Oregon Secular Union next year.

Resolved, That this convention urge upon Liberals the fact that they must rally to the support of all Liberal papers, for we depend upon them for the propagation of our ideas and the publication of our proceedings; and especially does it urge upon the Liberals of this coast the necessity of more generously supporting Freethought.

A vote of thanks was also passed to President C. Beal for his excellent management of the convention, and to all others who spoke and participated in the proceedings.

The ball in the evening was well attended, and the light fantastic was tripped until a late hour in the night. Socially, it was a pronounced success, as all appeared to fully enjoy themselvs.

And so endeth the second annual convention of the Oregon state Secular Union.

There was a sharp little fight in the afternoon over a certain resolution which some of us thought was rather an indorsement of some parties who take especial pains to violate the laws in the vilest and most obscene manner. Our best speakers were with us, however, and the resolution was modified until it was accepted as it now stands—the fifth resolution.

We, as a state organization, are determined to go on record as openly denouncing all vile and obscene literature, no matter who publishes or sells it. We want none of it, and we hav no sympathy with those who revel in it.

Battle for Constitutional Rights in Washington.

In the case of Mr. Samuel Christopher, member of the Washington Secular Union, who keeps a barber-shop in Seattle, Police Justice Rivers decided that the Sunday-closing statute under which arrests were made for violation of Sunday sacredness did not apply to trade in the sense of work at mechanical labor or handicraft, but the word trade was used only in its legal sense—that is, trade, barter, sale of goods or merchandise. The brilliant argument of our president, Richard Winsor, so fully sustained by means of legal authorities, called forth the compliments of the court for its learning and research. So far the constitutionality of the statute was not passed on. But under the ruling of the court our demurrer was sustained. The court decided that the statute did not apply to working at lawful handicraft or mechanical work. The prisoner was discharged, and last Sunday nearly all the barber-shops were kept open.

The animus of the fanatical bigots and underhand work of the National Sabbath Union, is manifest in the fact that the wealthy clothing merchants, who were arrested for actually selling goods and merchandise on Sunday, although keeping open and doing big business were not molested. Since we obtained change of venue the whole matter has slumbered, no action been taken. But Mr. Christopher, the hard-working citizen, because a Liberal has been singled out as the victim of their malicious persecution. He was arrested again last Wednesday. No other barber was complained of. In the same building, the very next door to Mr. Christopher's bath-house and barber-shop, is the Ranier Notion store, for sale of notions and gents' furnishing goods, open all day long every Sunday, yet no complaint was made. Mr. Christopher was arrested and taken before Judge Humes of the superior court to answer for an offense for which he had already been arrested. His case was argued, and he was discharged as having committed no offense against the law. Our counsel were out of the city. He called the attention of the court to his previous arrest and discharge. Nevertheless, he was compelled to furnish cash bail. The case is set down for next Thursday.

We shall fight the old puritanical relic of barbarism they call the Sunday-closing statute, by every possible legitimate means, to the very end. It is just as well the matter has been—even though unjustly and illegally—brought before the higher courts. We shall now force decision of the question as to the constitutionality of the statute. We will carry the war into Africa, without fear or favor. If the superior court, swayed or intimidated by the fanatics, the pagan sun-worshipers, of the National Sabbath Union, decides against us, the Washington Secular Union will enforce the law rigidly. We will make no attack on the poor, the weak, or the defenseless, but cause the arrest of and press to conviction every newspaper publisher who sells newspapers on Sunday, and all editors and employees who do necessary work on Sunday to get out a Monday morning edition. If all work and business is prohibited, it shall not be enforced against Liberals or members of the Washington Secular Union alone. Work in the power houses of cable and electric cars must stop. No more street-cars can run on Sunday. All restaurants must close. We will keep a sharp lookout for the mayor, chief of police, and all other high public officers. The statute reads:

Sec. 2,070. Any public officer who shall refuse or willfully neglect to inform against and prosecute offenders against this chapter shall be deemed guilty of a misdemeanor, and on conviction shall be punished by a fine of not less than $25, nor more than $100, and the court before which such officer shall be tried shall declare the office or appointment held by such officer vacant for the balance of his term.

By the time the case reaches the supreme court, the legislature will hav been driven to repeal the obnoxious statute.

A case of a Mr. Boreman, proprietor of the Beehive store at Spokane Falls, was tried last week in that city. The jury quickly agreed on a verdict acquitting the prisoner.

We are delayed in preventing religious exercises in one of the public schools in this city (Seattle), on account of change of the school board. The election will be held Saturday. We must wait the action of the new board before going into court.

We hav another case of compulsory Bible-reading and recitation of the Lord's prayer, at Coupeville, Island county. The school-teacher published a bombastic rejection of the written and oral requests of citizens for its discontinuance. I hav just returned from delivering lectures there, and hav written the county superintendent and await his reply.

The law of the state is all on the side of right, but the arrogant assumption and the law-breaking proclivities of priests and parsons render necessary an appeal to the higher courts to enforce obedience to its just requirements. No other remedy is left us.

Once we obtain a decision of the supreme court and all religious exercises and instruction in public schools in Washington will cease forever. And so with rigid Sunday observance laws, only the fight may be fiercer.

The Knights of Labor (all the assemblies of the city) hav, under the secret manipulations of the emissaries of the National Sabbath Union, issued a manifesto proclaiming themselvs advocates of the Sunday law. For ways that are dark and schemes of deep craft, commend me to the Rev. Mr. Crafts, of the National Sabbath fanatics. But this makes our work harder, the contest fiercer. Yet right shall win.

The necessity of organization is imperativ, if we would not become the slaves of church and priestcraft. That Liberal of Washington who fails to giv earnest, activ sympathy and support in this fierce contest for right and liberty is unworthy of recognition by those who actually defend the grand principles of Liberalism and practice its ennobling teachings.

Secretary Washington Secular Union.

Another Letter from Mr. Heywood.

TO THE EDITOR OF THE TRUTH SEEKER, Sir: Twenty years ago I wrote relativ to woman's rights, "Through John Baptist or Herod, Brutus or Cæsar, Cromwell or Stuart, Lincoln or Buchanan, the moral sense, often stifled or perverted, but never conquered, here and there gets into creed, deed. or positiv law, and makes the epoch memorable. One evolves a truth and is reviled, starved, or murdered outright for it; the truth survives, overrules law and custom, and men grow famous in eulogizing what they killed the discoverer for announcing. The king's arm being too short to reach the circumference of his realm, he delegates his will to subordinate executors, on whom, in turn, he is somewhat dependent. Thus all governments, in their way, are representativ and rest on consent; though they differ in the width of the circle, in the number of nobles taken into royal confidence. But despotism makes the will of monarchy its ultimate appeal, while Liberty, accepting as final nothing this side of Natural Right, defers to popular reason, and is served or cheated by that democratic being, the average man, the majority. In that marvel to monarchs all citizens are kings in so far as they incarnate equity" (Uncivil Liberty, p. 3).

Carlyle said, "Democracy is anarchy plus the constable;" rather, as I understand it, democracy is anarchy transcending the constable. In Webster's words, "The true office of government is to protect persons and property from invasion." And wherever liberty is invaded, Webster again speaks in memorably insurgent tone, "The right of revolution always exists." When proslavery greed was making chattel-bondage national, the Union "a herd of states hunting slaves," citizen, anarchical conscience enacted personal liberty bills, built "underground railroads" to protect black rebels. Ex-Mayor Charles G. Reed of Worcester, Mass., points to the spot on Front street where the people surged past intent on killing a slave-hunter, but Senator Geo. F. Hoar, then a young lawyer, mounted a dry-goods box, pleaded with his infuriated, law-breaking neighbors to keep the Southerner's property, the negro, but let his hunter go alive and in peace. T. W. Higginson, then a Theodore Parker preacher in Worcester, and Stephen S. Foster—the Isaiah, as Pillsbury was the Ezekiel, of Abolitionists—went on either side of the Southerner and got him to the depot and off without bloodshed. In May, 1860, there was a great Abolition meeting in Music Hall, Boston, three thousand people present; Lydia Maria

Child, Father Taylor, and his son-in-law, Rev. Mr. Barnes, now chaplain of this prison, and other notable persons were on the platform. Wendell Phillips recited a case where a young slave and his lady love, also a slave, had escaped and reached Baltimore, but dared not travel together farther North; so he concluded to put her in a dry-goods box and send her to Philadelphia as freight, he catching a ride as best he could. Arrived there he sought Abolitionists who went with him to the freight depot to get the precious goods; but, to their amazement, they found the box standing on its head! They conveyed it to a place of safety and opened it; the girl was unconscious, but not dead; she revived and lived! Painting this tragic case, in his own matchless style, he paused, and in tones of deep solemnity exclaimed, "When that girl steps on the sacred soil of the Old Bay state, what you call law hurls her back to bondage. God damn the commonwealth of Massachusetts!" The great audience heaved with excitement; hisses and cheers contended for mastery, till, at last, the oratoric anathema got enthusiastic, unquestioned, overwhelming approval. Mrs. Child spatted so vigorously that she broke her finger-ring. Telling Mr. Phillips of it the next morning in the Antislavery office, he said, "Mrs. Child, I shall get that ring mended for you." I was present; and curiously enough, Chaplain Barnes, July 27th, my first Sunday here, referred to the case in the chapel, but did not quite giv Phillips's "plain English."

Mr. Harman's cases in Kansas and ours here in Massachusetts are personal liberty and state rights at the front again. But, instead of its open-faced assertion by Southerners, tyranny now "in ways that are dark" and tricks that are damnable assails right; instigated by "instructions from Washington," assassins of freedom hit you in the dark; dragged into a blind alley you are brained for alleged indelicacy. Instead of the heroic truth which in the persons of Shadrach, Meshach, and Abednego was cast into the burning, fiery furnace (Dan. iii, 10-23), and in the person of Daniel was thrown among savage lions (Ibid vi, 8-16), in the person of John Baptist was beheaded, and in Peter, Paul, and the rest was imprisoned, we now hav skulking deceit, pervading in Sunday show-business called "religion." The original exponent of Christian afflatus naturally became the leading fact in its historic martyrdoms. "And while he yet spake to Judas, one of the twelve came and with him a great multitude with swords and staves from the chief priests and elders of the people. Now he that betrayed him gave them a sign, saying, Whomsoever I shall kiss, that same is he; hold him fast. And forthwith he came to Jesus, and said, Hail master, and kissed him. Then came they and laid hands on Jesus and took him. . . . And they stripped him and put on a scarlet robe, and a crown of thorns; they mocked him, spit upon him, and led him out to be crucified" (Matt. xxvi, 27).

In these days the church is represented by "decoys" and "spotters." The alleged evidence vs. me in five cases, since Nov. 2, 1877, was obtained by lying. By overdoing the decoy business Comstock is under a cloud of execration. In the case which cages me here the complainant was impersonal, though Comstock and Wanamaker were the instigating spirits. Obsessed by them, Dr. Josiah D. Gregory, the Princeton postmaster, "kissed" me in concrete lies. This trinity of deceit, Comstock, Wanamaker, and Gregory, are the three-headed Judas running the present crucifixion business. For the first time in our history we hav a cabinet officer "ordering" a local postmaster to lie to a citizen in order to imprison him for difference of opinion.

Sad indeed it is that liberty, hitherto, has come mainly through martyrdom, that "by the light of burning heretics" we track the bleeding feet of progress—civilization advancing from prison to prison, from scaffold to scaffold, from stake to stake. But truth suppressed to-day rules to-morrow. The stone rejected by the builders becomes the head of the corner. Wind, tide, all element forces, help navigators who know natural law.

> Paul and Silas in their prison
> Sang of Christ, the Lord arisen,
> And an earthquake's arm of might
> Broke the dungeon gates at night.

Twelve years ago the war on my book, "Cupid's Yokes," was fierce, but soon over. Myself, Mr. Bennett, Mr. Bell, Miss Tilton, Abbie Dike, Dr. Floyd, all came out victorious, and citizen's rights assailed gained immensely. Your great city, which at a distance seemed only Comstockville, was personally canvassed by Miss Tilton, thousands of the "suppressed" books sold there, citizens' right to select their own reading matter vindicated, and New York was herself again. Outside of Freethinkers, free traders, and free lovers, very few Americans yet realize the extent to which suppression of opinions and censorship of the press and of morals has been imposed on these states. In 1878 it was my opinions more than style of expression that were assailed. I moved amendments to social conditions. It was my right to do so. The Declaration of Independence asserts the right of the people to "alter or abolish" the government itself. We are not so near the millennium that morals are not subject to improvement. Now the question of style is in issue; not yours or mine merely, but the right of women especially to protest as best they can against sex abuse. Why should they not speak explicitly? Repression is too crushing. Evils are so flagrant, women and children suffer so intensely, that they hav not time or breath to "palter in a double sense," or "patch fig-leaves for the naked truth." Nobody is asked to agree with Mr. Harman, Mr. Heywood, Mrs. Slenker, me, or others. Shall those who wish to listen to or read opinions relating to physiology or language be permitted to do so? "The idea that we should hav had to contend, in Massachusetts, thirteen years for the right to be honestly intelligent in morals and yet liv on the outside of prisons?" What Mr. Harman, I, and others hav done is sanctioned by the Massachusetts bill of rights, and the guarantees of religious liberty and freedom of the press in the federal and all the state constitutions. What the Abolitionists asserted for negro rights we now claim for human rights. Again and again hav clear-headed judges conceded —Nelson, Devens, Pitman, Paul, Treat—hav recognized our right to pursue our educational reformatory work unmolested. The rulings of Foster and Carpenter, Comstock's interpretation of the statutes, the rude hand of violence, are not law in any enlightened court. Some who were awake and outspoken years ago seem to be asleep and are dumb now. They took in but a part of the great issue; a pint measure will not hold a quart, mechanically or intellectually. But intelligence breaks out in many new quarters. Thought gains, though here and there a thinker may be silenced by violence for a time. I was glad indeed to see Dr. Foote here September 11th, and to learn from him of the activity of the "old guard" for free speech. The resolute persistency with which he stands by those assaulted in the way of their duty, many living observers feel grateful for, and history will not forget the brave and timely service which he and his coworkers hav done and are doing for right invaded. Who is a citizen?—who stands for human rights, not merely for the rights of a person, a sect, a "system," an ism? is the question. Is there intelligent strength, personal character, enough in these states to assert and maintain one's right to mind his own business? Freedom is a mockery, liberty mere pretense, if a few Vice Society pimps are, in this matter, to giv law to eighty million people.

Our Christian Era.

From the Argonaut.

The six great military powers of the European continent are suffering under the crushing weight of financial burdens, imposed upon them, year after year, in the shape of military and naval expenditures. France, Germany, and England can support the immense taxation that is being placed upon their people, but to Austrians, Italians, and Russians the taxation is very burdensome, and to such a degree that it is difficult to endure. Austria is crippled financially and impoverished in all her agricultural and industrial pursuits through the munificence of her expenditure upon her standing army and reserves. Russia maintains on a war footing three millions of fighting men. Italy is suffering more painfully than any of the nations referred to—is, in fact, stifling in her war harness, while her peasantry are wasting from lack of nourishing food. In United Italy, real estate pays forty per cent of its income-tax, and brigandage is becoming the only alternativ to starvation. Great is the suffering and oppression which Europe groans under in the endeavor to protect her countries from probable war—from scientific, mechanical, and merciless war. This is almost more terrible than actual hostilities, while preparation for peace that is maintained at such an expense is more unendurable than a conflict of arms.

Yet this is a Christian era and an age of transcendent civilization. The Salvation Army, with a military organization vast in numbers, tramps with banners and drums and instruments of brass and rendezvouses in military barracks. Religious revivals increase throughout all civilized lands. Christians are more numerous than sailors and soldiers; great multitudes are worshiping the son of God, the meek and lowly Jesus, whose mission on earth was peace and good-will to men, who enjoined the duty of non-resistance, taught the doctrin of forgivness to enemies, and when smitten on one cheek to turn the other also. This is the faith of the Christian doctrin and Christian world. We never weary of contrasting the Christian religion with the barbarism and cruelty of the pagan age. God gave his only begotten son, delivered him over to a Roman governor and Israelitish mob, that he might be murdered on the cross as an atonement for the sins of mankind. He was betrayed by one apostle, denied by another, doubted, and deserted, till on the hill of Calvary he drained the cup of sorrow and died an ignominious death.

His cross is the emblem of peace. Under this sacred device a political, money-making civil and religious organization has grown and strengthened till it has imperiled the world, and has embroiled it in interminable, relentless, bloody wars. Religious wars hav been the terror of the earth. They hav been fought for ambition, empire, power; and every device that human ingenuity can conceive has been employed to strengthen the marvelous organization of the church. In the name of the Christ, and to compel humanity to imitate his example and to follow his precepts, there has been poured out more human blood than characterized the wildest lusts of barbaric rule. The cruel tortures of the Spanish Inquisition, the brutal measures of Torquemada, the relentless ferocity of the duke of Alva, the fearful massacre of the Huguenots, are mile-stones and monuments along the line of Christian pilgrimage from the time when the babe of the manger imbibed his mother's milk and the breath of kine in the stable of Bethlehem. History is a bloody path along which the Christian church has dragged the bruised and bleeding body of the martyred son of God. All this has been accomplished in the name of Christianity, till the intellectual world has grown rebellious that the pretense of saving souls should be used as a mantle to cover the deformities of this ghastly spectacle.

The apostle who denied his master holds the key that opens to eternal happiness the only realm where escape is possible from eternal torment, and the only sesame that unlocks the adamantin gate is paid in toll of gold to priests who make prayers in Latin for the ignorant and erring soul plodding through the maze of a troublous life. Yet with such a Christian organization dominating the world, we hav ten millions of trained soldiers and of sailors with arms of precision and smokeless powder engaged in mimic war and interchange of hypocritical and meaningless civilities on the deck of war-ships, with mighty guns and armored with plates of steel, preparing for actual war.

Her majesty of England—empress of conquered millions in India, and of unconquered thousands in Ireland, on her British farms, in her shops, and along her commercial docks—is an ideal dragoon, at the head of the German troop of cavalry. William of Hohenzollern is honorary admiral of a British fleet, while in his heart he wishes he could sink the British navy. Citizens of Toulon welcome ancient enemies, who once trod their streets as conquerors, and salute the flag that once floated in triumph over their Hotel de Ville. The people of Italy, where God has given authority to a vicegerent, languish for want of food, while plowmen and harvesters are preparing, by mimic war, for actual hostilities in alliance with Germany and Austria to embroil Europe in a desolating, useless, and bloody conflict. This sanguinary divinity permits his infallible vicegerent to allow his servant, William of Germany, to increase his army and the taxes of his people, by adding to his war forces and war budget. May we not ask ourselvs whether it would not be better for the human race if this Christian church should be destroyed, and its infallible representativ of the divine power made a prisoner for life in his bastile of the Vatican? Would it not be better for mankind and man that all his priests and co-conspirators should be incarcerated with him, where his conduct has rightly placed him? Would it not be better for humanity and man that all this bad religious dream could be wiped out, and in its place science, morality, and reason be made supreme, in the hope that peace and not war might prevail, and the earth enjoy a return to the blissful era of barbarous paganism? Or what is better, in the place of an ambitious hierarchy, let us hav an era of sense and philosophy in which the world may be ruled by common sense and right reason.

IN the vast majority of cases the tendency of the doctrin of eternal punishment will be to indurate the character, to diffuse abroad a callousness and insensibility to the suffering of others that will profoundly debase humanity. If you make the detailed and exquisit torments of multitudes the habitual object of the thoughts and imaginations of men, you will necessarily produce in most of them a gradual indifference to human suffering, and in some of them a disposition to regard it with positiv delight. If you further assure men that these sufferings form an integral part of a revelation which they are bound to regard as a message of good tidings, you will induce them to stifle every feeling of pity, and almost to encourage their insensibility as a virtue. If you end your teaching by telling them that the being who is the ideal of their lives confines his affection to the members of a single church, that he will torture forever all who are not found within its pale, and that his children will forever contemplate those tortures in a state of unalloyed felicity, you will prepare the way for every form of persecution that can be directed against those who are without.—Lecky.

What They Say About the Picture Book.

H. O. Pentecost in Twentieth Century.

The "Freethinker's Pictorial Text-Book," showing the absurdity and untruthfulness of the church's claiming to be a divine and beneficent institution, and revealing the abuses of a union of church and state, with copious citations of fact, history, statistics, and opinions of scholars to maintain the argument of the artist, Watson Heston, is published by the Truth Seeker Company, 28 Lafayette place, New York, and sold for $2 a copy. The book contains a large number of wood-cuts which appeared in THE TRUTH SEEKER during the years 1886 and 1889 inclusiv. Some of the subjects of these pictures are as follows: "Uncle Sam and the Priests," "The Church Robbing the People," "Thanksgiving," "Sabbath Laws," "The Children and the Church," "Women and the Church," "The Church and Thomas Paine," "The Clergy and Their Flocks," "The Church and Slavery," "Persecutions by the Church," "Heaven and Hell," etc. Besides these pictures, there are a great number of pertinent quotations from great authors, living and dead, including Garibaldi, Professor Draper, Robert G. Ingersoll, President Dwight, Prof. Felix L. Oswald, Guizot, Lecky, Thomas Jefferson, Macaulay, Lafayette, George Washington, Walt Whitman, Benjamin Franklin, and many others of equal fame and learning, embracing the realms of history, science, poetry, and theology. These quotations from great authors are, in themselvs, worth the price of the book, and are sufficient to furnish a liberal education on the subjects of which they treat. The pictures are in Watson Heston's well-known style; not particularly good in drawing, but graphic and easy to understand. The artist does not work in the best style of art, but he never fails to make his meaning understood, and the book is calculated to shock, startle, persuade, and teach. It will be a pleasure to those who are familiar with the persistent work of THE TRUTH SEEKER against superstition and mental slavery on religious questions, and a profit to those who are prepared to read it and calmly reflect on its facts and teachings.

A Fable for Christians.

A Freethinking Elephant, while roaming in quest of his own proper food, chanced to disturb some Jesuitical Hyenas and Puritanical Buzzards disputing over the carcass of a Dead Ass. The foul odor of the decaying thing naturally repelled the clean and healthy tastes of the Elephant, and he instinctivly turned aside to seek a purer atmosphere. The Hyenas and Buzzards, thinking that all animals must hav appetites as depraved as their own, invited the Elephant to come and partake of a feast with them.

"No, thank you," replied the Elephant, "such food may be very agreeable to you who hav been raised that way, but for me it would be not only nauseating, but poisonous; and, altogether, I prefer to liv on clean things." At this the unclean brutes and birds became greatly enraged; the Hyenas howled, and the Buzzards croaked, and after heaping all sorts of abuse upon the Elephant, and calling him a "heretic" and a wicked "Infidel," they boasted that when he came to die he would repent and return to the dead ass to be comforted, and he might even be glad, yet, to get a Hyena or a Buzzard to shrive him. But the Elephant, knowing how utterly absurd and foolish their assertions were, calmly went on his way regarding his assailants with mingled feelings of pity and contempt.

MORAL.—Because you Christians love a dead creed, don't abuse others who hav purer and more wholesome tastes than you hav, for you only worry yourselvs and do the skeptics no harm.

They Want to be God Himself.

The congregation of St. Paul's Episcopal church, Charlottetown, Prince Edward's Island, Canada, recently succeeded in unseating their rector, having taken a dislike to his domineering and high church methods. The bishop, however, is decidedly opposed to any such manifestations of a will of their own on the part of his flocks. So he recompensed and advanced the rector by making him an archdeacon. Then he preached to the presumptuous congregation upon the sinfulness of differing with him or those whom he chose to set over them. This Bishop Courtney of Nova Scotia, formerly of Boston, said:

"It is not the people's place to watch if their rector teaches orthodox doctrins or to criticise his preaching as if they were the shepherds and not the sheep. They should be willing to learn from their minister. They should receive him as Jesus Christ. When they meet him on the street or invite him to their homes they should feel that Christ was meeting or supping with them. Then would you dare to criticise Jesus Christ?"

This is merely a fresh exemplification of the disposition of clerics of all times to approximate themselvs and their office to God himself and his authority. Where devotion and submission hav been lessened by a skeptical atmosphere, the clerics are reduced to figure merely as human beings, through whom the almighty's word is to be explained, and scarcely superior to the rest of humanity around them. But whenever skepticism has been absent and the people hav been willing to allow ecclesiastical claims to the utmost, preachers and priests hav invariably proclaimed themselvs creatures half-divine, invested with the terrors of supreme judgeship to be used at their discretion. They hav not in such periods submitted to counsel and influence by their congregations, as they now are obliged to in most Protestant localities; but instead they hav haughtily held themselvs above suasion or suggestion, and thundered forth their will in the style of godhood itself.

In this assumption of the office of the divinity the Roman Catholic church is eminent beyond the Protestant. The pope furnishes the crowning instance. He unblushingly declares himself to be God on earth. He insists that his utterances be received as unquestioningly as though they were breathed from the heavens in sheets of flame. His priests are not far behind him. They represent themselvs not merely as expounders of God's revelation, but as legates fully empowered to pardon and admit to paradise or to refuse forgivness and consign to perdition.

And while Protestants on the whole hav not made an equally striking exhibition of impudence of this nature, it is only because their existence has lain in an age when Infidelity has been in operation, and they hav not succeeded in bringing the people into a state of humbleness that would allow of their carrying their pretensions to the pitch prompted by their blown desires. In every case wherein they could obtain sufficient meekness and ignorance in their parishioners, they hav advanced their claims to a level as near that of Rome's proud prelates as they were able to attain.

Indeed, in one case where the Protestant preachers did achieve exceptional ascendency over men's minds, we find them putting forth precisely the same claims as the Catholic clergy. This was in Scotland. It is well known that Scotland is the country which of all Protestant ones fell most completely under religious obscuration and clerical control, and to this day its nativs are remarked wherever they may be for the singular combination which they present, paralleled nowhere else, of the keenest, shrewdest sagacity in many of the relations of life, along with total blindness and fatuity on subjects of religion. Over this deluded people the Scottish clergy of the seventeenth and eighteenth centuries ruled as despotically as ever did a Catholic priest over his besotted continental flock.

"The clergy," says the historian Buckle in describing Scotland, "interfered in every man's private concerns, ordered how he should govern his family, and often took upon themselvs personal control of his household." Clarendon, under the year 1640, emphatically says (History of the Rebellion, p. 67), "The preacher reprehended the husband, governed the wife, chastised the children, and insulted over the servants, in the houses of the greatest men." The theory was, that "ministers and elders must be submitted unto as fathers" (Shield's Enquiry into Church Communion, 2d edit., Edinburgh, 1747, p. 66). In the middle of the seventeenth century, one of the most famous of the Scotch preachers openly asserted the right of his profession to interfere in family matters, on the ground that such was the custom in the time of Joshua. "The ministers of God's house hav not only the ministry of holy things, as word and sacraments, committed to their charge, but also the power of ecclesiastical government to take order with scandalous offenses within the family; both these are here promised to Joshua and the priests" (Hutcheson's Exposition of the Minor Prophets, vol. iii, p. 72, London, 1674). In 1603, the presbytery of Aberdeen took upon themselvs to order that every master of a house should keep a rod, that his family, including his servants, might be beaten if they used improper language" (Selections from the Records of the Kirk Session, Presbytery, and Synod of Aberdeen). It also appears that, in 1674, the clergyman was expected to exercise supervision over all visitors to private houses; since he ought to be informed, "iff ther be anie persone receaved in the familie without testimoniall presented to the minister."

Besides their own action in supervision, these preachers had minions, called elders, everywhere; they divided each parish into several quarters, and allotted to each quarter an elder to pry into everything done there. Besides these elders, additional spies were appointed, that no act might escape. One of the duties of these clerical agents was to compel attendance at church. They not only were to whip in to the churches whomsoever they found in the streets, but were also to ransack private dwellings to see that no one there withheld from the preacher his presence and coin. "It is thocht expedient that ane baillie with tua of the sessioun pas throw the towne everie Sabboth day, and nott sic as thay find absent fra the sermones ather afoir or efter none; and for that effact that thay pas and sersche sic houss as thay think maist meit, and pas athort the streittis" (Selections from the Records of the Kirk Session, Presbytery, and Synod of Aberdeen, p. 26). "To pas throw the towne to caus the people resort to the hering of the sermones" (p. 59). "Ganging throw the towne on the ordinar preiching dayes in the weik, als weill as on the Saboth day, to caus the people resort to the sermones" (p. 77; see also p. 94; and Wodrow's Collections, vol. ii, part ii, p. 37: "The Session allous the searchers to go into houses and apprehend absents from the kirk."). Strangers were forced to attend chnrch or depart.

A person could not even engage himself as a domestic servant or a field laborer without the consent of the preacher and his little court. "Another peculiarity was the supervision wielded over the movements of people to such a degree that they could neither obtain lodging nor employment except by a license from the kirk session, or, by defying this police court, expose themselvs to fine and imprisonment" (Lawson's Book of Perth, p. 37).

If anyone raised the spite of a preacher, the man of God would require the servants of the offending gentleman to appear before him and reveal on oath any events which they had witnessed in the household of the delinquent, of such a nature that they could be twisted into matter of prosecution. In 1652, Sir Alexander Irvine indignantly writes that the presbytery of Aberdeen, "when they had tried wayes, bot in vaine, to mak probable this their vaine imaginatione, they, at lenthe, when all other meanes failed thame, by ane unparalelled barbaritie, enforced my serwandis to reweall upon oathe what they sawe, herd, or knewe done within my house, beyond which no Turkische inquisitione could pase" (The Miscellany of the Spalding Club, vol. iii, p. 206).

Speaking of a preacher without reverence was visited with sharp penalties. In 1656, a servant was ordered to be brought before the kirk session of Aberdeen "for her rayleing against Mr. Andrew Cant, minister, in saying that becaus the said Mr. Andrew spak against Yuill, he spak lyke ane old fool" (Selections from the Records of the Kirk Session, Presbytery, and Synod of Aberdeen, p. 138). In 1642, the presbytery of Lanark had up a certain James Baillie, because he stated the extremely probable circumstance "that two fooles mett togither when the minister and his sone mett togither" (Selections from the Registers of the Presbytery of Lanark, p. 30).

Just as our Canadian bishop deems that we should meet him on the street with feelings as though Christ were meeting us, so did the Scotch ministers consider that they should be met at every turn with marks of adoration. To pass a Scotch preacher on the streets without saluting him was punished as a crime.

To dissent from one of the clergymen in point of doctrin, was as culpable as we see Bishop Courtney of Nova Scotia here in 1890 holding it to be. "In 1607, Mr. William Cowper, minister, complained upon Robert Keir that he had disdainfully spoken of his doctrin. The (kirk) session ordained him to be warned to the morrow" (Lawson's Book of Perth, p. 247). "It was generally believed," says Buckle's History, "that whoever gainsaid the clergy would be visited, not only with temporal penalties, but also spiritual ones. For such a crime, there was punishment here, and there was punishment hereafter. The preachers willingly fostered a delusion by which they benefited. They told their hearers that what was spoken in the pulpit was binding upon all believers, and was to be regarded as immediately proceeding from the deity. This proposition being established, other propositions naturally followed. The clergy believed that they alone were privy to the counsels of the almighty, and that, by virtue of this knowledge, they could determin what any man's future state would be. Going still further, they claimed the power, not only of foretelling his future state, but also of controling it; and they did not scruple to affirm that, by their censures, they could open and shut the kingdom of heaven. As if this were not enough, they also gave out that a word of theirs could hasten the moment of death, and by cutting off the sinner in his prime, could bring him at once before the judgement-seat of God." This, we see, was the same pretension assumed by the Roman Catholic priesthood—that of binding or loosing, ordaining to heaven or to hell.

No theme better suited these preachers in their pulpits than themselvs and their powers and glories. They exhausted, says Buckle, "the choicest epithets of praise on themselvs, and on their own pursuits. When one of them got into the pulpit, or took a pen in his hand, he seemed as if he could not find words strong enough to express his sense of the surpassing importance of that class of which he was himself a member. They alone knew the truth; they alone were able to inform and enlighten mankind. They had their instruction direct from heaven; they were, in fact, the embassadors of Christ; from him they received their appointment, and since no one else could reward them, so no one else had a right to rule them. As they were messengers sent by the almighty, they were rightly termed angels, and it was the duty of the people to listen to their minister, as if he really were an angel who had descended upon earth."

How these Scotch clergymen suppressed free and progressiv thought, and indeed well-nigh rooted out all tendency or desire toward it forever; how they paralleled the atrocities of the Roman Catholic Inquisition in torture of resistants; how they surpassed the papal church in witch persecution, and how they brought ruin to their charges in a score of ways, we cannot now detail. We hav said enough to serve our purpose—to show that the clergy of every time and place ask only the opportunity afforded by abjectness in their flocks and they will run into inconceivable excesses of arrogance, exalt themselvs into semi-divine beings, and rule over their slaves with vainglory and cruelty unmatched in earth's entire records of any other class. Protestants would fain hav us believe that these arrogances are chargeable only to the Roman Catholics, but the instance of Scotland givs contrary evidence, and the New England clergy when allowed well-nigh equaled their Scottish brethren, and we know that they would be the same to-day if we would but giv them the power. The position of the Episcopal bishop of Nova Scotia is a sample of what the church of that designation would hav if it could. They are all alike—Roman Catholic, Episcopal, and Protestant all swell and burn and fume with craving to play God on earth, and will do it to-day or any day on which we giv them the opportunity.

The Christian Mafia.

Our readers hav been given the news of the assassination of Chief of Police Hennessey of New Orleans by one of the societies, the Mafia and the Stopaliagieri, which he was collecting evidence against. The crime is the latest in a series of crimes which hav caused many deaths. In June a gang of Italian bravos lay at wait at midnight for another party of Italians, Matiangas, who had offended them in some way or other, and riddled the entire party of six with bullets. The authorities determined to put an end to this vendetta business, which was getting too frequent among the Italians of New Orleans, and has resulted in forty or more murders and assassinations, and vigorous efforts were made to track and capture the criminals. Six men were arrested for the crime and tried. During the trial one of the principal witnesses, an Italian, was assassinated. The trial resulted in a conviction, but there was so much perjury by the pious oath-takers that the judge granted a new trial, which is yet to come off. Chief of Police Hennessey, who was a witness in the first case, set to work. He promised such developments as would break up the vendetta in New Orleans forever. Hennessey well understood the risk he was running. He was a man of courage and fearlessness, but he deemed it prudent, from the many threats he received, to guard himself, and never went without one or more officers as escort. Unfortunately he dismissed his body guard, and fell a victim. We want it understood by the people of the country who are shocked and indignant at this work, that what they are witnessing is an institution that is peculiar to the most Christian races of the earth, and prevails among those races either strongly or in little force just in proportion as they are thoroughly imbued with Christianity or partly freed of it. The lands that hav been most infested with this custom of the vendetta, by which the least fancied insult, or tradition of ancestral wrong and family feud, is cause for murder and this again for retaliation endlessly, are the countries of Sicily, Corsica, and Italy. Sicily is a devout Roman Catholic country, where brigands used to carry with them priests to furnish absolution for their outrages. It is the place from whence all the men arrested on suspicion of the present murder came. The men arrested are reported to be of a very ignorant type, and to hav arrived from Sicily very lately. Corsica possesses, like Sicily, infinit devoutness and no Freethought. These two islands hav always been worse, in respect of the crime that we are considering, than Italy. That land, however, was considerably infected with customs of revenge and bloodthirst at the time when the papacy's rule was unbroken. Since Freethought, and consequently all the agencies of civilization, hav entered, the vendetta has of course abated along with brigandage and all like savageries.

Let Americans view Sicily, and Corsica, and Italy, and Spain, and Mexico, and Central America, countries where the saturation of the people by Christianity is the most complete, and let them try what explanation they can giv of the coexistence there of Christianity along with the savagest vendetta, brigandage, and lawlessness in its every variety.

State and Church United.

Assistant Secretary Bussey has rendered decision at Washington in the pension case of William R. Johnson, the late corporal of Company K, Eightieth Indiana Volunteers, in which is given a more liberal construction of the law relating to "line of duty" than heretofore. On April 1, 1863, Johnson, with the first sergeant of his company, obtained a pass to attend church across the Green river, at Mumfordville, Ky., at which point his command were guarding a bridge. While crossing the river on a log Johnson fell, fracturing his left knee. The case was originally rejected on the ground that the soldier, at the time of accident, was not in the line of duty. Assistant Secretary Bussey takes a contrary view, and allows the pension sought. He says: "If the claimant had, by authority of his superior officer, been crossing the river for the purpose of obtaining necessary physical sustenance, he would certainly hav been in line of duty, it being a necessary incident to the service. To hold that a similar mission for spiritual sustenance, which is also presumed to hav been necessary, placed him out of line of duty, would be depriving our soldiery of Christian teaching, and therefore in conflict with military law, which recognizes the necessity or at least the propriety of it." How can such a decision be given consistently with the constitutional provision that the government shall establish no particular religion? Would the soldier's attendance of a Freethought or scientific gathering hav been accounted in line of duty? If not, is not the discrimination against Freethought or science and for Christianity a favor to that particular religion, an aid to it, a furtherance of it? And what is favor, aid, furtherance, but "establishment?" Or, what is establishment if it be not a number of acts of this nature?

Editorial Notes.

THE Denison Sunday Gazetteer says: "That phenomenal newspaper ass, Col. E. F. Shepard, editor of the New York Mail and Express, has been expelled from the Union League Club for conduct unbecoming a gentleman." There is an error here which our esteemed Texas contemporary will allow us to correct. Mr. Shepard was not expelled, only suspended for ten days.

IN a letter from Mr. Bradlaugh received a few days since he asks us to convey through THE TRUTH SEEKER his thanks to many Americans for kindly words sent him since his illness—and to whom he has been unable to reply individually—and to ask them to accept grateful acknowledgment through its columns. Mr. Bradlaugh is hard at work again, though not physically so strong as he hopes soon to be, lecturing, writing, and preparing for parliamentary work for the benefit of his constituents and the people of England.

J. E. REMSBURG'S address at the Portland congress was on the Sunday question, and was pronounced one of the most logical and convincing arguments on that question ever listened to. At the close of his discourse an enthusiastic Adventist leaped upon the stage, grasped his hand, and said: "I want to make the acquaintance of Elder Jones," the great Adventist leader having been advertised to address the congress. From Portland Mr. Remsburg went to Washington, speaking at Tacoma October 13th; Buckley, 14th; Slaughter, 15th; Seattle, 19th, and at Tacoma again the 20th. October 16th and 17th he lectured in Victoria, the capital of British Columbia.

THE Age, Boulder, Montana, says: "The Prohibition platform for Montana has some very good ideas in it, but it starts out in its first plank with the statement that 'We recognize almighty God as the source of all rightful authority,' a proposition which certainly conflicts with the Declaration of Independence, which says that governments derive their just powers from the consent of the governed. The idea embraced in the Prohibition platform has been the excuse for all the religious persecution in all ages and all countries, and with the light of experience to guide them, the people of Montana and of the United States will not yet consent to a theocracy."

A DISPATCH to the Herald of this city says that the will of the late Photius Fisk is to be contested in the Massachusetts supreme court. When Mr. Fisk died about a year ago, he left some thirty thousand dollars to be invested and held as a permanent fund, to be called the "Fisk Relief Fund," the income to be used for the relief of the poor, especial attention being paid to the needs of worthy colored persons. The will provides that no minister or person of the Roman Catholic faith shall ever hold the office of trustee. The contest is by the next of kin, residents of Hydra, and their representativ is J. M. Rodocanachi, the Greek consul. The claim is that Mr. Fisk was unduly influenced by Lyman T. Hodge, who was his attendant during the last years of his life. The dispatch also says that "the question whether a Freethinker can legally make a will is also likely to be raised before the trial ends." We do not know of course what a Massachusetts court may do, but the opinion is pretty generally held elsewhere that the question of a man's religious opinions does not enter into his testamentary abilities.

THE Rockford, Ill., grand jury had the inmates of Schweinfurth's "Heaven" before them week before last, trying to find evidence on which to indict them. Mr. Weldon, father of Mary Weldon, who recently gave birth to a child, expressed his belief in her immaculate conception. He was satisfied, he said, that what had been done in the past could be done now, and he had not the slightest doubt that immaculate conception had taken place under his roof. He was as sure of it as that he was alive. Mary, when questioned, was found to be as firm a believer in immaculate conception as her father was. Her child came without sin and she was supremely happy to know that she had been called upon to giv it birth. The other members of the family gave expression to the same belief and the grand jury, the papers state, felt somewhat discouraged. They were impressed, however, by the seeming sincerity of the witnesses. They were intelligent appearing, too, and yet they claimed to firmly believe in the teachings of Schweinfurth. When the examination was concluded a number of the jurors said that they believed the Weldons to be honest in their views. The Byron Express, whose editor recently described the Schweinfurth colony for THE TRUTH SEEKER, thinks it more than evident that nothing can be done with the flock, which result might be expected. There is no reason why immaculate conceptions should not occur now if they ever did, and those who believe in ancient happenings are not logical in disbelieving modern occurrences. It is well, too, to hav a living illustrativ witness to Christianity's claims. It may cause the people to reason upon them, and he who begins to reason will surely end by denying them.

Letters from Friends.

ARMENIA, O., Nov. 1, 1890.

MR. EDITOR: Inclosed please find $2 for the "Freethinkers' Pictorial Text-Book." I do not think I can die happy until I get that book. I am in my seventy-sixth year.

R. C. KNOWLES.

MASSILLON, O., Nov. 3, 1890.

MR. EDITOR: I do not often write testimonials, but I must say in all candor that I heartily indorse the good work of THE TRUTH SEEKER. I inclose $2 for the "Freethinker's Pictorial Text-Book."

WM. S. MOKE.

VOLO, ILL., Oct. 25, 1890.

MR. EDITOR: Please find inclosed $5 for THE TRUTH SEEKER and "Pictorial Text-Book." I hav failed to get any subscribers this time. I hav delayed remitting to you on this account; hope I shall get some yet. I hav taken THE TRUTH SEEKER ever since it was published.

Yours truly, WM. C. HOWARD.

OSHKOSH, WIS., Oct. 22, 1890.

MR. EDITOR: I am a Spiritualist, but like the paper for its impartiality. It is to be deplored that some Liberals should be so bigoted in their strictures on Spiritualism, about which they seem to know so little, lacking the evidence and accounting all as deception. Why can we not tolerate one another when we all see the main issues of life about the same? Yours truly, JOHN CHALLONER.

CLEBURNE, KAN., Oct. 14, 1890.

MR. EDITOR: I hav been taking your paper for the last four months, and it seems as though I could not get along without it. The illustrations are worth more than the price asked for the paper. I was trying to get some subscribers for the paper, but could not get them, as most of the people here are Roman Catholics, and of course they do not care for a paper like THE TRUTH SEEKER. Wishing you success, I am, Yours truly, JOHN SWANCARA.

GETTYSBURG, PA., Oct. 29, 1890.

MR. EDITOR: I am very glad that Heston is about again. I hav tried my best to get you some more subscribers, but it is uphill business in a place like this where they manufacture sky-pilots, but I am still doing a little in the way of distributing my Freethought papers that I get, and will do the best I can for the cause. With good wishes for all the Liberals in the world, and a God bless you for the balance when they find God, I remain, Yours respectfully,

W. H. KITZMILLER.

HUNTINGDON, Oct. 31, 1890.

MR. EDITOR: We received the "Pictorial Text-Book" some time ago, and hav been amused and instructed with it ever since. I would not part with it for any money if there was not another copy to be procured. It now takes the place formerly occupied by the Bible, and is a "holy terror" to the bigoted Christians of this community. Some of them refuse to look at it. I am much in love with your paper, but like it much better with than without the pictures. Long life and health to Mr. Heston. GEORGE CALDWELL.

MELVIN VILLAGE, N. H., Oct. 13, 290.

MR. EDITOR: Inclosed please find $2 for the "Freethinkers' Pictorial Text-Book." I regret very much my inability to get subscribers for your valuable paper. I tried hard, but without success. Indeed, it will not do to show a Freethought paper, as people here cannot be induced to read one. So that I feel discouraged at times. But I know that in time the truth must prevail. I will send for some books and tracts soon for missionary work.

MRS. MARY A. HORNE.

FARMDALE, O., Nov. 1, 1890.

MR. EDITOR: Last evening the Farmdale people were favored by a very able address by Charles Watts, editor of Secular Thought. The attendance was good, and gave strict attention to the subject of Secularism throughout. At the close of the discourse a vote of thanks was tendered the speaker, which was met by a proper response. During his stay in Farmdale Mr. Watts was entertained by Mr. and Mrs. H. W. Root. The best of wishes go with him.

Secularly yours, DEWITT T. ROOT.

MILAN, MO., Oct. 30, 1890.

MR. EDITOR: I inclose you a petition of our citizens to keep open the World's Fair on Sunday. I could get two thousand names if I had a little time to devote to it. Only three business men refused to sign it. One was a Presbyterian who thought Sunday should be observed, and he takes care to observe it by selling groceries at any time after and before divine service; another a Baptist, who sells tough beefsteak every day in the week Sunday not excepted, and the express agent whose mental capacity is just sufficient to be a Presbyterian. Yours truly, H. T. KNIGHT.

AUSTIN, TEX., Oct. 20, 1890.

MR. EDITOR: Please send me the picture book. We hav formed a "Liberal Association of Austin, Tex.," and I inclose its platform:

1. To encourage the study of man in all his relations.
2. To seek to realize the truth in life.
3. To aid in those movements that tend most to the improvement of the individual and society, and to the unity and freedom of mankind.
4. To facilitate the association of those who hav at heart and hold dear that absolute freedom of thought and expression which is the natural right of every rational being.
5. To inaugurate a system of positiv, tolerant thought, ethical culture, and practical benevolence, in which all liberal-minded people can unite and work in harmony for the moral education, intellectual improvement, social well-being, and consequent happiness of the human race.

H. BAYLEY.

STAPLES, MINN., Oct. 20, 1890.

MR. EDITOR: I hav been promised some new subscribers, and hav been waiting for them to send with me. But I failed to get them. I will try again in a couple of months and may hav better success. I think that once a subscriber to THE TRUTH SEEKER is to always be a subscriber.

A few words for John Peck. He is to orthodoxy what Sullivan is in the fistic arena—the champion. He strikes from the shoulder, and every blow counts. He seldom indulges in repetitions. On the contrary, he has something original each time. D. C. JENKINS.

PIKE, TEX., Oct. 13, 1890.

MR. EDITOR: Find inclosed $5 for two "Freethinker's Pictorial Text-Books," and giv me credit for the balance. I will try for some subscribers. I see two letters from my uncle, Jesse Maurer, of Harmony, Ind. I think he has been a lifelong Liberal, and I want him to hear of one relativ that has passed from ignorance to the light of reason. That Adam and Eve business is too musty to touch, but the Christian man of straw must be knocked down. The cry of every good Liberal is, "Unite."

Yours for the great cause, E. M. YINGLING.

OGDEN, UTAH, Oct. 20, 1890.

MR. EDITOR: The picture books are received. I am trying to get them out. The bookstores and stands will not do anything with them. So I got some small bills printed, and am circulating them at proper times and places. I hope to get some more. JOHN A. JOST.

BROOKLYN, N. Y., Oct. 30, 1890.

MR. EDITOR: A few evenings since I was storm-staid in a neighboring village, and had, much against my inclination, to accept of my friend's mansion for the night. It was the more repugnant to me, inasmuch as my friend was a devout, prayerful Christian, and I was known to be an Agnostic. But as chance would hav it, I was not pressed to mingle with them in the parlor. And yet I could not but hear their fervid appeals heavenward, and they became the more frantic as the pious gathering warmed up to its work. The general sinfulness of the world was pressed upon the Lord's attention, and his grace implored, which was responded to by hearty amens. By chance I heard Mr. Ingersoll's name mentioned. In listening I caught the following: "O God almighty, there is a Colonel Ingersoll, a carnal speaker who is tending mightily to disturb and unsettle the minds of thy redeemed, both in the enforcement of moral deportment and in the cunning and subtlety of langnage. Now, O Lord, in thy divine scheme of salvation, yea, or if there is any way short of blood he can be suppressed, O heavenly father, for Christ's sake let it be done, and giv thy sorrowing saints grace to approve of thy almighty justice." Heavy chest groans preceded the amens. You may well imagin your writer was astonished. At the close of the meeting and as these saints filed out I was anxious to behold this fervid, prayerful saint, but I failed. It was not Dr. Talmage, for I hav seen him, nor was it exactly his style. A SUBSCRIBER.

WELLAND, ONT., Oct. 25, 1890.

MR. EDITOR: The person whose mind has become enlightened by a knowledge of the truth of things, as made known by a study of the sciences, knows that the laws of nature are the same in all countries and at all times—that nature never violates her own laws to work a miracle. It is only in the minds of the ignorant and credulous that miracles are made to appear. If we go back thirteen hundred years, when the people were in a state of darkened ignorance and unacquainted with the laws and forces by which the world is governed, it was natural they should form theories of their own according to such knowledge and abilities as they possessed. If a poor fellow became subject to fits or any malady they were unable to account for, they attributed his case to his being possessed of a devil or devils. Or if some one was affected in some unaccountable way, they were suspected of having been bewitched. Hence the necessity for devils and witches, a creation of the imagination of ignorance. And that creation is yet retained in the minds of that class of people to this day. As people become more intelligent devils and witches will disappear, with many other equally unfounded imaginings.

Seventy-two years ago, when I was twelve years old, the Primitiv Methodists, or Ranters as they were then called, had sprung up, and reached my nativ village, Huby, in Yorkshire, England. My father's house was headquarters for their preachers. There happened at that time to be living in the village an old lady, Elizabeth Skelton, who thought or believed she was possessed of a devil, and as one of the preachers, John Oxterby, was said to be a man of great faith, she asked my father if he thought Oxterby could cast the devil out of her. My father told her that on a certain day Oxterby and another preacher, Verity, would be there; that she should come and see what could be done. She came on the day appointed. I remember the whole circumstance as well as if it had occurred only yesterday. We all knelt down—the two preachers, my father, myself, and others of our family—and Oxterby went to praying. After stating the case to the Lord, he prayed fervently to the Lord to cast the devil out of this old woman, but happening to turn his face toward Verity saw him laughing. He then said, "And, O Lord, do thou cast this laughing devil out of Verity." But as there was no appearance of any response in either case, we arose from our knees and left the case with the Lord. The old lady died a few years later without, as I know, having been delivered of a devil. Now, I believe at that time we all had more or less faith in the casting-out-devil business. And where did we get it but from the Bible, which tells us of the existence of devils and witches, the former to be cast out and the latter we are commanded to kill. This command came within our ability, and we killed a few thousands before we discovered the mistake. The devils we hav not been able to deal with further than to lose faith in their personality and existence—except the most ignorant of our race, who still stick to the myths and teachings of an ignorant people who lived eighteen hundred years ago. JOHN RAY.

VINELAND, N. J., June 14, 1890.

MR. EDITOR: You published an article of mine in which I suggested that we hav new names for the churches, and not disgrace Christ by naming them after him. If Christ was only a myth, I am willing to receive instruction from him where I can, and think it as wrong to misrepresent, falsify, disgrace, or belie a myth as it is to do the same to a living man, and that is why I suggested that we hav new names for the church, for each and all should bear his own disgrace and not pile it upon another. But in your issue of July 5th E. Van Buskirk, M.D., comes down upon me thus: "Mr. Editor, I see that Brother Hacker is a little muddled about the meaning of Christian and Christianity. I do not know what kind of instruments of torture Christ used himself, or whether any, but he says: 'Bring hither those mine enemies that would not that I should rule over them, and slay them before me' (see Luke xix, 20). To hav this order fulfilled would require the use of some kind of instruments, whether it be the gibbet, shotgun, or wheel. Now, this order was given by Christ, so that the order given by him would be called 'Christian,' and the fulfillment of the order would be called 'Christianity,'" etc.

I am not acquainted with Dr. E. Van Buskirk, M.D., but if he makes such monstrous blunders in medicin as he has in this criticism, I would be the last man to swallow his pills uuless I was in a great hurry to "kick the bucket." I hav noticed for several years past that some who call themselvs Liberals hav manifested the same blind, bigoted prejudice against Christ that the clergy do against Paine, thereby exposing their own ignorance and disgracing the cause they pretend to advocate in the minds of all who hav learned to think enough to understand what they read. And I hav long desired to correct the error, and will commence now if you will kindly allow me the space. I hav seen Christ accused in the Liberal papers of coming to bring war, of stealing corn, of stealing an ass, and of doing some other wrong things, every one of which I can prove to be false and founded on the ignorance and thoughtlessness of the writers. And it is only two or three weeks, I think, since one of your correspondents tried to poke fun at Christ by saying he rode into Jerusalem on two asses—another blunder caused by the thoughtless ignorance of the writer. I hav for seventy years considered the clergy the blindest blunderers over the scriptures of any class that read them, because they form creeds and then twist the scriptures to support them; but in this criticism the doctor has proved himself as blind as the blindest of them, not a "little" but very much "muddled."

I hav no positiv proof that such a man as Christ ever lived; if he ever did, he had a natural father and mother like the rest of us, and was a very great improvement on the wholesale murderer, Moses, and a great and good reformer for the dark age in which he lived; but if he never lived and all that was said about him was but myth, there are many good things from which I am willing to receive instruction; and I am decidedly opposed to having even a myth disgraced by its name being given to an organization so corrupt as our modern churches. The doctor in his "muddle" accuses Christ of commanding his enemies to be brought and slain before him, when there is not the shadow of a reason in the Bible for such an accusation. Christ had no money to let, and if he had, he would not hav permitted his servants to take ten pounds of it for the use of one, which would hav been ten hundred per cent. In the very chapter the doctor refers to Christ said, "I come to seek and to save the lost." Would any sane man after saying that command even his enemies to be slain? How then does the doctor's "muddle" come in? Why, Christ told a story of a certain nobleman that commanded his enemies to be slain, and the doctor, who appears never to hav learned to think enough to understand what he reads, turns the command of the nobleman over to Christ and makes him the murderer. How thoughtless, careless, or stupid! According to the doctor's logic, if I hear of a murder and tell of it, I become the murderer! "Whew! whew! whew! What shallow thinkers we hav!" as Father Richard used to say to the Methodist circuit preachers when I was a boy. Amen! Selah!

OLIVE BRANCH, MISS., Oct. 19, E.M. 290.

MR. EDITOR: I beg leave to again tax your columns with a chat to my new-made friends. In response to my recent appeal published in the September 27th number there has come quite a number of kind letters, and I cannot master sufficient language to express my appreciation of the kind words and good cheer they brought with them, and at a time, too, when it seemed that I was hated by nearly all my former friends. They came like perfumed zephyrs, and like balm to a wounded spirit. Indeed, I feel that if for truth's sake I must lose the friendship of any, I can well afford the loss of a Christian, for a good stanch Liberal. But little has been sent me in the way of books, but the ones which did come were such as I can truly appreciate. One of the first to respond was Dr. Brown, of Rockford, Ill. He sent his "Researches in Oriental History," and since having read it I must say that it is the most valuable book of its kind that I hav ever seen. In my preparation for the lecture field it will be to me an invaluable auxiliary. I mean to use it as a text-book, and by studying it carefully I can become master of what otherwise would hav cost me a life of labor, and access to more historical works than any man of moderate means could afford. It contains unimpeachable facts, and reduces the Bible to Jewish mythology. I hav received also a copy of "The Science of the Bible," by the late Dr. Woolley, and would be glad to learn who the kind donor is, as no word of reference has come to me by which I could tell who sent the book. Then, after that came "Antichrist," and a number of lectures and pamphlets, for which I hav already written in acknowledgment to the kind friends who sent them. But I will use this opportunity to thank each of you again. Many who wrote to me seemed to think that it was my aim to begin lecturing at once. To all such I would reply that you were mistaken. A man could easily succeed as a preacher with the knowledge which I hav at hand, but not as a lecturer. Remember, friends, that it has not been long that my mind has been emancipated from Christian darkness and slavery, and I should hav had to learn at a rapid rate to be fit to lecture thus soon. I hav a good common school education, and added to that a tolerable knowledge of both Latin and Greek; know mathematics to trigonometry, and know a great deal of church history and the Bible. But to succeed as a Liberal lecturer there is yet much hard study before me, and I am bound to succeed. If I should fail once, or even a score of times, I would study again and try it over, but I do not mean to fail at all, and to avoid failure I must be ready to fight when I enter the battle. I think that by close application I can lecture some in the winter of 1891.

Acting upon the advice of my friends I shall drop the latter portion of my former nom de guerre and henceforth sign myself "Gray," instead of "Gray Atheist." I hope my friends will note the change. And now, in conclusion, may I not hope that some of the authors who read this will send me copies of their works and thus help me to fit myself for a cause that is dear to us all? And will not others who may see this do likewise? I shall not ask you again. Address as below, or address as below and my signature will be sent you at once. "GRAY," Olive Branch, Miss.

EAST RANDOLPH, N. Y., Oct. 31, 1890.

MR. EDITOR: The "Freethinker's Pictorial Text-Book" was received to-day. This is a noble book. Its contents are deeply appreciated. It reflects truths like stars—truths repugnant to superstition, to all Christian criminals, to religious fiends who deplore to hav their deviltry exposed and their true character brought to light. The clergy will bewail their fate at your hands; but oh, their oppressed victims, the church-members, standing betwixt gloom and light, will, or at least should, bless your untiring, unrequited labors in their behalf, to redeem them from bondage and the fear of endless misery in the imagined "hot hear-after." I hav had many Sunday-school scholars looking over the "inhumanity to man" so forcibly exhibited in this peerless book. To-day about fifty people hav seen this book, and despite the fact that they were mostly Christians and I am not, they admitted the history a correct one about their mistakes in the past. But, says Mr. N. G. Otis, a Catholic: "Rob, outside of our church none can be saved. Join our church, be a good Catholic, and you'll reach heaven and won't be a wandering outcast, a vagrant in the realm of thought. As it is now your mind is as unstable as the clouds. You mean all right, Rob, but you must be a Catholic in order to be saved." I replied: "Mr. Otis, 'You mean all right,' but like countless thousands of other good people, you are led. You willingly obey, and follow your superstitious masters—masters who are as ignorant about the future as the poor unlettered barbarian weeping above his dead. Don't you know that, no matter how intelligent the person is, he can't look beyond the hights? No, sir! Don't invest your hard-earned dollars in this celestial lottery business, for there is no knowing but yours will be a blank. No preacher, no D.D. or LL.D., can warrant you a harp or crown. They should be honest, and tell you they don't know. Who can reasonably tell what isn't known? I am inclined to believe at this writing that six feet of earth make all of one size." In reviewing the horrible deeds perpetrated in the name of religion, it seems the world at one period was insane, and I do not think it is wholly sane at present upon religion.

Patrick Henry, that great American orator, said: "Guard with jealous attention the public liberty. Suspect everyone who approaches that jewel." Are we doing it? If not, commence now, this very moment! For "where liberty reigns the tyrant seeks to slay her" (La Salle). Remember, "the price of liberty is eternal vigilance." There is $1,500,000,000 worth of untaxed church property in the United States, yet the sheriff sells a poor farmer's horse for taxes. The wife weeps, the children are starving, but they hav no redress. This is unspeakable cruelty.

Men, women, and children suffer and die from sheer neglect in this world. About seven hundred million people will die this generation, yet we say, "God is love," "He cares for his children." Oh, how many hearts there are in cold solitude to-night; how many eyes, tear-stained windows of the soul, of beautiful girls; how many women are lonely in garrets without fire or food this cold, cold night. Oh, cold, cruel, and miserable life! Oh, how long will women be compelled to make shirts for thirty-seven and one-half cents per dozen? How long will little children, tender blossoms of the soul, be obliged to shiver and freeze to death? How long will man be forced to submit to the injustice of the heartless? These questions are more easy to ask than answer. I am aware of that, but I think they will be answered—yes, answered by streams of blood! Justice must be done. A Thanksgiving proclamation from President Harrison will soon proclaim the progress and happiness of our American people, telling of the goodness of God during the year. But how little the president knows about the joys or sorrows of the outside world. "No work, no fuel, no food," is the bitter wail that will ascend from countless thousands of human hearts this cold winter. Who is responsible? In many cases, men of wealth, "Christians," whose hearts hav no sympathy for the poor—"Christians" who hav wealth but lack souls. Seventy-five per cent of America's population are poor people. See to it, by your votes, that you redeem your lost estate. See to it that robbers be dethroned from office. See to it that the men you vote for are honest men. Lastly, vote for men and principles that will better your condition in life, that will assist you to gain your rights in your heroic struggle from slavery unto liberty.

Brothers and sisters, I appeal to you all to-night to never falter, never giv up by the wayside. Be brave! At last we will win the crown—not the crown of heaven, but the crown that illuminates the soul here on earth, the consciousness of having done our duty. R. R. JONES.

SOLDIERS' AND SAILORS' HOME, QUINOY, ILL., Oct. 1, 290.

MR. EDITOR: As I hav just returned from furlough with my head full of thoughts I hope to giv your readers something of interest and profit. The last TRUTH SEEKER I read contained an article from the secretary of the Secular Union, Miss Craddock, urging for money. I wrote to her over a year ago requesting her to remit me a lot of missionary works that I might distribute. What a pity that the Secular Union can not furnish such literature. Freethought has lost one of the most propitious opportunities, as I hav not only been on boat and car, discussing with preachers, gathering crowds, but I was also at large political gatherings where from three to four thousand people were assembled. What a grand opportunity had I only been furnished with the proper kind of literature. On my return home I found a book entitled, "The Candle from under the Bushel," by Mr. Hart, for which I feel very grateful, although I hav had the pleasure of reading it before. I know of no more scathing impeachment of the truth of the Bible.

I called upon many while on furlough who hav become much more Liberal within a few years, but was badly mistreated by one of my old acquaintances, who although not a member of any church and not holding to the Bible being inspired yet opposes Liberalism, skepticism, and Freeth ought in others. He reminds me of the dog in the manger. I do hope, should I liv until the next presidential election, to repeat my visit full-handed, when I hope to be able to distribute liberally, aided by the Secular Union.

I am anxious to know if the $1,000 Manual of Morals is ready, and if so, what is the number and size of pages and what is its price.

I hav many experiences in argument, etc., on the streets, in Sabbath-schools, etc., which, should I itemize them, might prove disgusting even to many who read THE TRUTH SEEKER, as I was last Sabbath odious to the owner and supervisor of a Spiritual hall. After she had read Victor Hugo's eulogy on Voltaire and spoken in high sentiments of encomium of Paine and other Infidels, I took the floor and addressed the audience thus: "Ladies and Gentlemen: I admire the Spiritualists, because they are free and honest. They invite discussion, which none of the orthodox will, and these orthodox will never occupy an honest attitude until they do this." I then remarked that I had drawn up a list of what Christ had done and said, which I then read: "Title: Mistakes, Follies, and Crimes of Jesus. 1. Treating his parents with disrespect when they returned from Jerusalem. 2. Fasting forty days. 3. Turning water into wine. 4. Keeping company with the devil. 5. Teaching that the Jews were better than other folks. 6. Teaching that it was right to imprison a man for debt. 7. Encouraging a bad custom of a man who was plowing in the field, to wait on the table. 8. Not correcting Peter when Peter said, "Thou art Christ the son of the living God." 9. Saying, "Blessed are the poor in spirit." 10. Requiring us to cut off an offending hand and pluck out an offending eye. 11. Teaching to take no thought for to-morrow. 12. Commanding to let the dead bury the dead. So on until I swelled the list to twenty-five charges, and wound up by saying: "Christ is said to be our savior, God, father; now, if I was the father of a large family, I should not manufacture a lot of riddles and then save those who happened to guess right and damn those who guessed wrong, and I hav no use for any such a savior, any such salvation, or any such a God." Of course, this filled some with consternation, and even Mrs. Merick, the owner of the hall, after calling upon us to cheer Victor Hugo's eulogy of Voltaire, seemed indignant. An old gentleman who is in the habit of speaking every Sabbath arose and showed great agitation, saying he would not exchange his hopes in the Nazarene for ten thousand worlds like this. This demonstrates the truth of what our immortal darling Bob says, i.e., even in the minds of the most liberal Christians there is a vague fear of what the Gods might do, and the safe side is considered the best side.

So, my friends, you can see that I am not idle, if I am in the Soldiers' Home. Wherever I can get the ears of anyone who is intelligent enough to listen to reason and honest enough to follow convictions, I am sure to do good. And how trying it is to find so many who are perfectly oblivious to science and truth and are ready to heap all sorts of epithets and obloquy upon any sincere investigator. And yet is not every man a cringing coward who keeps his lips closed? Think of the sacrifice of Bruno, of Voltaire, of Paine. Think of the immortal leader we hav to champion our cause. Then what cowards we are contrasted with the Infidels of a century ago.

Now unto all who love liberty and truth, science and truth, reason and truth, I send greeting.

Yours for humanity, EX-REV. JOSEPH N. MAXEY.

LOS ANGELES, CAL., Oct. 30, 1890.

MR. EDITOR: Will you kindly grant me space in your esteemed paper to answer two communications which appeared in your columns a short while ago? One was from Mr. Will S. Andres, and one from Mr. C. B. Reynolds, regarding the Assembly of Progress. First. Mr. Andres draws the conclusion that the Assembly of Progress is in opposition to the national Secular Union. This is a wrong conclusion. The Assembly of Progress has no war upon the national Secular Union or any other Freethought organization, but upon the contrary is in harmony with every proper movement that will advance the cause of Liberals, and will lend its influence to assist in building up the great cause of freedom sought to be obtained by the Liberals, and is entirely free from jealousies of other societies and willing to stand upon its own merits, undisturbed by the suspicions of any other society, Liberal or Christian. Aside from this, the insurance feature is the only objection made to the Assembly of Progress which I deem it necessary to consider in this letter, and in answer to this objection I will say that the insurance feature is at the pleasure of its members. No member is compelled to take the relief degree (the insurance). See constitution, page 16, sec. 2, and page 37, sec. 9. And since no member is obliged to carry the insurance or bear any of the expenses of those who do, certainly no one should object to those taking the relief degree who desire to do so. But Mr. Reynolds seems to be of the opinion that the mortality assessments are too high, and bases his opinion upon the statements of actuaries. With this opinion I differ, and base my judgment upon the actual practical experience of such societies as the Royal Arcanum, A. O. U. W., and I. O. F., which hav stood the test of years and hav proved by actual experience that Mr. Reynolds's estimate is below the real cost of insurance with risks selected with ordinary care, and as I am quite familiar with the above orders and particularly with the R. A. and I. O. F. and hav found them a success and gaining in numbers and their members well satisfied, we hav made our mortality assessment substantially the same, and believe it to be as low as it can be made consistent with a substantial organization. But as the insurance department is strictly mutual and the constitution subject to amendment, should the table of assessment prove too high or too low it could readily be adjusted by the intelligence and experience of its members, and while there is no obligation upon the members to take the relief degree, yet I find that almost all the members desire the relief degree. And I am also in receipt of many letters from different parts of the country heartily indorsing the Assembly of Progress in the most complimentary terms. Among the many indorsements, I quote a few suggestions made in numerous letters as follows:

"The Assembly of Progress has long been needed. How can I join it?" "The best move yet." "It is the best method yet suggested to organize the Liberals." "I am astonished that any Liberal should oppose the move." "I am just in receipt of constitution. Please send me a few more constitutions." "All the Liberals who hav seen the constitution are well pleased with it."

I could giv a large list of letters from Liberals indorsing the system of organization of the Assembly of Progress, but consider it would be asking too much space in the already well-filled columns of your paper, therefore I content myself with the few brief quotations above made to show the encouragement we are meeting with.

I believe Mr. Andres has raised some objections to the word "white" in the constitution, and seems to think that the word "white" should be stricken out. With this view I differ. I am fully in favor of granting to the colored people all their legal rights equal to the whites, but the social privileges are entirely different, and I am of the opinion that the intermingling of the races in society is a doubtful and dangerous proceeding, tending to engender race prejudices and productiv of no beneficial results.

The Assembly of Progress is continuing to grow and increase in membership, and will continue to gain and grow, and when its objects and great advantages for the advancement of Freethought and the total separation of church and state are generally known, it is my opinion it will contain the largest number of noble men and women of any other benevolent society in existence.

The Liberals need a benevolent organization as a bond of cohesion to unite them in one solid, compact body in order that their noble thoughts of freedom and their numbers may hav their proper influence upon society for the advancement of science and a higher standard of civilization. This opportunity is presented by the Assembly of Progress. The foundation having been laid, whatever imperfections there are in the constitution can soon be remedied.

I do not claim perfection for the constitution, and the Assembly of Progress is only too glad to hav intelligent suggestion for its improvement; but I do claim that it is the true and proper system of organization. J. M. VOSS.

Children's Corner.

Edited by Miss Susan H. Wixon, Fall River, Mass., to whom all Communications for this Corner should be sent.

"Between the dark and the daylight.
When the night is beginning to lower,
Comes a pause in the day's occupations
That is known as the Children's Hour."

[FOR RECITATION.]

Speak Thy Thought.

Shame upon thee, craven spirit!
Is it manly, just, or brave,
If a truth hav shone within thee,
To conceal the light it gave?
Captiv of the world's opinion—
Free to speak, but yet a slave?

All conviction should be valiant.
Tell thy truth, if truth it be;
Never seek to stem its current—
Thoughts, like rivers, find the sea:
It will fit the widening circle
Of eternal verity.

Speak thy thought, if thou believ'st it,
Let it jostle whom it may,
E'en although the foolish scorn it,
Or the obstinate gainsay—
Every seed that grows to-morrow
Lies beneath the clod to-day.

If our sires, the noble-hearted
Pioneers of things to come,
Had, like thee, been weak and timid,
Traitors to themselvs, and dumb,
Where would be our present knowledge?
Where the hoped millennium?

Where would be triumphant science,
Searching with far-reaching eyes,
Through the infinit creation
For the soul that underlies—
Soul of beauty, soul of goodness,
Wisdom of the earth and skies?

Where would be all great inventions,
Each from bygone fancies born,
Issued first in doubt and darkness,
Launched 'mid apathy and scorn?
How should noontide ever light us
But for dawnings of the morn?

Where would be our free opinion,
Where the right to speak at all,
If our sires, like thee, mistrustful,
Had been deaf to duty's call,
And concealed the thoughts within them,
Lying down for fear to fall?

Though an honest thought outspoken
Lead thee into chains or death;
What is life compared to virtue?
Shalt thou not survive thy breath?
Hark! The future age invites thee!
Listen, trembler, what it saith!

It demands thy thought in justice,
Debt, not tribute of the free;
Hav not ages long departed
Groaned and toiled and bled for thee?
If the past hav lent thee wisdom,
Pay it to futurity. —Commonwealth.

The Owl and the Pussy Cat.

The owl and the pussy cat went to sea,
In a beautiful pea-green boat;
They took some honey and plenty of money
Wrapped in a five pound note.

The owl looked up to the stars above
And sang to a small guitar:
"O lovely pussy, O pussy, my love,
What a beautiful pussy you are."

Pussy said to the owl: "You elegant fowl,
How charmingly sweet you sing!
Oh! let us be married, too long we hav tarried;
But what shall we do for a ring?"

They sailed away for a year and a day,
To the land where the bong tree grows;
And there in a wood a piggy-wig stood,
With a ring at the end of his nose.

"Pig, are you willing to sell for a shilling
Your ring?" Said the pig, "I will."
So they took it away, and were married next day
By the turkey that livs on the hill.

They dined on mince and slices of quince,
Which they ate with a runcible spoon;
And hand in hand, on the edge of the sand,
They danced by the light of the moon.

Coal Mining.

Dear Children of The Truth Seeker: I hope you are all seeking after truth and knowledge for the good it may do you and others in time to come.

There is an old adage which says, "Knowledge is power." We all know by experience that that is true to a certain extent. The most useful knowledge that the human family has obtained, is that which they hav got through experience. And it consists in a knowledge of how to do things—to utilize the material given them by nature and bring forth the things necessary for the sustenance, comfort, and pleasure of life.

There are very few young people who hav been raised in luxury and ease that ever think, even once, of how the good things of life are produced. True, they know their parents obtain the money that buys them. But where and how did the first party produce the goods? Did they not come from the hand of the laborer?

Did you, children, who never saw the inside of a coal-mine, ever think while you were sitting by your comfortable firesides in your cosy homes enjoying life, how much it cost the poor miner to obtain the coal that warms your room? Did you think of the hard labor performed, of the privations undergone, by that class of men who toil in the depth of the earth in darkness and dust?

Does society owe them anything—even respect? In fact, is it honorable to labor?

Let me tell you who never saw a coal-mine how it is done. First there is an entrance made in the hill about eight or nine feet wide. Then rooms are turned off that entrance and often they are driven about eighteen feet; they are widened out to about twenty-one feet; posts are cut to suit the hight of the vein of coal, and small thin caps are made to drive over the top of posts to keep the slate from falling in on the miner. And notwithstanding all caution they can use, every now and then some of them get killed or crippled by falling slate.

The miner has a cap made to fit his head very tight. It has no rim, and on the front part of it is a small piece of leather on which he hangs his lamp—a lamp that will hold about one-fourth of a gill of oil. The light that this little lamp givs is all he can get. He uses a pick shaped similarly to that of a stone mason, only not near so big. When the blacksmith sharpens it he brings it to a keen four-square point, and the last lick he givs it is one on the end, without which it would be of no use to the miner. The miner generally sits down till he has mined under the face of the coal about two feet; then he is compelled to lie down flat on one side till he cuts under the face or front of coal about two more feet, which makes four feet. Then he has to drill two holes with an auger, each to the depth of nearly four feet, over the coal which he has undermined. Next he takes some paper which he wraps around a rounded stick and makes a hollow cartridge, into which he pours as much powder as he thinks is necessary to blow down the coal. He then sticks a sharp iron needle, which is generally about six feet long and made tapering, into the cartridge, and pushes the powder, needle, and all into the hole. The needle is kept in this position until dirt is pounded very tightly around it—until the hole is entirely filled. Then the needle is withdrawn, which leaves a very small hole. Then a little round squib about four inches long and the size of a wheat straw, filled with powder, is put in the mouth of the hole. Then the miner touches his lamp to it and runs away. When the paper burns up to the powder in the squib then it shoots back in the little hole left by the needle to the large cartridge, and the powder explodes, blowing the coal down in a pile.

The old adage, "One-half of the world does not know how the other half livs," is true. However, I hope that the world will some day learn that true education consists in the knowledge of knowing how to do something useful.

Yours for Universal Mental Liberty,
S. P. Herron.

[Thanks for the above interesting article, and we would be pleased to hear from our friend again.—Ed. C. C.]

Cardinal Gibbons's God.

Dear Young Friends: Cardinal Gibbons, who is said to wield an angelic pen, shows us how even an angel can wander from true logic and common sense. He undertakes to prove the being of a God by mere assertions which hav not the merit of novelty or originality. The cardinal supposes that the works of nature bear the most grand and unmistakable imprint of the hand of the creator, the conscience being a natural monitor, designed to make plain to us the difference between right and wrong. On the contrary, I should suppose that impressions and powers belonging to the mind could only be the fruit of heredity or the effect of surroundings, existing thus and admitted into the constitution by virtue of the strong capacities and powers of our peculiar organism. These powers are perfected by experience and prompted further by the healthful and delightful exercise of the nativ growing and increasing energies of the human soul. Jewish writers of the present day, whose flowing style and ease of composition know no superiors, consider every house of worship as a "demonstration of man's ideality." But this ideal of perfection has assailable points, and is less likely to be faultless than pure nature, which is a stupendous monument of the relation existing between cause and effect. For fancy must be properly pruned and corrected, its strength kept up, to produce the finest fruits.

If the weakness of faith sets in, instead of reason microbes of disease will soon infest all that is precious and valuable which belongs to our mentality. We hear that Christ is the modern God, though there are learned persons who doubt that he ever existed. It seems, then, that the God idea is not firmly seated in the human mind. The first and greatest exploit of the Holy Ghost was, I think, discreditable in the extreme. Was it right to enter the family of poor Joseph to alienate the affections of Mary and destroy the peace and sacredness of home? The struggles of her mind, it is supposed, were quieted by divine power. Priestesses and prophets were drugged in those days, but strong persuasions or narcotics are never used by honorable persons to subdue the freedom of a mind and will which happens to be in our power. Alhaza.

The Stars and Stripes.

It is related that the flag which was raised at Cambridge Jan. 2, 1876, by Washington, was composed of thirteen red and white stripes, with the crosses of St. George and St. Andrew emblazoned on the blue canton in place of the stars. This flag was also carried by the fleet under command of Commander Esek Hopkins when it sailed from the Delaware capes, Feb. 17, 1776. In the following year, June 14, 1777, the Continental Congress passed a resolution "That the flag of the United States be thirteen stripes, alternate red and white; that the Union be thirteen stars, white on a blue field, representing a new constellation." How or by whom the idea of the star was first suggested is uncertain, although there are some who ascribe it to John Adams, while others claim the entire flag was borrowed from the coat of arms of the Washington family.

In this flag the stars were arranged in a circle, although no form was officially prescribed. It is supposed that the first display of the national flag at a military post was at Fort Schuyler, on the site of the village of Rome, Oneida county, N. Y. The fort was besieged early in the month of August, 1777, and the garrison were without a flag. So they made one according to the prescription of Congress by cutting up sheets to form the white stripes, bits of scarlet cloth for the red stripes, and the blue ground of the stars was composed of portions of a cloth cloak belonging to Capt. Abraham Swarthout, of Duchess county, N. Y., and the flag was unfurled Aug. 3, 1777.

Artificial Ivory.

As manufacturers abroad claim that the supply of ivory is too small to meet the demands of industry and art, an extensiv industry has arisen in France to supply an artificial substitute for natural ivory. Until recently the substitute used has been obtained by injecting white wood with chloride of lime under strong pressure. Within a short time, however, it has been established that a substitute may be prepared with the bones of sheep and waste pieces of deer and kid skins. The bones are for this purpose macerated and bleached for two weeks in chloride of lime, then heated by steam along with the skin, so as to form a fluid mass, to which are added a few hundreds of alum. The mass is then filtered, dried in the air, and caused to harden in a bath of alum, the result being white tough plates, which are more easily worked than natural ivory.

Jewelry in Ancient Times.

It is somewhat curious to find, says the Horological Review, that about 800 B.C. false or cheap jewelry was worn at Cyprus as commonly as it is in the present day by a certain class of people. Several examples of bracelets, earrings, and rings were found while excavating on that island which are of bronze or copper, covered with a thin leaf of gold. With the passion possessed by these people to symbolize everything, all personal ornaments signified more than their outward appearance suggested. Finger rings indicated power, because they were usually signets; the earrings meant servitude, bracelets recalled bondage, while the necklace, reminding one of a wreath of flowers thrown about the neck, tended rather toward an honorable distinction. Among the necklaces discovered in the treasure chamber at Cierium, on the island of Cyprus, is one which represents lotus flowers.

FOR HER DAILY BREAD.

A NINETEENTH CENTURY NOVEL.

Preface by R. G. INGERSOLL.

For Her Daily Bread is the story of two young girls and a younger brother who were left parentless, with little money, fair education, and much courage, to make their way through the world by going to Chicago. The author is also the heroin. The narrativ is, in the main, a history of a working girl's life and experience in the city of Chicago among bluff business men, kind-hearted folks, and disreputable hypocrits. It is just such a story of human life as we should expect Colonel Ingersoll to be interested in; and whatever he admires and appreciates is sure to be worth the attention of the rest of the world. Price 25 cents.

Send 10 cents to Dr. R. P. Fellows, the noted specialist, for his "Private Counselor"—a valuable book for young and middle-aged men, suffering from a Life-wasting Disease, as the result of youthful follies, indiscretion, and excesses in maturer years. TRY-SQUARE:

OR,

The Church of Practical Religion.

BY REPORTER.

This is the history of an attempt to found church without superstition, and its success. Uncle Job Sawyer, the pastor, having established his pulpit, uses it to discuss all the vital questions of human concern, religious, political, and otherwise. The book is written in well-chosen language, and easily understood. There is just sufficient narrativ about it to interest the reader and hold his attention while the truth is being brought to his mind.

News of the Week.

THE Christian spirit of the Kenwood Methodist church, Chicago, has proved unable to allay the members' quarrels and avert the use of force. On a late Sunday the church was fastened tight and one faction worshiped in a storeroom while another held no service at all.

"A FEDERATION of all the English-speaking peoples of the world" is among the projects of the times in Great Britain.

THIRTY-TWO bishops hav sent a petition to the queen of Spain asking her to interfere in the matter of the unjust treatment of the pope.

PROFESSOR KOCH, of Berlin, claims to hav discovered a cure for consumption, in the shape of a lymph that kills the bacillus which produces the disease.

LIBERALS in the canton of Ticino, Switzerland, hav broken out again against Conservativ rule. The Radicals are armed, and hav had conflicts with the military.

THE population of the United States is published by Census Superintendent Porter as 62,480,540, these figures being subject to slight change on further revisal.

THE Spanish passenger steamship Vizcaya, bound from New York to Cuba, was sunk on the 30th ult. off Barnegat, N. J., by collision with an American coal schooner. Her sixteen passengers and fifty-two of her crew of sixty-nine were lost.

FREDERICK STAATEN, who attended church at New York city the other Sunday without shoes, and smoking a cigar, has been adjudged insane.

THREE hundred Poles, resolving to leave Russia and emigrate to Brazil, came to the boundary line, where they were ordered to return. They refused, and the guard fired, killing six men, two women, and one child.

ON the festival at Rome recently a band of students saluted every priest they met with the shout, "Viva Giordano Bruno!" Catholics decry this proceeding, but hav no blame for their own Propaganda students who replied with "Hurra for the pope!"

DEMOCRATS of extreme sentiments say they hav discovered, and will soon prove, an extended conspiracy by which the national census was so falsified as to make it difficult for their party to elect a president. Moderate Democrats doubt the story, and say there was but little perversion.

THE mayor of New York city and governor of the state are pressing the national census superintendent to accept the count made by the city police, or order a recount. Republicans think the previous count correct, and attribute the surplus of the police enumeration to return of summer excursionists, and perhaps to deliberate "padding" by Democrats to obtain an extra Congressman.

A NEW YORK man named Orr, who has always been a faithful church attendant and activ Y. M. C. A. worker, tried for a long time to get his sane aunt put in an insane asylum. Once securing her commitment for examination, during the three days that elapsed before she was examined and found sane he sold her furniture and took possession of her property. Now he is in jail himself.

THE election resulted in gains for Democrats in several states, sufficient to giv them a majority of about forty in the next House. Among the states that went Democratic were Minnesota, New Hampshire, and Pennsylvania—the gaining of the latter, previously Republican, being thought a great triumph by Democrats. Kansas was carried by the Farmers' Alliance and Democrats. Wisconsin elected the Democratic candidates of the Catholics and Lutherans, and they will probably repeal the Bennett law which attempts to keep the schools English and out of priestly hands. The Farmers' Alliance will hav fifteen or twenty men in Congress. Lodge, the introducer of the "Force bill," was reëlected in Massachusetts. McKinley, of Ohio, was defeated. New York city gave Grant, Tammany, about 114,233; Scott, People's Municipal League of Republicans and non-Tammany Democrats, headed by Protestant preachers, about 90 898; Delabar, Socialist, about 3.830; Demorest, Prohibition, and Redpath, Commonwealth labor, about one thousand each.

DAVID SENDETH FOR URIAH.

Gems of Thought.

THE invention of printing was a severe blow to Catholicism, which had, previously, enjoyed the inappreciable advantage of a monopoly of intercommunication. From its central seat, orders could be disseminated through all the ecclesiastical ranks, and fulminated through the pulpits. This monopoly and the amazing power it conferred were destroyed by the press. In modern times, the influence of the pulpit has become insignificant. The pulpit has been thoroughly supplanted by the newspaper. Yet, Catholicism did not yield its ancient advantage without a struggle. As soon as the inevitable tendency of the new art was detected, a restraint upon it, under the form of a censorship, was attempted. It was made necessary to hav a permit, in order to print a book. For this, it was needful that the work should hav been read, examined, and approved by the clergy. There must be a certificate that it was a godly and orthodox book. A bull of excommunication was issued in 1501, by Alexander VI., against printers who should publish pernicious doctrins. In 1515 the Lateran council ordered that no books should be printed but such as had been inspected by the ecclesiastical censors, under pain of excommunication and fine; the censors being directed "to take the utmost care that nothing should be printed contrary to the orthodox faith." There was thus a dread of religious discussion; a terror lest truth should emerge.—Draper.

THE clergy were no longer the sole or the chief depositories of knowledge. The invention of printing had furnished the assailants of the church with a mighty weapon which had been wanting to their predecessors.—Macaulay.

DECAPITATED saints were believed to hav emerged from their tombs and paid their respects to a newly appointed bishop; flying dragons descended through the air to snatch the bodies of unbelievers and disappeared with screams that frightened orthodox neighbors to take refuge in their cellar-holes; swarms of angels carried bones, crosses, and whole buildings from Bethlehem to Loretto; King Philip the Second paid a thousand doubloons for a skeleton of St. Laurentius, and having been informed that a complete skeleton of the same saint was for sale in the south of Italy, he at once ratified the bargain and blessed heaven for having favored him with a duplicate of the precious relic. Thousands of unfortunates were tried and executed on a charge of having taken an ærial excursion on a broomstick or a black he-goat; of having caused a gale by churning a potful of froth and water; of having turned themselvs into foxes, wolves, and tomcats. The instinct of recognizing the absurdity of even the most glaring superstitions seems to hav become wholly extinct.—Oswald.

To the World's Columbian Exposition Commission:

Learning that there is an organized movement among the more conservative church people—manipulated by a "Sabbath" organization—to induce your honorable body to close on Sundays the World's Fair, to be held in 1893 in Chicago, the undersigned respectfully put in this counter petition, and ask that the Fair may be open to the public on each Sunday of its continuance. We ask this for the following reasons:

1. That the American principle of separation of church and state may be maintained.

2. That public morality may be subserved by providing a substitute for the immoral places to which men may resort when no moral amusements are available.

3. As a matter of justice also to the people of Chicago who have given of their means to make the Fair possible, tens of thousands of whom can visit the Fair only on a general holiday; and as a matter of justice also to the visitors to the Fair, whose time or means may be limited, and who certainly are entitled to great consideration at your hands.

4. For the public good. The opening of the Fair on Sunday will be for the benefit not only of Chicago, but of the whole country. The rights of no one are infringed, the happiness of no one disturbed. Those who wish to attend can do so; those who do not can otherwise spend the day. This is a solely humanitarian question, a question of human relations and human welfare, and, therefore, the only standard by which you can decide is that of the public welfare.

5. It will benefit the Fair, attracting a much larger attendance, interesting more people in it, and increasing its receipts.

6. To the objection that Sunday opening of the Fair will destroy the day as a rest-day, we affirm that the tendency would be exactly the opposite. The more beautiful you make Sunday, the more attractive, the more noble and varied in its pleasures and instructions, the more difficult it will be to change its character, the less danger there is that employers will ever have the power to transfer it from its present position to the days of toil. With choice of Sunday occupation restricted to attending church or visiting a saloon, the average workingman would choose to keep on laboring.

7. Finally: Opening the World's Fair on Sunday will harm no one but the keepers of immoral places, while it will benefit the Fair itself, the people of Chicago, and the visitors to the Fair, thereby conducing to municipal prosperity, individual education, public morality, and the development and good of the whole country.

SUPERSTITION MOURNING OVER THE DESTRUCTION OF HER IDOLS.

Notes and Clippings.

ONE curious product of the new relations between the church and science is the lecturing charlatan who knows little theology and less science, but goes about pretending to harmonize the two in great swelling words of vanity. This type reached its consummate flower about ten years ago in the person of Joseph Cook, who has since been steadily sinking into the depths to join his own "Bathybius," much to the relief of all who love quiet.—Evening Post.

THE holy synod has adopted a resolution to enact stringent measures against the spread of the Baptist in southern Russia. The Baptist confession was introduced during the reign of Alexander II. A certain Pashkoff and Baron Corfa were among the earliest Baptist missionaries. They were banished from Russia, and since that time their fellow-believers hav withdrawn to the districts on the Donau and the Caucasus. Of late, however, their propaganda has been revived, and the Orthodox (Greek Catholic) church finds it necessary to enforce the stringent measures which were devised on their first appearance in Russia.

A SIBERIAN exile, Constantine Ponottazenko by name, having a strong desire to see his wife and children in St. Petersburg, absented himself from his place of exile and made his way on foot from Tobolsk to the capital of the empire, a distance of more than two thousand miles. He found his family well, and lived with them a few weeks. His desire thus satisfied, he presented himself to the authorities of his own accord and confessed to be an exile from the district which the government had assigned for his dwelling. In view of the palliating circumstances, the judge reduced his punishment to only seven days' confinement in prison, after the expiration of which he will be delivered to the government authorities to be sent back to the place of his exile. "In this wise," says a St. Petersburg paper, exultingly, "mercy and justice meet in holy Russia!"

A WRITER in the New York Examiner enters a plea for greater discrimination in the conferring of such degrees as D.D., and enforces his argument with a horrible example. He says that he knows a clergyman who was lately honored with the degree by "one of our Baptist colleges." Of the fitness of the doctor of divinity for such a decoration the reader may judge from the following list of misspelled words which were found in a "brief communication" written by him and "presented as a public document," being "prepared, presumably, with special care:" "Menchin, persude, metheods (2), perminant, aranged, resorces, cas, acording, menchined, prepair, buisness (3), onely (3), increse, increas, begining, hardely, wer, strenth (2), indebtness, remaning, arrisen, easely, sufficent, vacent, possibilites, guarenty, safty, comunity, pararie, slue, kneed, disgussed, opinon, enterd, famiely, enroled, vigerous, planing, realy, convenshion, hed."

STANLEY told a friend the other day a story which illustrates the African's quickness of retort. "I was talking with one of the Ugangas," said Stanley, "while a monkey the nativ had tamed was jumping from limb to limb of a tree near by. In a spirit of fun I said, 'You are not so very much unlike monkeys. You Ugangas speak to each other after a fashion, and the monkeys make signs to each other. They understand each other, and that's all you can do when you talk. Neither you nor the monkeys know anything that is going on outside of these great forests.' The Uganga man thought for a moment, and then ran up to the monkey, that had perched on a low limb near us. Bending over the monkey, the man blew on the monkey's back, separating the fur as a furrier does in exhibiting a skin to a purchaser. Then he turned to me and pointed with a triumphant gesture to the monkey, saying, 'Monkey skin white. Uganga man's black.'"

COMMENTING upon the execution of a murderer in Canada last week the evening Sun has this to say: "Birchall was not deterred [by the fear of hanging] even though he was not moved by an overmastering impulse of passion. He killed his man for gain. Has society no means, then, of protecting its members against homicide? The death penalty, at least, has failed. Must society therefore sit down, resigning itself to the evil as to an affliction of God? That is the way it used to deal with the plague, and small-pox, and cholera, and rabies, yellow fever, and insanity. Society cures insanity now; it used to chain it and beat it till it died. Society has made all its advances by experiment. Italy, Switzerland (seventeen cantons), Holland, Saxony, Portugal, abolished the death penalty, but it has practically ceased in Belgium, Prussia, Bavaria, Denmark, and Sweden also. In all of those countries the abandonment of the penalty has been accompanied with a marked diminution of homicide. In no one of them would a proposal for its revival be entertained. In all of them a real numerical relation has been discovered between homicide and the abolition of the death penalty."

THE Greek church, in its warfare with the porte, has just borrowed from the West and put into pernicious activity, says the Evening Post, an ecclesiastical weapon which has been obsolete since medieval times. It has declared a general interdict upon the Ottoman empire. An interdict may be defined as a general ecclesiastical strike. While it lasts, the churches are shut, the altars stripped, the bells silent; no offices are said, no sacraments are celebrated save baptism, the dead are not buried, and the whole country (so far as it is sensitiv to ecclesiastical censures) is made to feel that it lies under the wrath of God. It was a terrible weapon in its day, as Robert found it to be in France and Stephen and John in England; and if Henry VIII. and Elizabeth found little terror in it, it was because its day was past even in their time. But, besides the grave fault of anachronism, the Holy Orthodox synod has, it would seem, fatally miscalculated its chances in another way. Turkey, from the religious point of view, resembles as little as possible the uniformly Catholic France of the Middle Age. The Giaours of the Ottoman empire constitute, all told, not more than a third of its population; and of this number only a third—that is, one-ninth of the whole population—are faithful orthodox. One can imagin how the caliph, the vicar of Mohammed, the commander of the True Believers, looks upon this Infidel minority, and with what consideration he is likely to treat it.

The Human Soul.

Most of the controversy, prejudice, and persecutions among religionists grows out of disagreements or misunderstanding upon the meaning of words.

In ancient times there was more indifference and unconcern, more disregard of accuracy and less interest to know the precise definition of words than now. Our religious literature written so long ago is very vague and uncertain in what it teaches, or in conveying to the mind of the reader any assurance of what the writer thought or wished to express. The same substantiv is used by the same writer in a variety of connections and to express diverse meanings, leaving the reader forever in doubt as to the real thought.

When this uncritical, reckless habit of writing and speaking is once established, it is copied and repeated till it becomes so popular and universal, that no one is expected to always understand an author.

It is all conjecture, supposition, and belief. And to raise a question or demand the origin and precise meaning of words, exposes one to the charge of skepticism. Take the word psyche, with which our Bible translators hav indulged in the unwarranted freedom of making several different English words from it, with distinct thoughts.

They use it indiscriminately for mind, life, soul, and spirit. They had inherited the vague pagan ideas, and they gave the various meanings to the original, to represent those superstitious conceptions.

They stood at the head of the church, and of literature, and had it all their own way. The people sought no redress, for they knew no better.

We hear everybody now talking flippantly about the mind, the soul, the life, and the spirit, as though they think they know what they are saying, or what they mean. Some will attempt to define precisely what each word means, a thing which the inventors themselvs never could agree upon, or were able to do.

These words, in reality, formerly only represented the different phases of the same and but one thing.

The soul simply means the life, and the mind is but the cultured development of that life; and the spirit means the earnestness and fervor of the life. Yet theologians will build up fanciful theories out of the different meanings they violently force into them, on which the superstructure of their religion is built.

And the people are required to say amen to them, unless they are willing to risk the loss of this soul or spirit.

Words as the vehicle of thought hav a vast and terrific influence for good or evil over human destiny.

Through them we express what we think, feel, and intend—our motivs, desires, designs, our hopes and wishes, not only in relation to ourselvs, but in regard to others. Whether truly or erroneously expressed, whether understood or otherwise, is of the most serious moment to us all.

Immeasurable evils hav grown out of our misunderstandings, our heedlessness or incapacity, when we speak, in not saying what we mean. Or, by this looseness in language, the uncritical and unsuspecting are by the villain or hypocrit purposely deceived, imposed upon, and outraged. In civil diplomacy this duplicity has led to frightful wars and upheavals in society.

In religion, it has invented the guillotin, the rack, and gibbet.

In social life it has given rise to vituperation, scandal, and gossip; in the family to domestic ills and miseries incalculable. With the very best understanding and use of words, false impressions and apprehensions are often impossible.

How important it is for those engaged in philological studies and work to be precise and definit in preparing and interpreting a language for a people!

Misuse, perversions, and corruptions will necessarily, unavoidably, and almost insensibly become fastened on to a language, and our interests should impel us to the utmost care to guard against them.

In tracing this word psyche or its synonyms back to the use made of it by the Greeks in connection with their mythology and to the use made of it by the Hellenic or Grecian Jews, we can get a better estimate of its objects then, and contrast them with its present multiform uses.

Our religious literature as found in the New Testament is mainly a compound of the Chaldean, Assyrian, Hebrew, and the Greek Christian faith. Modern scholars and students of religion admit this, but not a few of them seem blind or insensible to the vast control these ancient mythologies and theologies exercise over modern religious thought. How dependent our creeds and metaphysical speculations, all our ideas of religion, of God, of the soul, and future rewards and punishments, are on the crude vagaries and theologic speculations of these semi-barbaric, unscientific, romantic, and visionary ancients. Our mythologic, Roman, and semi-civilized ancestors of Europe accepted the literature and wisdom of the Greeks as the very highest authority for intelligence in the mysteries of divine truth. To them it was oracular, a sort of divine revelation, and they hav strenuously labored to impress on society and all posterity their own estimate of its sublime authenticity, and the unquestioning, unreasoning multitude, priests and people, hav meekly and credulously accepted it, and in their turn are doing what they can to transmit it to their successors.

Our religion, or theory of God, the soul and its salvation, is based on the ancient systems of astronomy and geography. They were the foundation of our religion; now that these systems are exploded and demolished, our religion is a superstructure without foundation. It had a kind of a literal or nominal basis once, but now that it is destroyed it remains a theory suspended in the air, with nothing to rest upon or to support it—as the visionary structure it is—but the imagination and the devotion men bestowed upon it when they thought it was a reality.

The Hebrews and Chaldeans had their starry heavens, the abode of their heavenly father; and their bottomless pit—their volcanic crater—as the abode of the enemy, or evil one, or devil.

The Greeks had their Olympus and their hades as the abode of their gods and demons, their Jupiter and Vulcan. Their songs of the amours and heroism of the demons of the departed, helped to make our theories of the soul and its salvation.

The phrase, "salvation of the soul," means what you please to make it, or it means nothing, just as you like it. So that it is without force, worth, or significance. The late revisers of the New Testament illustrate this in changing one verse, in order to make sense of what had been doubtful or without meaning—"For what is a man profited if he shall gain the whole world and lose his own life?"—not soul. This is a very appropriate question to ask the man who is killing himself to accumulate wealth, and dies with the exhaustion of amassing it, What profit does he gain? In the common version it reads, "and lose his own soul." If soul means something different from "life," then the text is quite obscure, or is without meaning—has no lesson in it, has no application, and is without value. If the translators designed, by using the word "soul," to frighten and restrain people who were trying to "gain the whole world," with the belief that when they should die the soul, or their other self, might be lost in endless perdition, then they used the word soul in a false or fraudulent sense, with the motiv and design of deceiving their readers. They put a new and fearful meaning of their own making to it, to accomplish their sinister purposes—to subject the people and get control over them through jugglery and dishonest means. As all these words, mind, soul, spirit, life, mean but the one and same thing, wherever the translators hav used the word soul to mean something different than simply the life, they hav either purposely, or ignorantly, misrepresented the facts and truth—hav misled and deceived the reader.

"The soul that sinneth it shall die" simply means, the man that liveth and commits the sin is the one who shall be punished, and if the law defines his sin as worthy of death, he must die, and not some one else die for him. The revisers in the New Version hav changed the word soul to life in other texts. In some passages, to please the bigoted reader, they leave it optional whether soul or life be used, by inserting in the margin, "Or life," for soul, in the text. In other places the construction of the sentence was such as not to admit the change of soul for life, and these they hav let alone rather than change the structure of the sentence and violate a promis they had made to alter the text as little as possible in revising it. The revisers evidently felt embarrassed between their obligations of fidelity to the sense and meaning of the originals and to their pledges to make as few changes as possible, and only when the sense demanded or required them. But the changes in the word soul were all in the direction of making it mean simply "life," and to read so in the text, showing that the more modern and popular definition of the clergy—that it is a part of the human being which will survive after death, and be subject to joy or misery—was not the teaching of the original scripture, and where the text seems to teach such a belief, it is the work of the copyist or translator; it is an interpolation or a false construction.

In connection with the priestly, pagan doctrin of the soul being an entity of eternal duration, much of the context of the New Testament had to be changed to correspond. The words "eternal," "everlasting," were introduced to express the terms of the new faith. Biblical scholars tell us they did not mean originally the sense we ascribe to them. They did not and should not now mean endless duration. They simply meant the full term or complete life of man; the whole, full, entire life, as long as ever it should last, means everlasting.

This theologic or church definition of the word soul, introduced and enforced by the semi-pagan clergy of the early Christian ages, was gradually assented to and adopted by religious teachers and writers till it finally received general approval, and became popular in religious literature.

During the Dark Ages, when intellectual culture was not simply neglected for the people, but was condemned and forbidden, and the clergy themselvs were so illiterate that many of them could neither read or write, the spirit of inquiry and criticism was almost extinct. The Roman church then dictated religion to nearly all Europe. Its edicts and decrees were easily enforced on the credulous, ignorant masses. Its definitions, doctrins, and dogmas were implicitly accepted as the unquestioned revelations of the divine will made to the church.

During these thousand years of mental darkness and unreasoning faith, the interpretations of the church were the only umpire and criterion of truth. How natural, easy, and irresistible it would be for any definition or meaning to become permanently fixed and to remain so to the general public in all subsequent ages. There would seem to be no alternativ. Science or philological criticism might detect and expose the imposition, but it would be to little purpose, for the multitude, long addicted to the error, with all their literature and traditions, their prejudices and religious feelings, in its favor, would much prefer to continue in it than to consent to hav it corrected.

If we could be induced to surrender the erroneous opinions thus fastened on us through the darkest period of the Roman church and return to the earlier meaning of the word soul, as the late revisers of the New Testament hav done, in thus substituting "life" for it wherever they could—that is, return to use it in its more original and primitiv true sense—what a burden of error and misery would be lifted from the religious world! What a load of expenditure, waste, and grief it has inflicted upon us! If what has been sacrificed and expended to save the souls of men had been wisely devoted to properly saving and cherishing their "life," their whole lives in the broadest, fullest sense, the world might be a paradise.

The salvation of the moral and spiritual lives of men in this world was the great concern, the work and mission, of Jesus. "For he shall save his people from their sins." Such was the conviction of the writers of the gospels that this was his mission, that they represent him as restoring people from all kinds of maladies and even raising the dead to life. All he meant by saving the soul, was confined to saving the people in its best sense in this life. The only way to do it is to enlighten them. It is from a want of this light that so many souls or lives are blighted, blasted, and lost now among us, in the same sense and in the same way they were lost then.

We are spending a vast amount of means to save our souls, in an orthodox sense, from a volcanic and for an Olympic abode. We hav left the religion of the ancient prophets and of Jesus, hav adopted the Babylonish astrology and the Greek mythology, because our earlier teachers of religion had inherited and believed them, taught them, and transmitted to us through their writings their blind, childish superstitions, their senseless theories, their vague and visionary speculations, that were prevalent and popular among the heathen and themselvs at that darker period of the world's history. These ancient views prevail throughout Christendom now, and they hav designedly been perpetuated by mistranslation and misapplication of the few words that it was necessary to change for that special purpose.

It is well known that all the barbarian provinces, kingdoms, and peoples composing the Roman empire had their separate gods or divinities, and they attributed the phenomena and unaccountable, frightful occurrences and mysteries that were transpiring to invisible agencies—the gnomes, lares, manes, and to their supernal or infernal deities, and their idol worship in connection with their faiths.

After the civil and ecclesiastical power became united under Constantine the Great, the fury and rage of the church was to flood the empire with missionaries, to proselyte these heathen. To make it a success the ghost or soul theory, then popular with these heathen, with their miracles and pagan mysteries, were adopted by the missionaries, so that it really required but little change for a heathen to become a Christian. In this way Christianity became paganized—a superstition.

There is nothing more clear in history, church and civil, than these unabated and enthusiastic efforts to convert the heathen, or rather, to enroll them in the church was the ambition and hope of the missionary. The Christian religion, then, to these saints was anything or nothing; its advocates and propagandists were gracious, pliant, and obliging—were literally "all things to all men," to gain some, and they hav given us a religion and Bible manufactured, manipulated, and constructed to entrap the barbarian Infidel from the heathen to the Christian idolatry. These relics of ancient barbarism hav come down to us to accept as representing a faith and a religion we must implicitly adopt, at the peril of the divine wrath and the salvation of our "souls."

I insist, on the authority of the late revisers of the

New Testament—who were evidently the most capable of all expounders and interpreters of the Greek text—that the earlier copies of the Greek scriptures were comparativly clear of the anomalies, absurdities, of our present English version. They tell us the miracles, or thaumaturgic acts, there recorded were not in one instance associated with the name of Joshua or Jesus in these early copies; that the words Lord and God should not hav been in the Bible; that the Lord should be teacher; God, Elohim; and the proper meaning of Satan was worthlessness, and not the prince of hell.

The word "damnation" in the Bible, they tell us, is a forgery. It should hav been "judgment." The word "Christ" should hav been "anointed." While fidelity required that many more important changes should be made, they were pledged by their "rules" not to make them.

If the devotion of the church to the authorized copy with all its errors and ambiguities and superstitions had not been forbidden, the revised edition would hav been in harmony with the early Greek manuscripts, more rational, consistent, and more in accord with science and advanced modern thought.

The revision was commenced with the view not of perfecting the text, but for weakening that implicit faith in its present perfection, and in its coming to us as the "word of God," that the way might be paved for an entire new translation, which Philip Schaff, D.D., chairman of the "American committee on revision," declared at a public meeting in the Cooper Institute, New York, the people would be prepared for before fifty years hence.

It is in the light of these revelations I maintain that these early teachers and writers were really wiser and better men than our version of the New Testament represents them in many of these corrupted paganized passages.

Atheists and Infidels are either dishonest or uninformed when they overlook the radical and ultra moral lessons and philosophic, ethical truths they taught, and see only the absurdities and errors that copyists hav forged, to quote, for the purpose of commenting on them to the disparagement both of the teachers and their lessons, to prejudice the ignorant masses and to embitter them against those who read and see many gems of thought in this ancient literature. T. E. LONGSHORE.

Philadelphia, Pa., Sept. 1, 1890.

The Maiden Smiled.

He certainly used most remarkable gestures, and used them with a freedom that very much surprised young Mr. Leonard, until that youth happened to haltingly think that a Chinaman was an oriental and that the orientals are born gesture-makers.

He was unusually tall for a Chinaman, and unusually gaunt, too, and as he threw up his long arms to emphasize some particular statement, the heavy jade bangles slipped down over his elbows; while, when he lowered his arms again, he had to spread out his fingers to keep the stone bracelets from falling to the floor. Now he would poise his left hand, palm up, in the air, and would dart his right hand in and out of this, the fingers all bunched to a point, as though it were some bird of prey swooping down on its quarry. At another time, he would drop both these nervous hands to the farthest limits of arm's-reach, scoop up an invisible something, and then, lifting this head-high, would scatter it to the four winds, with a tornado motion of body and limbs that was very effectiv.

The play of his facial features was quite as remarkable. Like so many of his countrymen, he was deeply pitted with small-pox, but, unlike most of his countrymen, his eyes were large, though obliquely set, and full of fire. His neck was long and pliant as a snake, and indeed, when he threw back his head, opened his mouth until the corners ran up to the cheek-bones, and shot out a flash of light from under his half-shut lids, there was something quite ophidian in his appearance.

That young Mr. Leonard in his little surreptitious ramble through Chinatown was at first attracted by the gestures and Boanergian voice of the Chinaman, there is no doubt, but after a few moments had passed, his attention was drawn to another of the group of which the orator was the center. There were six of them in this group, sprawled about the little gloomy store, in which nothing particular seemed to be sold. Five of them were men and the sixth was a woman, or girl, or child, young Mr. Leonard could not exactly say which. Anyway, whatever her age may hav been, she was as pretty as a peach—or rather as a nectarine, for, like that fruit, she was small and round and plump and juicy; like it, her skin was smooth and yellowish brown, with red splashes here and there; and she—still like the fruit—no doubt looked to be a good deal better than she really was. Her hair was starched out on each side of her head like a black butterfly's wings, and was twisted into a bar behind that looked like the handle of a black teapot. This general gloominess of head-gear was, however, relieved by sundry little paper chrysanthemums stuck here and there, while in the thickness of the tea-pot handle there were two gold skewers, set up like a St. Andrew's cross. Her hair was drawn back in front from a low but intelligent forehead, underneath which glittered a pair of mischievous eyes. The nose was a snub, the mouth was quite pretty and provoking, and chin and cheeks and neck were smooth and round. Down below her trousers—dark purple, like her blouse—showed two plump ankles covered with fine white socks; and beneath these were two tiny feet—naturally tiny—incased in shoes of light apple-green, with high, white soles running down to a point from toe and heel like the lines of a sampan.

The trick of finding out that a young man is looking at her is not confined to the Caucasian girl, and two minutes had not passed before little Quang Loo began to preen and perk.

She accepted a conical cigaret which one of the Chinamen offered her, throwing out a deprecatory glance at young Mr. Leonard as she did so, as though asking excuse for the mannish custom, and pulling back her loose sleeves—there seemed to be five or six of them—showed a dimpled arm that was altogether feminin. There followed coy looks in the shelter of a big red-silk handkerchief; roguish smiles half hidden by a veil of very queer-smelling tobacco-smoke, until, almost before he knew it, young Mr. Leonard was deep in the midst of a first-class flirtation with a third-class heathen.

The experience was one that made young Mr. Leonard tingle clear down to the tips of his brilliant yellow gloves and that made him flush so that his spectacles actually got dewy. It was the first time he had ever done such a thing, and he trembled with a delicious fever of joyful fright to think of what he would do if ever his mamma should find out what he was about.

He and his mamma were Boston people, quite rich and undoubtedly superior. She was a widow and this was her only son, her "mother's boy." He had been brought up like a pet lamb, and like that festiv young creature was very innocent and very weak—and he looked it. Though now nearly twenty, his mamma still called him Baby, and so did nearly everybody else for the matter of that. She would hav kept him in knickerbockers if she could possibly hav done so, but even young Mr. Leonard's mild spirit rebelled at this and he insisted on clothing his flaccid little self in the rig of the ultra-anglomaniacs. On those rare occasions on which mamma allowed him to stray from under her maternal eye, her parting injunction invariably was, "Now, Baby, be sure you don't get into mischief," and here he was getting into the very worst description of that article.

He had passed the handkerchief phase and had arrived at that desperate state where he was slyly feeling in his pocket for a visiting-card, when in one of the gestureful Chinaman's comprehensiv sweeps of arms and vision, the celestial saw what was going on. For a moment his hands hung suspended, then they dropped with a thwack on two bony knees, while he shot out a few gutturals to his companions. These looked quickly and sharply out of the little store-window and up and down the street, and then, at some more gutturals from the tall Chinaman, they slipped out and closed swiftly around the startled youth. Before he knew what had happened, young Mr. Leonard found himself inside the store, sitting down beside the little Chinese girl—much closer than he had ever dared to imagin, and the six Chinamen so thickly grouped about him that he was hidden behind them as by a wall—a little wall of China, in fact. With childlike confidence and affection the maiden put her right arm around his waist and kept it there with a vigor that was quite surprising, while she brought her left hand, holding the big red-silk handkerchief, so closely up to young Mr. Leonard's mouth that he could only talk in a sort of mumbled undertone. Immediately in front of him towered the tall Chinaman, and in the Chinaman's hand was a huge revolver.

"You wan' buy that lill gel?" inquired this monster, working the revolver around until its muzzle looked like a revolving disk in an experiment in hypnotism.

"Good gwacious, no!" young Mr. Leonard was understood to stammer.

"Wha' for then you tly mashee heh!"

"Good gwacious!" stammered the youth again, and there stuck, feeling very much as if he would like to cry.

"Lookee heah, you dam fellah," said the Chinaman, throwing open his mouth as though he was going to swallow his victim; "me, Quong Ah Wok, baddest highbindeh San Flancisco. Sixteen man-boy like you"—ticking them off on his fingers with the pistol-barrel—"I kill already this week. Now I kill you, too, 'less you buy this lill gel or giv me hund'ed dollah."

"I havn't got as much money with me," moaned young Mr. Leonard.

"How much you got?" persisted Ah Wok.

"Only about fifty-three dollars and some odd cents, don't-cher-know," chattered the victim behind the red-silk handkerchief.

"Lemme hav all you got—dam quick," said the terrible Ah Wok, playfully poking the revolver in his victim's vest-pocket.

Young Mr. Leonard lost no time in handing over his coin and bills, though the operation left his purse as limp as his legs.

"Now, then," said Ah Wok, with a combined movement of the head, body, and arms that made him look like a gigantic crane about to take flight—"now, then, young fellah, you skippee heap fi-fi; and, lookee heah, you no say no word anyone, or I come—we all come—kill you in your lill bed."

Young Mr. Leonard wanted no further permission, and the encircling arm of the maiden being released, he tottered out and did not stop tottering until he had reached the hotel. There he half frightened mamma to death by his ghastliness, but he attributed it to "climbing so many bweastly hills," and after lying down for an hour or two, with a bottle of smelling-salts to his nose, he was again able to stand on his feet and face the wicked world.

The next day was Sunday, and young Mr. Leonard and his mamma went to the First Bapterian church, that being the sect of which the Leonards had always been strong supporters. Mrs. Leonard's devotions were considerably interfered with by the haunting suspicion that she knew the bonnet in front of her, and sure enough when its wearer happened to turn round to see the singers, who should it be but Mrs. Todhunter, also of Boston.

"Stay after service, my dear," whispered Mrs. Todhunter, during one of the hymns; "we're going to hav a treat—converted Chinese."

All the missionary zeal of the New Englander was stirred at this hint, and they stayed. The first part in the appendix to the service was a Chinese Sunday-school, and young Mr. Leonard did not seem to be half as charmed by the services as his mother had expected him to be; indeed, it was all he could do to keep from sneaking out of the pew, or lying down in it under plea of being poorly.

He heard the devout heathen singing some horrible travesty of dear old "Rousseau's Dream" with all the vigor and tunefulness of a blacksmith's bellows, and then he heard a resonant, crackly voice, at sound of which his heart melted like wax within him. He glanced fearfully up. There was no mistaking that ophidian head and those free gestures—it was Quong Ah Wok, the prince of highbinders.

He was telling the story of his conversion, of his being brought out of the darkness and confusion of ancient Confucianism into the perfect clearness of new Bapterianism, and telling it with a redundancy of picturesque action which young Mr. Leonard knew only too well.

"And now me cl-lean!" cried the convert with a fountain-like movement of the hands from the chest upward and outward; "all same cl-lean like snow, while you, pool sinnels, black like Melican man's shoe. Come be clean, come be white, then all go heaven, sing, sing, sing fo-levah—amen."

To say that young Mr. Leonard was amazed is but faintly to express his condition. He was simply stupefied, and it was in this stupor that he somehow knew his mamma was taking him by the arm and leading him up to the pulpit platform to shake hands with the converted Ah Wok.

"So charmed," he heard his mamma say, and then he felt his hand seized in a bony paw; a few quick, low gutturals were spoken, and then there was a thin giggle.

He looked up perforce, and there, sitting in sweet demureness, was the little Chinese maiden.

"This my niece, also one Clistian gel," said Ah Wok, with a fearful working of his mobil jaws and lowering of his lids; "you please shake hands wif lill Clistian gel."

Young Mr. Leonard put out a moist, quivering hand and felt it gently tickled in the palm. He ventured a timid glance from the corner of his eyes and met one as full of mischief as is a monkey. He thought of celestial wile, of his fifty-three dollars, and sighed;

And the maiden smiled.—Thomas J. Vivian in the Argonaut.

Special Call for Guarantee Fund.

The Congress of the American Secular Union, recently held at Portsmouth, O., directed the officers to make, through the Liberal papers, a call upon our friends for the pledge of $5,000 to enlarge and carry forward the work of the society. This money is needed to sustain the business of the general office in Philadelphia, and to pay the salaries and traveling expenses of at least two field secretaries, who shall go out to organize auxiliary societies and otherwise labor to promote the cause.

That this is an important movement in the right direction, must be obvious to all. Never was a time when the work of our society was so much in demand; and our one need is the money to carry on that work. Will our friends respond to this call liberally and at once, that we may know what to depend upon?

The president, besides his gratuitous daily work in behalf of the society, offers to be one of twenty to contribute $100 each for this object. Will nineteen others respond to this proposition at once?

How many can pledge $50, $25, $10, $5, $1? Let every friend of the cause inform us as soon as possible what he or she is willing to pledge.

Let all Liberal societies, whether auxiliary or not, take up this matter promptly, and inform us what they are willing to do.

The pledges will be published in THE TRUTH SEEKER, Investigator, Freethought, and Secular Thought, each month. It is understood that the subscriptions may be paid during the coming year at the convenience of the subscribers, and, if desired, in instalments. All responses to this call should be addressed to the corresponding secretary.

We see no reason why the sum named should not be secured by pledges within thirty days.

Where Shall We Hav the Next Congress?

The Portsmouth Congress of the American Secular Union was a success in every sense of the word. Prominent Liberal speakers, first-class music and plenty of it, furnished without cost to us by the local auxiliary, and a large attendance, both of Liberals and of outsiders, not only from Portsmouth but also from the surrounding country and from the cities of Columbus, Cincinnati, Chicago, etc., made this assemblage of our people one long to be remembered.

The excellent music rendered at all our meetings, through the kindly foresight of the Portsmouth Secular Union, deserves our special thanks. Official "thrones might totter," Secular discussion wax wrathful or wane to a peaceful sunset, but the talented pianist, Miss Sarah Stevens, was sure to be on hand to soothe with her harmonies. Then there was the welcome trio of guitarists, Messrs. Adams, Rice, and Kennedy, with the mandolinist Charles Miller and the violinist Abe White, who were certain of an encore; and the well-trained colored jubilee singers, Messrs. Shumake, Haley, Woods, and Robinson. But the field day of the Congress (a "Field" day in more senses than one) was Sunday, when Al. G. Field, with his minstrel troupe, entertained us with music in the intervals of the speaking. During the afternoon and evening the house was packed, not only with the Portsmouth people, but also with visitors brought thither by excursion trains, so that our Secularist friends were glad to avail themselvs of the invitation to occupy seats on the stage, while listening to the speakers and to the splendid music given us by Mr. Field's band.

We can congratulate ourselvs on having made so good an impression upon the people of Portsmouth, that the local auxiliary hav already applied to hav us next year. But, when we reflect upon the noble work which this little band of Secularists hav already done in raising the $500 which they pledged toward the expenses, and upon their many kindnesses to us in other directions, it seems unfair to trespass upon the hospitality of these generous people two years in succession. We think it is time for some other city to invite us.

What auxiliary will step forward and pledge an equal amount ($500) for the expenses of next year's congress in their city? If this young, six-months-old auxiliary of Portsmouth can do as splendidly as it has done, surely some of our older auxiliaries ought to do at least as well, if not better. Come, friends, what do you say? Auxiliaries to the front, and let us hear from you promptly!

IDA C. CRADDOCK, Corr. Sec. A. S. U.

Philadelphia, Pa., Nov. 17, 1890.

The War is On.

Our late Congress left me sore and tired. But at this writing I am in prime condition and again in the harness that I love so well to wear.

The fanatics of the community are all torn up, and are engaged in the business that suits them best, viz., flying dirty lies. There is not much use in attempting to kill these traveling falsehoods, for if you succeed in carrying one of them to the tomb, a thousand others come to the burial.

The first things that came after the Congress were a Christian newspaper writer hurling arrows of malice at Miss Voltairine de Cleyre, an orthodox minister inferring in a sermon that Secularists were brutes, and a deaf "doctor" propounding questions to Charles Watts. I met these things in this way:

EDITOR BLADE: One of your reporters has seen fit to throw an arrow at the reputation of Miss Voltairine de Cleyre. He wrote like one who has a curbstone, cold and feelingless, beating in his bosom, instead of a heart filled with sympathy and love. The fact is, he threw his arrow without knowing the story of her life. He did not even inquire about it. Had he known she was raised in sad surroundings, that she had suffered untold cruelties and unwritten horrors—in fact, had he known all the suffering she had experienced, the item he wrote would hav withered in his hand. In my opinion, Miss de Cleyre deserves credit, and lots of it. She is an orphan, and as such has educated herself, and is making an honest living by the magic of her brain and voice.

Dr. J. B. Carter has rushed into print with a question to Chas. Watts. As everybody knows, the doctor is hard of hearing; that accounts for his asking the questions he does. Watts answered it, and so did several others. I will not repeat. If Mr. Watts sees fit he can.

The next move made by the fanatics was to secure the locking of the doors of our meeting-hall against us. The local auxiliary met all the same and passed ringing resolutions. The Portsmouth Blade spoke of the affair and the resolutions as follows:

Grand Army Hall was closed against the Portsmouth Secular Union last night. This did not seem to dampen their ardor or their energy in any respect, for they held an enthusiastic meeting in the store-room of J. L. Treuthart, passing resolutions relativ to the hall matter and transacting other business of minor importance. The resolutions as adopted are:

WHEREAS, The Portsmouth branch of the American Secular Union obtained from the trustees of Bailey post, G. A. R., their consent to hold a meeting of their said branch in Grand Army Hall on the evening of Sunday, November 9th; and,

WHEREAS, The adjutant of the post, James Ricker, and its commander, William Whitney, without any action on the part of Bailey post or its officers, other than themselvs, refused to permit the said branch to occupy the hall, as had been previously agreed upon, be it therefore

Resolved, That we respectfully call the attention of Bailey post to this matter and ask its consideration thereof—whether they approve or disapprove of the same.

Resolved, That we consider the action of the adjutant who wrote the order and signed the commander's name thereto, as an act of discourtesy, which we cannot pass without notice. Having the highest regard for the Grand Army—a patriotic body of old soldiers and good citizens—we wish it understood that we ask nothing of them that will in any way injure them or their cause; but having heretofore been shown by them courtesy and kindness, we were not prepared for the disappointment to which we were subjected.

Resolved, That a copy of these resolutions be submitted to Bailey post for its future consideration.

In order to show that the local Secularists are not such bad, bad men, I wrote the appended article for the Blade:

EDITOR BLADE: The hand of oppression is raised against the Portsmouth Secular Union. Its members are accused by people and by press with being Anarchists and the vilest of the vile. At our reputation filth is being thrown, and those engaged therein seem as "sewers into which hav been emptied all the slops of hell." And yet what has been said by voice and print I applaud, for the reason that it echoes free speech and free press. I take it for what it is worth, and no more.

As a fact, the members of the Portsmouth Secular Union are American citizens, aiming to do that which is right and just, not only to themselvs but to others. We are not Anarchists, and do not favor Anarchy. The Secular Union is not given to any particular belief or unbelief. It advocates nine propositions—propositions strictly American, and ringing with common sense.

Now a few words regarding G. A. R. Hall. When first we organized we secured that hall for our meeting-place. There were other and cheaper halls on the market, but we unanimously chose Grand Army Hall. And for these reasons:

First, It is a temple sacred to the principles for which we contend, that is to say, principles fundamental with our government.

Secondly, We desired to place money in the treasury of an organization similar in so many respects to our own—an organization contending for the same principles and admiring the same men.

Thirdly, we wished to show respect to the soldiers of our organization. They are the leaders of the same, and most of them members of Bailey post. Others of our members were identified with the Abolition movement and covered themselvs with honor and glory.

The opposition that has sprung up in the ranks of Bailey post and the Bailey Relief Corps is of recent birth, and comes from only a few. Certain members of the post threatened to do this and do that, and ladies of the Relief Corps, it is said, threatened to pass resolutions of indignation and vacate the hall if the Portsmouth Secular Union were allowed to longer meet therein. A verdict on the action of these certain ones I do not intend to pass; I leave that for the people and to the people. Our Union, having heard of the threats being made, decided to proceed in an orderly and peaceable manner. The program was to meet in G. A. R. Hall Sunday evening, November 9th, for the last time. Had we been allowed the privilege of so assembling we would hav said in resolutions prepared: "Rather than shatter the harmony that exists in the ranks of the post and the relief corps, rather than cause dissension and strife, we will, like the Arab of the desert, 'fold our tents and quietly move away.'" But we were not allowed this privilege, owing to the arbitrary action of Adjutant Ricker and Commander Whitney.

Now, the people who scandalize and traduce us we pity. They know not what they do. But we are their friends. We shall ever applaud the good they do and keep on fighting for the liberty of themselvs and their posterity. We condemn not a soul, nor harbor a hard feeling. We stand on humanity's broad platform working for the protection and maintenance of the rights of soldier and citizen, friend and foe. In the Grand Army of the Republic and the Ladies' Relief Corps, as organizations, we recognize two of the main supports of the grand fabric of the American government. "With thankfulness we remember every sacrifice made by this nation for liberty, every sacrifice made by every patriotic man and woman, and we shall ever in patriotic memory sit by the grave of every soldier and every brave army nurse, and crown them again and again with the crown of everlasting honor."

William F. Whitney, commander of Bailey post, G. A. R, came next, through the columns of the Blade, in this wise:

EDITOR BLADE: I notice in your issue of the 10th a copy of certain resolutions passed by the Portsmouth branch of the American Secular Union at their meeting Sunday evening, condemning the action of myself and my adjutant, Mr. James W. Ricker, in refusing to allow G. A. R. Hall to be opened for their meeting on that evening.

In reply I hav only to say the resolutions arc not based upon facts. Were such the case I should not answer them, and would leave the matter for the approval or disapproval of the post at its next meeting. In the first place I wish to say that the notice to the janitor was written by my order, the adjutant having no authority to issue an order of any kind except by my direction, and I assume the entire responsibility in that respect.

In the second place the resolutions say the Union had "obtained from the trustees of Bailey post, G. A. R., their consent to hold a meeting in Grand Army Hall." This I deny. No consent was ever, to my knowledge, given for any meeting, either at that time or any other. I admit that the consent of two of the trustees had been obtained, but that is insufficient. Section 5, Article vii, by-laws of Bailey post, reads as follows: "The commander, adjutant, and three trustees, chosen at the annual meeting, shall constitute a board of trustees for the post. They shall investigate and approve or disapprove the bond of the quartermaster; make contracts for rent of hall, subject to confirmation of the post," etc.

Now, no contract had ever been agreed upon by the trustees, and no action had ever been taken by the post in the matter. The Union had been permitted the use of the hall by two members of the board of trustees, under promis that the attention of the post would be called to it, but it has never been done, and last week, when I was informed by the adjutant that another series of meetings was to begin Sunday evening, I instructed him to notify the janitor of the post not to open the hall, and as commander of the post I felt justified in making the order. But not desiring to be arbitrary about the matter I called upon the janitor Saturday evening, and advised him that if three members of the board should consent to the meeting I would revoke my order, and giv him authority to open, notwithstanding I was opposed to the organization. I think as a matter of courtesy all the members of the board of trustees should hav been consulted before consent of any kind was given for the use of the hall. As one of its members I was not, and as to Mr. Ricker, I am not, advised.

Very truly yours, WM. F. WHITNEY,
Commander Bailey Post.

I answered Mr. Whitney in the same paper, thus:

You say our resolutions "condemn the action of yourself and Adjutant Ricker." If that is true why do we submit the matter to Bailey post? Then you say "the resolutions are not based on facts," and in the very next line deny this by writing, "were such the case I should not answer them." Do you not see that you affirm and deny at the same time. Looked at in one way your words infer that you will not allow the resolutions to come before the post for consideration; in another way, that you will.

In regard to the order served on the janitor I will say to you that in the form it is, the way it is written, and the way it is signed, it proves that the adjutant assumed the authority, which you admit he does not hav, and issued the same. Your assuming the "responsibility" does not tend in the least to lift the matter from the shoulders of Mr. Ricker.

You deny in toto that we obtained from the trustees of Bailey post their consent to hold a meeting in G. A. R. Hall. Then you say no consent was ever given, so far as you know, and then again you admit that the consent of two of the trustees had been obtained. You quote part, and part only, of Section 5, Article vii, of Bailey post's by-laws, of which this only is material: "They (the trustees) shall make contracts for rent of hall, subject to confirmation of the post." You argue "that no contract has ever been agreed upon by the trustees, and no action had ever been taken by the post in the matter." Did not Benj. Woods, a member of the Secular Union, and also a member of your post, bring the matter up at a post meeting? Did I not talk to you about it previous to Mr. Woods's application to rent? Will you deny that Captain Millstead, Milton Barber, and Isaac Woodruff, hav been talked to on the same subject? How will you go about to disprove that the hall was not let to us? Did we not occupy it for a considerable length of time? Did we not pay $2 per week rent? Did not your collecting officer collect the same? Does not this payment of money and the receipts therefor tend to establish a contract? And then if Section 5, Article vii, was being violated, how does it come you were so long in finding it out? In fact, hav you not violated this section yourself by letting the hall on your own responsibility?

Now, there can be no doubt that a contract was made between the trustees of Bailey post and Benjamin Woods. The latter gentleman so reported to our body and the minutes of the same show it. The contract, being made, was then "subject to confirmation by the post;" that is, if they (the trustees) deemed it optional, they could present it to the members of the post for their approval or rejection. If not so presented and the contract entered into effect—the hall being occupied and the rent being paid—the very fact of the members of Bailey post acquiescing stood as prima facie evidence of confirmation. The part of Section 5, Article vii, which you failed to quote, requires the trustees—and you are one ex officio—"to report immediately to the post all bills audited, and to make a monthly report of all other business transacted by them." Did their monthly reports contain the statement that your hall was rented by the Portsmouth Secular Union? That said Union was prompt in paying the rent charged them?

Your visit to Janitor George on the Saturday evening you mention, and what you told him you would do, was detrimental to the stand you had taken. You were "to see three of the trustees, and if they gave consent you would let George know." Did you see them? Did you make any attempt to see them? You say you "are opposed to our organization." That is your right and privilege, but this does not exempt you from honorable dealing, man with man, does it?

Adjutant Ricker, on being seen Monday morning, gave a different "reason why" from what you hav given. Loyalty was the essence of his cry. He said "the G. A. R. must be loyal; that the red flag of Anarchy had been waved at our congress; and that somebody had to do something." He was then asked: "Do you regard any member of the Secular Union as an Anarchist?" "There is not an Anarchist among them," was his reply. And he ended the conversation by saying the "ladies" were warmed up and pushing things, or something to that effect.

In conclusion, I desire to quote one of the objects to be accomplished by the G. A. R. I take it from your by-laws. It is: "To encourage the spread of universal liberty, equal rights, and justice to all men." On that plank stand firmly and steadfastly, and the Secular Union will never complain. We so stand for you. Will you for us?

The evidence as given above, pro and con, will be presented to Bailey post at their regular meeting, Monday night, Nov. 17, 1890.

There is fun ahead. In the mean time we will meet in the rooms of Veterans' Temple, a three-story structure with janitor and all conveniences. The fathers, don't you see, locked us out and the sons took us in. Therefore sing praises unto the sons, and a slice, now and then, unto the "dads."

In conclusion, I desire to call attention to J. E. Valjean, the brave and fearless editor of the Portsmouth Blade. I say brave, because he expresses his honest thoughts. He is not owned, and the blood of the caterer to popular things because they are popular, does not course his veins. He is for us and with us in the main. He gives the space of his paper to arguments for and against our principles, and frequently speaks editorially, and favorably so, of us. I like him, and so do all who know him. At a future time I will describe a scene in which he was the principal actor, taking the part of Secularism eloquently and superbly. WILL S. ANDRES.

Are the Police Blackmailers?

REV. HOWARD CROSBY, Dear Sir: The statement relativ to police blackmailing, recently attributed to you, loses none of its importance by your equivocal disclaimer printed in last Sunday's papers. Whatever you really said is of little consequence, but it is of immense consequence that public attention is called pointedly by some emphatic assertion to the subject-matter of your alleged remarks.

It has been common rumor, an open secret, understood by all men about town for years, that the police derived illicit revenue from prostitutes, liquor dealers, and gamblers. I heard such rumors when a schoolboy, thirty years ago, and hav heard them from time to time since. During the Henry George campaign, speakers from the platform frequently denounced the police as "pensioners of the prostitutes." With no means of positiv proof I hav always believed that the police levy contributions upon these classes, and I am certain that that belief is very general among the citizens of New York. My belief finds confirmation in the fact that with almost unlimited legal and usurped powers to enforce the laws against these classes, if there were any honest disposition to enforce the laws, the prostitutes, liquor dealers, and gamblers are still a very large and thriving part of our population.

My belief also finds confirmation in the spasmodic brutal attacks which the police make, from time to time, upon the friendless women, arresting them for street walking, as if women had no right to walk in the streets. While scores of unfortunate women walk the streets nightly, police zeal is sometimes so excessiv that we hav reports of virtuous women having been arrested and imprisoned upon this frivolous charge. I hav procured drinks enough in New York bar-rooms during Sundays, and forbidden hours, to hav very decided convictions upon the efficiency and honesty of police supervision of liquor sellers, and I see that, notwithstanding occasional terrific raids upon gamblers, there are always plenty left over to make the victims of new raids, and that, while a great cry goes forth that gambling is suppressed, houses, generally reputed to be gambling-houses, and which certain evidences convince me are such, hav existed for years in the neighborhood of the large hotels.

Furthermore, my belief is confirmed by seeing the efforts of the police commissioners to defeat the law providing for matrons in police stations, a law which the ordinary dictates of humanity would move them to carry out promptly, were there not at work considerations more powerful.

You, sir, are president of a conspicuous society which has adopted the high-sounding, but, I fear, misleading name of "The Society for the Prevention of Crime." Your society professes to seek out and procure the prosecution of law-breakers. It decides in secret upon its measures, and is not accountable to the people in any way. It is a private inquisition of a most dangerous and threatening character, a constant menace to republican institutions. There is in this country no reason for the existence of such a society. But the reason most strongly and plausibly urged for its establishment was that the police, upon whom properly devolves the work with which your society insists upon meddling, could not be made to execute the laws. Police inefficiency, venality, and corruption were the reasons given why the people should entrust the enforcement of laws to private societies, and at the time of the organization of your society, those reasons seemed very cogent. Your society, usurping police powers as it does, is a standing reproach to the police, a standing protest that the police do not execute the laws. If the police did execute the laws there would be no raison d'etre for your society. The existence of your society, therefore, is an indorsement and confirmation of my belief in the existence of corrupt practices among the police.

Now, my purpose in writing is to say that, with the experience of your society, the knowledge it professes to hav acquired and the machinery it claims to hav perfected during the years of its existence, and with the powers with which a too confiding public has prodigally endowed it, if it is ever to justify the alleged purpose of its existence, it should now be able to prove police delinquencies. Either this, or it should be disbanded and driven out of business. I am not unmindful of the fact that, since the exposures made by the New York newspapers in February, 1880, your society has labored under disadvantages, but notwithstanding that, I believe that if you will employ the machinery of your society for the holy purpose of purifying the police you will gain the applause and gratitude of many worthy citizens whose distrust of your society is as great as their distrust of the police.

Come, Mr. Crosby, giv up sham. No one is deceived in these matters, and the urgent need of the day is common honesty. Why not use your society to enforce honesty upon the police, and use it in such a way that people will hav some confidence that it is really in earnest in what it is doing, and not making a mere hypocritical outcry to attract attention away from some underhand deviltry? In the name of consistency, I ask you to do this, or else add to your equivocal denial the confession that whatever you may hav said about the police was merely the vaporing of the man who, in apparent approval of one of the most atrocious pieces of judicial rascality ever perpetrated in this country, said, from the platform of the Young Men's Christian Association, "I believe in deceit."

I hav put this in the form of an open letter because it concerns the general public quite as much as it does either you or

Yours truly, ED. W. CHAMBERLAIN.

Items of Foreign Freethought News.

The editor of El Radical, M. Odon dé Buen, professor at the university of Barcelona, has started a movement tending to combine the various Freethought associations of Spain in a federation similar to that of France.

The size of the audiences commanded by Viktor E. Lennstrand is now so great that he has been obliged to hire a much larger hall. November 2d, he lectured on "Is the Freethought Movement in Sweden Unnecessary and is the Educational Work of Freethinkers Destructiv?"

In Austria the authorities hav prohibited the publication of the Niederösterreichische Schulzeitung and the Bürgerschule, two educational papers, because they reprinted the "blasphemous" speech of Herr Ditte on the Berlin school congress, demanding that religion should not be taught in the schools.—Das Menschenthum.

The bureau of statistics of the city of Paris has published its annual for 1889, from which it appears that the number of secular funerals is strongly increasing. The number of burials during said year was 56,773, out of which 10,580 were secular. Furthermore, in the arrondissement of Charonne 38 of every 100 were secular, in Poppincourt and Berey 25 of every 100, in Opera and Passy 8 and 9 of every 100.—La Raison.

A Freethinker was the other day sentenced to a month's imprisonment by the police court of Leipzig because of "disturbance of a religious service." A Turner had committed suicide and the society's minister forbade the Turners to attend the funeral. Some of them did, however, and the Freethinking member who carried the flag deposited a wreath on the coffin with these words: "The honor which others hav denied you we will giv you." The court found the humane Freethinker guilty and thus anew confirmed the marriage between church and state.

That Freethought is sadly needed in Austria is evident. A miracle-doctor named Wawrzel was a short time ago indicted for body-stealing. During the trial it was found that he used ashes from dead men's bones as a cure for typhoid fever. Yet not in all cases, only when the disease was what he called "Jewish fever;" if "Catholic typhoid fever," a couple dozen "Our Father's" would drive out the evil spirit. The doctor had many patients, who invariably died if the disease actually was said fever. The miracle-worker got five months in the penitentiary.—Der Freidenker.

It is to be regretted that the Social Democratic party, at the head of which stands Axel Danielsen and which numbers several Freethinkers in its ranks, has chosen to be hostil toward the Freethought movement. The Social Democrats hav perfect liberty to express their ideas, but we cannot see the justice of their wishing to compel others to accept the same. The principal objects of the Swedish Freethought society are the total separation of church and state and perfect religious liberty; this they hav in common with the Socialists, and we don't see why they cannot work together on this platform; this so much the more as economical liberty cannot be gained unless mental liberty is secured.

From Las Dominicales, one of our Spanish exchanges, we gather the following piece of news, which shows the extent of power yet resting in the Spanish clergy. To the honor of the secular press of Spain it must be said that the incident brought forth strong denunciations, and, we do not doubt, increased the sentiment in favor of a total separation of church and state. In Aranjuez is situated a military school similar to that at West Point, N. Y. The school, which is supported by the state, receives pupils from an age of seven years until sixteen. Some time ago the entire school was ordered to partake in the cannibalistic feast wherein is served the flesh of "our savior." A little fellow, nine years of age, observed that some of the consecrated wafer stuck to his lips. To touch it with his impure hands would be a sacrilege, and, full of fear, he brought down his military cap and with it shoved the wafer in his mouth. A priest, however, observed this and lodged a complaint with the school authorities, the result of which was a sentence of nine days' imprisonment on bread and water. The sentence being served, the entire school, officers, teachers, sky-pilots, and pupils, met in the school-yard, where a square was formed. The culprit, with his hands tied behind his back, was marched in to the tune of a funeral march. A regular tribunal of the infamous Inquisition was created; the military insignia were torn off the delinquent, he was expelled from the school, and excommunication followed. Then the priest spoke, the clergy sang the hymn for the dead, and the unlucky military cap was placed on a post, wood piled around, and the fire lit. Most cheerfully would the priest hav allowed the boy to take the cap's place, but alas, even Spain was not priest-ridden enough to allow this. Certainly Ramon Chies and Damafilo, the editors of our Freethought contemporary, need not worry themselvs for fear of having no abuses or intolerance to correct.

Our London Letter.

The "Agnostic Annual," edited by C. A. Watts, has again made its appearance, and as usual contains a number of well-written and interesting articles. I understand the circulation increases year by year, and I see that a firm of booksellers who up to the present hav strenuously refused to stock it, hav now, in consequence of numerous inquiries from customers who are more liberal-minded than themselvs, thought it advisable to help in its distribution. This little work has no doubt been of great assistance in disseminating the views of Agnostics, much to the dismay and disgust of many of the clerical party, though Amos Waters's article on Agnosticism and the Church of England should allay much of their displeasure. It is to be hoped that not many Freethinkers will fall in with his suggestion for a "fusion of reasonable and devout Agnostics with the Liberal party of breadth and progress in the Church of England," though it is quite possible that a certain section of the Agnostic party, who are really Theists in principle, may be of like mind with Mr. Waters. If there is to be a fusion, let the liberal-minded clergy honestly come out of the church and join the Agnostics. It looks somewhat as though there was a craving for the loaves and fishes of the establishment. It is refreshing to turn from this article to that written by Mr. Holyoake entitled, "The Iron Hand Under the Velvet Glove," a careful perusal of which will not tend to induce the reader to fraternize with the paid supporters and teachers of Christianity.

The recent suicide in St. Paul's cathedral has apparently caused much consternation in the minds of the devout, and a "reconciliation service" has been held, no one knows why, for although this particular house of God has been the scene of many suicides, no such service has been thought necessary. Anyhow, it was a new effect, and called some little attention to the cathedral—acting in a certain measure as an advertisment.

The greatest showman of modern times, "General" Booth, has certainly discovered a hitherto unrecorded device for obtaining money. It is a question if any other individual would hav originated the idea of carting the body of his wife all over a large city for such a purpose, and strange to say, the majority of people can see nothing indecorous about it. I am rather surprised he buried the body when he might hav made a considerable sum by having it cut up into small fragments and sold as relics. This little performance of his was merely a preliminary to the publication of his great work, "In Darkest England and the Way Out," a very lively concoction, the chief point in it being his modest demand for a million pounds sterling to enable him to carry out his scheme. He may get it, it is by no means impossible, and if he can do the good he promises, so much the better; if not, he will only be so much more money in pocket, and the fools who hav subscribed to the fund may as well giv it in that direction as to foreign missions—either way it will be wasted, and the givers would not bestow their money for any useful purpose. The most objectionable part of Booth's scheme is the proselytism which is bound to follow, for if he does succeed in rescuing and reclaiming "the homeless, the out-of-workers, the drunkards, the harlots," the poor wretches, if they hav any sense of gratitude, will feel bound to believe anything and everything the saviors may please to say. I wish him every success, but the more successful he is the quicker will be the downfall of the whole edifice. Built up of such incongruous elements, it will hav no more stability than a huge snow-man which will topple over with its own weight, or speedily melt away, the result of which will be pretty much the same as the sudden disbandment of a large army of mercenaries. However, if it lasts his time, it will not matter to him, for he will hav acquired sufficient money to well endow his posterity for some time to come, providing they are as careful as the founder of the family.

The spirit of the Church of England was well shown by the bishop of Peterborough, who recently maintained that the first duty of the church was to contribute to the glory of the Lord, its function also was to contribute to the happiness of man, but this latter was secondary and subsidiary. Naturally, a collection followed and realized the sum of £569 toward the restoration of Peterborough cathedral. It is to be hoped the Lord was pleased with the result, and feels all the happier for having his house put in proper repair now the wet weather is coming on.

In my humble judgment there is much more poetry in Colonel Ingersoll's testimonial to Walt Whitman, than in the latter's "Leaves of Grass."

The Lecture Field.

I left San Francisco on the steamboat October 29th for Stockton, and then to Knight's Ferry by rail and stage. Near the latter place I found the home of Hon. A. Schell, where I was most cordially welcomed and kindly entertained by Mr. A. Schell and family and also by Mr. Herrick Schell and family, all residing under the same roof and feasting at the same table. The guest at this house is treated in fine style and everything is done to make him happy. I was sorry when the time came for me to leave. But perhaps it is well as it was, for if I had stayed longer and fared so sumptuously every day, where the land teems with wine, honey, and cream, not to speak of grapes, peaches (November 2d), and other good things, I fear that when I returned to Oakland and had to come down to skim-milk and water—Oakland water invigorated with sand—I should hav been a very badly disgruntled man.

Mr. A. Schell, as many readers of this paper know, has been a very activ man—a Liberal in sentiment and a patriot in politics. Everyone who knows anything at all about him knows that he is a Freethinker and a Republican.

A few weeks since a very estimable woman died at Oakdale, twelve miles from Mr. Schell's. He was invited to deliver the funeral discourse, which he did in a manner that won praises even from those who are still professed Christians. It was the first time in their lives that many who gathered around the coffin on that occasion had ever heard such appropriate and thoughtful remarks made at a funeral.

Mine was the first Liberal lecture ever given at Knight's Ferry. To my surprise and to the great gratification of all our Liberal friends, we had a very good and an exceedingly attentiv audience.

On my way home I stopped one night at Oakdale and lectured in the Independent church, and so great was the enthusiasm over the first lecture that I was cordially invited to return, which I shall do at my earliest convenience.

Our good friend A. Schell read aloud to me the paragraph in Freethought relating to Mr. Jamieson's financial embarrassment. He became interested in the lecturer's troubles and said to me, "Brother Bell, I wish you would say through the Liberal papers to the Freethinkers of the country that I am ready to help Mr. Jamieson. I will lend him $250 at six per cent if several others will loan him the $500. This way of raising it will save time, and relieve of much worriment."

This offer was made spontaneously and magnanimously, and I hope there are others in our Liberal ranks who will promptly join with Mr. Schell in doing this much-needed favor.

There will be no risk, as ample security will be given.

The address of A. Schell is Knight's Ferry, Stanislaus county, Cal.

Mr. W. F. Jamieson's address is Box 336, Des Moines, Ia.

I shall be happy to render Mr. Jamieson all the aid I can, and to facilitate matters, I will promptly answer any letters addressed to me.

The Lecture Field in Washington.

Willapa, Pacific county, is about forty miles due west of Chehalis. Not having been in the saddle for nigh twenty-five years, it was a novel experience to travel forty miles on horseback, with my usual large and weighty budget of Liberal literature packed in a couple of potato sacks and strapped on the back part of the saddle. The greater part of the way was through dense woods, over hill and dale, gulch, creek, and river. Over eight miles was the crudest, roughest trail, through a dense forest of gigantic firs five to twenty feet in diameter, towering skyward three to four hundred feet. The soil is exceeding rich and the growth of underbrush rank and luxuriant. That trail is twenty miles from a railroad, yet I am assured every acre of it has been taken up for all of two miles each side of the trail; and its fortunate possessors, by converting it into farms or cash, will realize handsome returns, for already engineers' and contractors' camps hav become landmarks. The road-bed is surveyed, and being rapidly graded. Soon the whistle of the locomotiv will tell of rapid transformation to good market for the immense crops of grain, fruit, and vegetables this now wild woods will produce.

I took a train from Seattle to Chehalis, where I chartered a foundered old jade, warranted a good roadster, an easy-going saddle-horse. If long experience, gained by a gait that afforded ample time and opportunity to "view the landscape o'er," and leisurely test the quality of the grass and shrubbery by the way, filled the bill, then certainly that ancient equine perambulator was fully up to its owner's recommendation. It was a long, lonely weariness of the flesh and rattle of the bones, a rough and rugged road. As the evening shades gathered around me I made spasmodic efforts to induce my gallant knacker to increase of speed. I felt woefully tired, and yet each mile I rode decreased my desire to sit down. Dark clouds threatened rain. The dense foliage made the path like a tunnel, the darkness so black it could be felt. The way was interspersed with deep gulches, creeks, and rivers, and when they were bridged at all the bridge consisted of logs or loose slabs, with nothing to prevent one going off on either side into unknown depths below. Numerous holes, to say nothing of an occasional absent slab, made traps into which should the horse step the rider would be likely to change his mode of locomotion and fly over the horse's neck with every probability of breaking his own. Then, too, if an accident happened no help was nigh—no house within miles, and travelers, like angel visits, few and far between. Although I was very weary, all disposition to sleep was checked by the necessities of the occasion, which kept the rider very wide awake. I was told I should hav to ford the river, and I did—forded rivers and creeks nigh thirty times. About ten at night, after descending a precipitous bank into a wide, raging torrent, and on gaining the other side groping about in the inky darkness for half an hour ere I found the track leading to the road, half a mile on I found a ranch, and, oh, so gladly, put up for the night, preferring to continue my equestrian pleasure trip by daylight.

But on arrival at the hospitable ranch of that astute phrenologist and jolliest of kind-hearted bachelors, Jacob Drissler, all sense of weariness was quickly dispelled. He has a beautiful farm, cleared by himself, a splendid orchard of plums, prunes, apples, and pears, with a choice and extensiv vegetable garden, and raises very large crops of hay and grain. He is just the man for those to write to who desire to know all about how to insure a good home and remunerativ labor by farming in Washington.

H. A. Townes, whose ranch fronts that of Mr. Drissler's (they are located about eight miles from the village of Willapa), is one of the noble pioneers of Liberalism in this section. His wife and family are each and all stanch and true to the cause, and as in the case of Jacob Drissler, heart, home, and purse are ever open to the Liberal messengers. The Townes mansion was a free hotel for all who desired to attend the lectures. Friend Townes was suffering from a severe attack of sickness that rendered it impossible for him to endure the jolt of eight miles' ride to Willapa, where the lectures were to be delivered. But as many in his neighborhood were interested, it was deemed advisable to hav at least one lecture at the adjacent school-house. I had only Saturday and Sunday to devote to the work there. Pressing duties pertaining to the Washington Secular Union demanded my return to Seattle. Besides, I had chartered my noble charger only until Tuesday. To make the most of the time possible, I arranged to lecture at Willapa Saturday afternoon at 4 o'clock; at Townes's school-house Saturday evening at 7:30 and Sunday morning at 11; at Willapa Sunday afternoon at 3, and at Townes's school-house Sunday evening at 7:30. As the places were eight miles apart, this program necessitated some hard riding, and prevented growing stiff or rusty for want of exercise. Saturday afternoon seemed the most unpromising time to obtain an audience, but I was agreeably disappointed. I had good attendance, and the interest manifested gave promis of good results. At the Townes's school-house the attendance increased at each lecture. There is good prospect of arranging for lectures every alternate month. So long as Jacob Drissler and H. A. Townes are the standard-bearers there will be no lack of generous support. Eight stanch and true Liberals were enrolled in the Washington Secular Union, and there is every reason to expect triple that number on my next visit.

The Political Revolution.

Liberals should come together, in order that they may make themselvs felt in the reconstruction of parties.

TO THE EDITOR OF THE TRUTH SEEKER, Sir: In days bygone I was somewhat activ in efforts to draw out and concentrate the Liberal sentiment of the state. I hav for some years remitted all effort in that behalf, for the reason that results did not seem equal to the expenditure. I hav long felt, however, that the Liberalists of the country should show a more united front in order that they may make themselvs felt in the reconstruction of parties, which I believe must come. The result of the late elections is prophetic of this pending reconstruction. The election on Tuesday was not of itself a political revolution. It was simply the precursor of the revolution that is to come. It really settles nothing as between the old parties. I doubt if very many of those who voted had any intelligent conception of what their vote was to determin. There is an element of political revolution in the air, of which the vote of Tuesday was simply the surface indication.

In the reconstruction of parties, the church people will naturally seek to introduce the religious element. If the Liberals are organized they can not only prevent this, but they can be influential in engrafting Liberal principles upon the new political chart.

There is a tendency to the formation of an anti-Catholic party. But those in the movement proceed upon the idea that Catholicism must be put down that Protestantism may be put up. Liberals cculd hav no stake in such a program. They reject the dogmas of both, and would not promote the one at the expense of the other. They combat both and yet they would favor state interference with neither, but rather that the state shall cut loose from both. And yet where either wing of the church becomes dangerous as a political factor, it would be the duty of the state to limit its power.

But I did not design to write an essay nor enter upon a discussion, but only to say that I shall be glad to correspond with Liberals in Michigan with a view of coöperation on the lines indicated.

Detroit, Nov. 6, 1890. L. B. McCracken.

Was It a Tragedy?

We are told by writers on the history of law that the original mode of selecting a jury was different from the present. Instead of selecting disinterested persons who knew nothing of the case to listen to the testimony and decide between litigants, the court selected for jurors those who did know about the case—that is, the witnesses and the jurors were the same persons. Taking the most favorable view of the pretended evidence of the crucifixion of Jesus, the jury was selected in this way. Now, without considering the authenticity of the gospels, paying no attention to the fact that they were written long subsequent to the alleged occurrence of the events, when, where, or by whom is wholly a matter of conjecture, we will take the statements made by the imaginary witnesses, introduced by the writers of the gospels, just as if they were real testimony, and see how the case would stand, tested by modern rules of evidence, under the charge of a modern intelligent judge, and before an intelligent jury. Let us concede, then, all that can be claimed, that Jesus was crucified, was actually ascertained to be dead, and was placed in a room which had been prepared for a sepulcher. Then let us considsr the fact that the person who is thus proved to hav been killed appears before this jury alive and well. What, we ask, in such a case would be the charge of a modern judge, and what the verdict of a modern jury?

Suppose for instance that in the late Cronin murder case, after the body of the murdered man had been identified, the fact that he had been murdered established, and the parties who committed the murder duly convicted, Dr. Cronin had presented himself before the jury alive and well, would not the verdict hav been acquittal? Would any sane judge listen for a moment to the plea that the murdered man though alive and well to-day was dead yesterday? Is not the fact that a man is alive and well now, with appetite unimpaired, good and sufficient proof, regardless of all testimony to the contrary, that the man has not been dead? In every case where persons hav been convicted and executed for murder, and afterward the parties proved to hav been murdered hav turned up alive, has it not been universally agreed that an injustice has been done, and that the convicted parties were innocent? Yet we hav one hundred and three thousand preachers and priests in this country, making a living on the strength of au alleged murder of a man some nineteen centuries ago, which man, according to their own record, was seen alive and well only a few days after the murder. And not only identified in one case by eleven of the twelve original jurors, and in another case by twelve of the eleven, but also by more than five hundred witnesses at once.

How many thousands of Jews and gentiles hav the Christians killed on account of this alleged murder, and every one of them has remained dead until this day. And, by the way, this is the great objection most of us hav to being killed. We know that we shall remain dead. That is what makes the tragedy of death. Our dear ones never come back. Our aching eyes peer into the darkness in vain until they are blinded with tears. Our ears hav vainly listened to catch the faintest sound that might come back to us out of the eternal silence, until we are persuaded that Job was right when he declared: "They shall never awaken out of their sleep till the heavens be no more."

Let us shed no tears over Gods or men who can be killed and then get up again in a day or two, as little harmed as if just awakened out of a peaceful sleep. If I could be sure of coming to life again, I would not only be willing to die to save the world, but would die a thousand such deaths to giv eternal happiness to one human being.

In giving an account of the crucifixion, the gospel writers made every effort to make it an effectiv tragedy. Jesus is presented to us in abject terror in anticipation of death. He came into the world for the express purpose of dying upon the cross, and realizing that such death was absolutely necessary in order that any of the inhabitants of the world might be saved from eternal agonies; yet, when it comes to the test, he prays God to release him from performing the task which he had been appointed to perform from the foundation of the world. In anticipation of death, in his abject terror, he sweat, as it were, great drops of blood, and cried out on the cross, "My God! my God! why hast thou forsaken me!" Yet what was such a holy terror in anticipation amounted to but very little when he came to realize it. In a few hours he was around again alive and well, with appetite unimpaired, exhibiting the very wounds which it was claimed were mortal, and asking people to stick their fingers into the prints of the nails in his hands and feet, and to thrust their hands into his side and prod around among his vitals, and satisfy themselvs that this was the very wound inflicted by the Roman soldier to make certain that he was dead.

Shakspere knew how to write a tragedy in accordance with the fitness of things. In the climax of the tragedy of "Julius Cæsar," the corpse of Cæsar had the good taste to remain quiet while Mark Antony displayed the wounds made by his cruel assassins. If there be a case in the world where the very nature of things requires a division of labor it is this. But, in the tragedy of the crucifixion, the corpse prances around and displays its own wounds. This is not a tragedy but a farce. Yet, in the presence of their own dead, who never come back, the whole world, for over eighteen centuries, hav been called upon to shed their choicest tears on account of the death of a man who, it is claimed, only staid dead one day and a part of two nights. Ecclesiastical Censorship.

From the Westminster Review.

From the introduction of printing down to the close of the sixteenth century the action of the church in the matter of press censorship was local. Although Sixtus issued orders from Rome, they were not general orders, but applicable only to such narrow jurisdictions as that of Cologne University. The popes had not yet acted in their capacity as heads of the universal church. But after the opening of the sixteenth century a change took place. The popes began to take universal action in the matter of press censorship. In the year 1501 Alexander VIII. published his bull, "Inter Multiplices." The most remarkable points in this bull are, first, the confirmation of the doctrin that an ecclesiastical imprimatur is necessary. Archbishops, especially those of Cologne, Magdeburg, Trier, and Mainz, are to see that no books are printed in their provinces without their imprimatur, which is to be granted gratis. Second, the censorial powers of the archbishops may be delegated to vicars-general, and to experts. Third, the scope of the censorship is confined to questions of what is orthodox fidei contrarium; questions of public or private morality are not apparently included; the jurisdiction is to extend over corporations, universities, and colleges; the penal powers include ecclesiastical censure, destruction of books, and fines, for the enforcement of which the censors are to seek the aid of the secular arm.

The next important step in the growth of the ecclesiastical press censorship is marked by the Lateran council. Leo X., in 1515, published his bull, "Inter Solicitudines," by which the machinery of the imprimatur was still further organized. The necessity for an imprimatur is enforced, but it is provided now, for the first time, that in Rome they shall be obtained from the apostolic vicar and the magister sacri Palatii, the official who continued to be the responsible censor of books in the papal states; outside Rome the ordinary or his delegates are the proper sources of imprimaturs. The penalties remain, as in "Inter Multiplices," fines and destruction of books. In Rome the pecuniary penalties are designed to the building fund of the Prince of the Apostles. Neither in the bull of Alexander nor in that of Leo is there any mention of the inquisitor who subsequently played such an important part as censor of the press. The Inquisition which then existed was the old Dominican Inquisition. The new Inquisition, devised by Caraffa, had not yet been thought of. The papal attack on Luther and Lutheran writings became more definit in 1520, when Leo published his bull "Exurge," condemning as heretical forty-one propositions, and entailing excommunication, latæ sententiæ, on all who taught or defended them. And Luther's name was added to the commination list of the In Cœna Domini, by Hadrian VI., in 1524.

Saints and Martyrs.

At the beginning of the present century large numbers of unthinking Christians, following in the wake of the popular teachings of Paley's "Evidences," professed to believe that large numbers of early Christians died "in attestation of the accounts which they delivered." And it is also claimed, on behalf of these supposed early martyrs to the Christian faith, that they were "original witnesses of the Christian miracles." But some Infidels pointed out that martyrdom only proves the sincerity of the individual martyr, and not the truth of the "accounts which they delivered." Every religion has had its martyrs, and if Christianity is true on account of its martyrs, then every other creed is true on account of its martyrs! But as the truth of one creed proves the others untrue, it follows that the vast majority hav died in vain. But the living representativs of every creed are quite sure their martyrs hav died for truth, and not belief; that their martyrs were honest and sincere in their belief; and they are quite certain their creed is the true one. This is evidently the opinion of a writer of a series of articles in the Newbery House Magazine. For all his martyrs are men and women of his own creed, and all are "saints" in the Christian church. Of some of the "saints" whose names are given, their very existence is most doubtful. This writer, when dealing with S. Cecilia, admits that very little is known of her, and that a plentiful supply of legend has gathered around her name. It is also admitted that even the very dates vary according to the different accounts. But that is a small matter. If martyrs are in demand, and are not forthcoming, then numbers might be manufactured for the glory of God. Mrs. Besant, speaking of Christianity in the ninth century, says: "We note during this century a remarkable growth of saints. Everyone wanted a saint through whom to approach God, and supply kept pace with the demand. This preposterous multiplication of saints was a new source of abuses and frauds. It was thought necessary to write the lives of these celestial patrons, in order to procure for them the veneration and confidence of a deluded multitude; and hence lying wonders were invented, and all the resources of forgery and fable exhausted to celebrate exploits which had never been performed, and to perpetuate the memory of holy persons who had never existed" (Freethinkers' Text-Book, p. 449).

For hundreds of years Christians hav preached doctrins of love and mercy, but what hav their practices been? Their practices hav belied even the best portions of their teachings, and the long roll of their murdered martyrs stands as a monument of Christian love and mercy. Their love has been hate; and their mercy has deluged the world in blood. How true are Byron's lines when applied to the Christians of yesterday:

> Thy love is lust, thy friendship all a cheat,
> Thy smiles hypocrisy, thy words deceit!
> By nature vile, ennobled but by name,
> Each kindred brute might bid thee blush for shame.

"By their fruits," said Christ, "ye shall know them." We accept the test, and apply it to those who profess his creed. Some of the fruits of Christianity are seen in her saints and martyrs.

Nottingham, England. Robt. J. Murray.

A Good Man and a Freethinker Gone.

Died.—At his home in Eaton Rapids, Mich., Aug. 31, 1890, Aldro Atwood, after an illness of several months.

Deceased was born in Watertown, N. Y., Dec. 22, 1820, and had been a resident of Eaton county since 1842, when he came to Eaton Rapids, where he lived six years, after which he moved to a farm in Brookfield, remaining there until 1882, when he moved with his family to Eaton Rapids, where he lived to the time of his death. He was well known in the county and highly esteemed by all who knew him. Not a word of suspicion or dishonor was ever breathed against his character. His name was a synonym for honesty and purity and he will be missed by many outside of immediate friends. He leaves a wife and two young lady daughters to mourn the loss of a noble husband and father.

The funeral was held at the house on Wednesday. At his request none but Freethinkers presided at the funeral. Appropriate remarks regarding his life and character were made by his warm personal friend, Mr. Homer Potter, of Eaton Rapids, and at the request of the oldest daughter Mr. J. H. Burnham, of Saginaw, Mich., gave an address.

The address of L. K. Washburn, in the Boston Investigator of November 5th, to the memory of Horace Seaver, was just as appropriate to the memory of Aldro Atwood, not a word too much in praise. "He was sound mentally and morally, and could not be made to see right in wrong," Mr. Washburn says.

For years he was an agent for The Truth Seeker, having met Mr. D. M. Bennett at Jackson, Mich., in his trip around the world. He was glad to extend what help he could in raising the monument to D. M. Bennett, in the advancement of the sheet that he started.

The monument to the memory of the deceased is the good works and deeds left behind.

Must not men be animated by a great principle who successfully transform the primeval American solitudes into an abode of civilization, who are not dismayed by gloomy forests, or rivers, or mountains, or frightful deserts, who push their conquering way in the course of a century across a continent, and hold it in subjection? Let us contrast with this the results of the invasion of Mexico and Peru by the Spaniards, who in those countries overthrew a wonderful civilization, in many respects superior to their own—a civilization that had been accomplished without iron and gunpowder. The Spaniards ruined all that the aboriginal children of America had accomplished. Millions of those unfortunates were destroyed by their cruelty. Nations that for many centuries had been living in contentment and prosperity, under institutions shown by their history to be suitable to them, were plunged into anarchy; the people fell into a baneful superstition, and a greater part of their landed and other property found its way into the possession of the Roman church.—Professor Draper.

What They Say About the Picture Book.

From the Milwaukee Freidenker.

It is a splendid work that the Truth Seeker Company here has given us. Never were the foolishness, the cruelty, and the evil done by the church and her dogmatic scheme better illustrated than by these pictures. Several of them are very comical and must provoke the laughter even of the most firm believer in Christianity, while others bring forward a graver or tragic scene. All the pictures are tasteful and well executed. The book contains three hundred and sixty-seven pages, and is made up in the following manner: On every second page is a picture, while upon the opposit page are printed citations from the works of eminent thinkers, scientists, and writers, as well as statistics, all of which are related to the picture and explain the same. For instance, the picture on page 35 represents the change that the Bartholdi statue will possibly undergo when we are governed by the Catholic church. The left half of the picture shows us a true copy of the statue of Liberty on Bedloe's island, in the port of New York. Under this picture stand the words: "The price of liberty is eternal vigilance." The right half of the picture shows us the transformation of the statue to a monument of the pope. In the place of the goddess of Liberty we see the figure of the Roman pontiff, who in his right hand holds up the cross, while in his left is placed a prayer-book. Night and darkness cover the surrounding country; the base of the masonry is converted into dungeons for heretics. Under this picture stand the words: "The price of popery is eternal slavery." On the opposit page we find quotations from Dr. Thomas Cooper, Shakspere, Robert G. Ingersoll, and Walt Whitman. The quotation from Cooper is: "If the people do not keep the clergy under control, they will bring the people into abject slavery and keep them there. In every nation upon earth they hav done so; what should change their character here?" Among the quotations from Ingersoll we mention the following: "What light is to the eyes, what love is to the heart, liberty is to the soul of man. . . . Liberty is the condition of progress. Without liberty, there can be no civilization. . . . Without liberty of thought, no human being has the right to form a judgment. . . . Without liberty there can be no such thing as conscience, no such word as justice."

The Picture Book, Bound in Cloth, $2.50.

Many purchasers of the "Freethinker's Pictorial Text-Book" having expressed a desire for a cloth binding for it, we hav arranged to satisfy the demand, and for an additional fifty cents will send it in silk cloth, gold and black lettering. In either style of binding it is the cheapest book for the money among Freethought publications. It is also one of the very best.

The Crying Need of Separating Church and State.

The proposition made in the Kentucky constitutional convention to tax all property led the Louisville Courier-Journal to figure out how it would affect that city. It found that exempted property of one kind and another equaled in value the taxed property, and that if impartial taxation were enforced the tax rate could be reduced from $1.98 to .98, and the burden distributed more equally upon the people. The church property paying no share of tax amounts to about one-seventh of the whole. From the list given we extract the following:

Baptist churches	$ 493,146

This same question of the practical union of church and state, though in another form, is also agitating the people of California. A journal in San Francisco has taken the trouble to compile the amounts of money given to private church institutions by that state since 1850. It has for the past fifteen years been a steadily increasing sum, and the number of church institutions has also steadily increased. Beginning in 1850 with the modest amount of $8,387.30, it rose to $489,980.37 in 1889. Of this amount Roman Catholic institutions absorb about seven-tenths. In 1891 the amount of money necessary to cover the "perpetual" provision for these institutions will, according to the Standard's estimate, be $975,000.

Such figures show more eloquently than words the need of a system of impartial taxation, and of separating church and state. As it is now the poor hav to bear the burden, paying higher rents, higher prices for food, and more for clothing, because owners of productiv property hav to pay all the taxes to protect the churches and support the inmates of their institutions, and necessarily add it to the prices of houses to liv in and stores in which goods are sold.

Human selfishness and greed make great trouble in this world; but in none are they so inconsistent with profession as in the hypocritical followers of a religious enthusiast who had no home to go to and not much respect for persons who had.

A Loss and a Gain.

It is said that there is no great loss without some small gain, and this may be the result of Tammany Hall's recent triumph in this city. As our readers know, the People's Municipal League—a combination of County Democrats, Republicans, and Mugwumps—which opposed Tammany, had a clerical committee attachment which it seems expected to run the city had the combination been successful. One of these clericals expressed his sentiments to a World reporter just previous to election, and among the "reforms" which the minister expected to inaugurate was "Sabbath" observance. "The Sabbath," said this clerical politician, "should be what it was intended it should be when the Lord designated it as a day of rest. It should be on earth a type of the eternal Sabbath to come, and nothing should be permitted which would in any way interfere with the contemplation of the life hereafter." Further, he said, he should want all trains taken off on Sunday, no post-office open, no Sunday newspaper, "in short, everything that is in any way likely to turn attention from religious thoughts and disturb the absolute quiet and peace of the Lord's day should be stopped by the law."

This was a large program that the clericals had laid out for themselvs and its publication fully justifies what we said last summer, that the "good" these people would do, if they could get hold of the city government, would be to put their friends in office, giv all the money they could to the Protestant churches, and shut New York up from Saturday night to Monday morning so tight that even prayer wouldn't open it.

Whatever sins Tammany Hall has—and they are so numerous that we hav not space to enumerate them—"Sabbath" observance is not one of them. The Catholic church, of which Tammany Hall is the political expression, is not in favor of rigid Sunday keeping. If it were, it would lose many more of its victims, and the church knows it. Besides, the church knows that it alone made the day to be used for its own advantage, and that even were the Christian scheme of religion true, there is nothing sacred or divine about Sunday.

But a good result of the publication of the clerical program was that it served to bring out the daily papers on the side condemnatory of the clerical utterance. Of Dr. Elmendorf's definition of what the "Sabbath" should be according to scripture, the World said: "It would puzzle Dr. Elmendorf to find the passage in scripture in which Sunday is designated as a Sabbath or even as a day of rest, or in which there is the remotest suggestion of obligation to observe the day as such, while if the obligation be inferred from the Old Testament command to observe Saturday in that way it is difficult to see why the other ceremonial observances of Old Testament prescription are not equally binding." And to the other points of the clerical program the World was equally opposed. Our republic, it said, "is a purely secular state, which has nothing whatever to do with Sabbaths and holy days except to protect every citizen in his right to observe such of them as his faith requires, in the way his conscience commands. Beyond that, under our system, the state has neither obligation nor right to go. As to Dr. Elmendorf's right to regard Sunday as a Sabbath which men are under divine command to observe with great strictness, there is not one word to be said. That is his right as an American citizen. But there are many American citizens who do not at all accept that view. Are not their rights as sacred as his? Would it be fair for him and those who agree with him, even if they were in the majority, to compel all the rest of their fellow-citizens to be bound by conscientious scruples not their own? Is that the liberty of which St. Paul speaks? Is it just, or right, or tolerant? The whole spirit of our institutions, at any rate, forbids. With Sunday as a legal holiday the law rightfully concerns itself, as it does with other legal holidays. It properly secures every citizen in his right to observe the day as his conscience may direct. Further than that the law cannot go without flagrant violation of the fundamental principle of equal right and liberty. In certain particulars the Sunday laws actually violate that principle. They are survivals from an intolerant earlier time when liberty was very imperfectly understood, and the Sunday law reform needed in our time is the repeal of all laws on the subject which are out of harmony with right and justice and personal liberty."

These are bold and true words, and show that the Sabbatarians are not to hav things all their own way. And though it seems an anomaly that the Catholic church, which has been the greatest enemy of liberty, should now stand as its champion against its rival sect, it is easily explained by another saying that when rogues fall out honest men get their due. Tammany represents all that is vile in politics, but the clericals of the People's Municipal League would hav been no great improvement.

"A Startling Fact."

About the middle of last month Morris Stein, a Hebrew, married Annie Eichert, a Catholic, at Camden, N. J. After the marriage the woman's parish priest interfered, drove her from her husband, and declared that the marriage was not legal and would not be recognized by the church. The husband brought suit in a Philadelphia court to recover his wife.

"Marriage in this state," said Judge Hare, in postponing his decision, "cannot be annulled by any church, and before I decide this case I want to hav that priest here and learn if he has used such language toward this young woman as would induce her to leave her husband."

The Philadelphia Daily News, commenting upon the case, says: "It is a startling fact that the Catholic church does not recognize the law either in this state or in New Jersey, and that it deludes many of its members into the false and ridiculous belief that a legal marriage is not a legal marriage. When it comes to ignoring the law, any 'church' deserves heavy censure and punishment. And any priest will get both punishment and censure—if justice is done—who in these United States attempts to override the Constitution and the statutes."

Of course it is startling, but nevertheless it is a fact known to everyone who takes the pains to inquire into the deviltry constantly being perpetrated by the Roman Catholic church, that that organization considers itself superior to the state in dealing with its members. It is not so very long ago that a priest in New Jersey married a girl, was deposed from his church, then left his wife and was received back, his marriage "annulled" by the ecclesiastical authorities, and after some months spent in "retreat" the absconding scoundrel was declared again a priest and a celibate!

School Children Turned Away.

We intend to continue to call attention to the glaring wrong done the children of New York city, and through them done as well to civilization, by the failure to giv them accommodation in the public schools. The provisions for them hav fallen short every year for a long time, to a degree that excludes on the average fifteen thousand applicants. This continues despite annual protests of all the citizens of intelligence and foresight; and those who perpetuate it are the politicians, in great part Irish Roman Catholic and not in part but entirely subservient to Roman Catholic desires. Of the children excluded, some turn to parochial schools and some enter none. The public school is universally acknowledged to be one of the greatest safeguards of society not only through its furnishing youth with information but also through its keeping them from idleness and the vicious habits to which idleness in cities almost irresistibly tends. It is in the most densely populated quarters of New York that crime and vice most abound, and it is just here that the schools are kept so inadequate. The action of the citizens in leaving open the avenues of crime and closing those of education and self-help, is in part to be censured as extraordinary stupidity and lack of foresight, and in part to be execrated as one feature of that opposition to the public school system which is writing Roman Catholics into the pages of our history as traitorous and infamous.

The Rev. Mr. T. P. Stevenson.

At a National Reform convention in Columbia county, Pa., the Rev. T. P. Stevenson spoke upon "The Secular Theory of Education." This theory he characterized as un-American, unphilosophical, and unfair. It is un-American because, he said, it would put the school out of harmony with American institutions. As long as we hav Christian laws on our statute-books, such as our Sabbath laws and the laws against blasphemy, the schools should train the rising citizens to obey these laws; as long as the oath is an essential in our government, the school should teach the citizen to reverence an oath. The Secular theory is unphilosophical because the education it would furnish would be partial and incomplete. It would provide no education for the moral faculties, which are the most important faculties of the human mind, because they are the regulativ faculties. And this theory, though advocated on the ground of fairness, is unfair, because the neutrality which it proposes in matters of religion is impossible. The prohibition of the Bible from the schoolroom discredits the Bible. The refusal to teach any religious idea discredits these ideas as being untrue, or uncertain, or of no value for the purposes of the state.

The Rev. T. P. Stevenson should recollect a few things which he appears to hav forgotten.

He should remember that "this government is in no sense founded on the Christian religion."

He should remember that Sunday laws and blasphemy laws are the un-American part of our legislation, and they must be repealed instead of the children being educated to obey them.

He should remember that oaths are not essential to government, as affirmation is just as good, and for that no reverence is necessary.

He should remember that it is no part of the state's duty to teach any religion, and that if religion is necessary to a complete education it is the parent's duty to supply it.

He should remember that religion is no part of morality, which should be and is taught without inculcating religious dogmas.

He should remember that if religion is discredited when the Bible is not read in schools, it is also discredited when anything else is done without reference to it; and that it is no more the business of the state to accredit Christianity than it is to accredit Mohammedanism or Atheism.

And finally, he should remember that honesty of statement of premises is essential to a right understanding of the argument.

An Erroneous Conclusion.

The Sun says: "The American Baptist Congress is in session in New Haven; the Episcopal Church Congress is in session in Philadelphia; the Inter-State Congress of the Salvationists is in session in this city, and we hav recently had reports of other religious congresses. The spirit displayed by these representativ bodies, and the work done by them, do not giv encouragement to the anti-religionists."

The Sun is in error in its last statement. The "anti-religionists" hav been greatly encouraged by the numerous Christian conventions and congresses and conferences of the past year, as almost without an exception they hav been occupied in eliminating the foolishly absurd and false dogmas of their creeds, thereby reducing the amount of religion in the world.

Take the absurd, the foolish, the impossible, the false from the Christian scheme, and what is there left? Nothing but an imperfect system of ethics for which the anti-religionists can easily provide a better substitute.

Editorial Notes.

THE Canadian government officials of Napanee hav seized a copy of "The Freethinkers' Pictorial Text-Book" sent to a Liberal of that town. What the allegation against it is we hav not yet learned, but we suppose it to be Blasphemy!

A RESIDENT of New Mexico writes us that the defeat of the proposed new constitution of that would-be state was due to its partial provisions for taxation. It exempted church property and taxed the gross output of the mines, thus placing heavy burdens upon the industry of the territory and taking them from idle and useless property. But the people wouldn't hav it!

THE Ministerial Association of Toronto has been discussing the exemption from taxation of the churches. Only three ministers were in favor of doing justice, and Secular Thought says that if the citizens desire justice they will hav to force it by their own strength, rather than wait till the clericals see fit to obey their supposed-to-be master's order to "Render unto Cæsar the things that be Cæsar's."

MR. CHARLES WATTS evidently thinks the eight-hour question one of great importance, for he is reprinting in Secular Thought the debate on the subject between H. M. Hyndman, Socialist, and Charles Bradlaugh, Secularist, which took place in London last summer. As both gentlemen are extraordinarily able men, the advocates of socialism and individualism will find in this discussion the best to be said on both sides.

IN his lecture in this city last week, African Explorer Stanley said that the nativs he met in Africa might be described as big people and little people, tall people and pigmies. They evidently did not belong to Mr. Stanley's church, for he calls them the lowest of the human race—as they had no idea of a God. Mr. Stanley will probably be taken to task by his Christian friends for saying this, as it is one of the Theist's assertions that no people, however low, ever existed who had not some idea of a supreme ruler.

MR. LYMAN C. HOWE seems to be as awry in his reasoning upon evolution as in his statements regarding media. In his spiritual speech at Adelphi Hall last Sunday night he said that Nature started out to perfect the universe as a man goes into the woods, ax on shoulder, to build a house; that law alone did not suffice, but must be guided by "intelligent energy," as a man plans to achieve objects. This intelligent energy, said Mr. Howe, shaped things "out of the primeval pools of chaos," and made man from "preëxisting man or spirit of man." No wonder Mr. Howe places the responsibility for his utterances upon spirits and speaks in a trance!

IT is cheering to know that Birchall, who committed a peculiarly atrocious murder last summer and was hanged for it last week in Woodstock, Ont., experienced religion, and that the Rev. Mr. Wade, his "spiritual adviser," was heard to express the opinion that he was perfectly satisfied as to Birchall's sincerity. There was another scamp hanged somewhere in the Southwest the week before who also went directly to Jesus because of the atonement. Probably Birchall has met him by this time, and perhaps they are plotting to kill a few angels for the feathers in their wings. The Christian scheme is a beautiful and most satisfactory one for scoundrels!

THE Radical Club of this city has formed a "Vera Sassulitsh Aid Committee" to assist a Russian young lady of that name who is in distress. The committee say: "An appeal that should leave no freedom-loving heart untouched, reaches us from across the sea. Vera Sassulitsh, the Russian heroin of liberty, is seriously ill and destitute in her exile. Her physicians advise her a sojourn on the seashore in a sunny climate, but the unselfish and indefatigable worker for the cause of the Russian people is too poor to bear the expense, and her friends in Europe are equally poor. We now ask generous Americans to come to the rescue, by subscribing, according to their means, on behalf of the noblest of Russian soldiers of liberty." The sub-committee soliciting this aid contains the names of Mrs. H. O. Pentecost, Mrs. James Redpath, Miss Leubuscher, and T. B. Wakeman. Communications should be addressed to Moses Oppenheimer, 9 St. Mark's place, New York city.

AN item of the last election only now brought to our notice was thus graphically told by the Herald:

"Isaac Isaacs, who resides at No. 309 West 134th street, attempted to register at No. 2,555 Eighth avenue, the sixty-third election district of the nineteenth assembly district, on October 25th, but he did not succeed. He declined to take off his hat, maintaining that he believed in the Jewish religion, which does not require the uncovering of the head while taking the oath. The inspectors of election refused to accept his name. Judge Ingraham granted a mandamus requiring the board to register Mr. Isaacs."

Not only are the Jews exempt from making any superstitious movements in performing what is only a civil duty, but so are all other people, if they will insist upon affirming. The Editor of THE TRUTH SEEKER registered this year with hat on and hands down, and the registration officers said not a word.

THE clergy of Omaha, Nebraska, met with disaster in their attempt to supervise the voting in that city on the 4th instant. The Nebraska Christian Advocate reports that "the Rev. A. W. Clark, of the Calvary Baptist church, was rotten-egged at the fourth precinct of the sixth ward. Rev. Ostrohom, of the Swedish Lutheran church, was pelted with rotten eggs and driven from the third precinct of the eighth ward, and threatened with his life if he returned. At the second precinct of the same ward Rev. H. A. Crane, of Seward street Methodist Episcopal church, was attacked by a ruffian named Herold in the presence of the police and ballots torn from his hand, the police refusing to arrest. Rev. J. Q. Shinn, of the Universalist church, was knocked down and beaten. Ministers were insulted on every hand." We are not told what the ministers had done to deserve such treatment, but the probable cause of it was that they endeavored to run the election in favor of Prohibition. The Advocate now thinks it plain "to all students of political economy that in this country, and especially with our larger cities, municipal government is a failure." But we will wager a small sum that every one of those eggs was thrown by a Christian.

BEFORE the election in Wisconsin we had occasion to rebuke Congressman Mills of Texas for his intemperate abuse of Colonel Ingersoll in a speech against the Bennett law. We are glad to print, even thus late, that there are Democrats who were equally disgusted with his bathos over the public schools. In a speech on the same subject delivered in Milwaukee, the Hon. Charles W. Felker rebuked Mr. Mills in these words: "And so the pious soul of Apostle Mills revolts at the bare thought that his child be taught 'reading, writing, arithmetic, and United States history' for twelve weeks in a year by Colonel Ingersoll. Colonel Ingersoll, who is as far his superior in intellect and scholarship as civilization is superior to barbarism. Colonel Ingersoll, whose great heart goes out to the oppressed and downtrodden of every nation as a great river goes to the sea. Colonel Ingersoll, whose burning words for the liberty of mankind hav made angels pause, while cherubim and seraphim played sweet accompaniment to his golden speech on golden harps. And yet, according to the Mills plan of education, this cultured, brainy man, with a heart as tender as a woman's, is not fit to hear the Mills family recite the multiplication table. Thank God, I liv in a state where such a spirit of bigotry and intolerance does not prevail, where men and women are not ostracised and outlawed because of a religious belief, where teachers are not compelled to submit to examination in the Mills theory of education."

THE way the opponents of the Bennett law won in Wisconsin is thus described by a Western paper: Catholic priests, noticeably the Poles, busied themselvs in directing their countrymen and co-religionists how to vote. In the sixth ward of Milwaukee twenty-three Capuchin monks, headed by a father guardian, directed the members of their congregations how to cast their ballots. By some curious political legerdemain, Catholic and Lutheran clergymen—Dutch, Irish, and Poles—had busied themselvs in endeavoring to defeat the Bennett School law, because it is endeavoring to enforce free non-sectarian education in the public schools. Political meetings hav been held in both Lutheran and Romish churches for the purpose of instructing their members how to vote, and so ignorant were the voters that for security they were directed to hav nothing to do with ticket-peddlers, and while they would accept votes, they would use none of them as ballots, except such as were provided by their pastors. At nearly every polling-place a Lutheran school-teacher was stationed to see that their people did not allow themselvs to be persuaded to accept tickets from Republican peddlers. In Chicago, on the other hand, the Catholic element was defeated. A Mrs. Mulligan was nominated by the Democracy for superintendent of schools. Mrs. Mulligan is a Catholic, and her opponent, Albert B. Lane, a Protestant. The public school question as against the parochial school question, was the political issue; Mrs. Mulligan was in favor of parochial schools; Mr. Lane favored non-sectarian free schools, and the issue created great interest and brought forth a large vote. It is stated that in no election for years hav so many members of the richer classes and prominent business men voted as on this occasion. The Patriotic Sons of America turned out en masse, party politics were discarded, and the ticket composed in equal parts of Democrats and Republicans. The result was a defeat for the parochial system of education. And if the signs of the times are not very misleading a great many more elections will be decided by the school issue within the next few years."

Letters from Friends.

OKETO, KAN., Nov. 4, 290.

MR. EDITOR: I received the "Pictorial Text-Book" to-day, and am highly pleased with it. I am soliciting subscribers for it. To-day is election day here, and I find a great many think it superb, etc. JAMES BIGHAM.

MONTGOMERY, ALA., Nov. 3, 1890.

MR. EDITOR: I need THE TRUTH SEEKER for missionary work in this strictly orthodox community. The reverend blackguard Sam Jones has just terminated a ten days' tussle with Satan under a big tent seating five thousand saints and sinners, with no tangible results except carrying off $2,000 of "filthy lucre." In that direction he is a great success.

Yours truly, JESSE HOOKER.

GLEN CITY, PA., Nov. 10, 1890.

MR. EDITOR: I hav considerable fun showing the "Freethinker's Text-Book." One day as I had the book there came a Catholic woman and asked me, "What book is that?" I showed it to her, and she did not look at many pictures until she got raving mad and told me that the editor of that book ought to be torn to pieces, and if she had the power she would hang every Infidel in the world. I told her, "When you giv a dog a kick he will yelp." G. B. DREISBACH.

FORT WORTH, TEX., Nov. 4, 1890.

MR. EDITOR: I am doing all I can to procure subscribers for your paper. If ever a town needed a free distribution of Freethought literature or the presence of a good lecturer, this is the town. It is overrun badly with incubators of superstition, and spook-houses, etc., called churches. But school-houses are sadly neglected. I forwarded to you a few copies of Fort Worth papers which will giv you some idea of the workings of the temples of superstition at this place. Wishing your paper success, I am,

Yours for liberty, ISAAC E. CRUM.

CLEARWATER, NEB., Nov. 1, E.M. 290.

MR. EDITOR: I am truly glad to see in the "Letters from Friends" a kind and considerate word from Fanny Day on behalf of that friend of humanity, Prof. J. H. Cook, of Columbus, Kan. The world is swinging along in the right direction when the new recruits come to the fore in this matter of taking care of the veterans. It is better than to listen to pretty stories of storks helping and feeding the old and disabled parents. My best thanks are due Fanny Day, and I know many will echo this sentiment. Let the young people, and the old folks too, remember poor old R. M. Casey, of Five Forks, S. C. Both of these Freethought soldiers need help now that winter approaches.

MARY BAIRD FINCH.

ROSLYN, WASH., Oct. 20, 1890.

MR. EDITOR: Inclosed find $3.75, for which send books to the party addressed in list inclosed. Mr. Remsburg, who was expected here, has treated the Liberals here to a huge iceberg of disappointment by sending me a notice on the 15th inst. from Slaughter, Wash., stating that it would be impossible to reach us this trip, as it would require him to make a special trip of two hundred miles. If Mr. Remsburg had given me a timely notice and asked to giv a course of lectures, it would hav been accepted; and I believe that I could hav sent you an order of about $25 for books and subscribers to THE TRUTH SEEKER, and it would not hav taken much harping to do it. But as it is the attempt to go marching down through Georgia has not been accomplished, and as I do not intend to stay here much longer, I shall not make any further attempt. HENRY BEIOHLING.

RIDGEWAY, N. Y., Nov. 9, 1890.

MR. EDITOR: I write to giv a hearty second to the motion of J. H. Guthrie, in his letter dated October 10th, viz.: "That you appoint a committee from among the intelligent Freethinkers of the United States to prepare an outline of constitution and by-laws to govern such a society [viz., a Liberal organization], and submit the same to the readers of your paper." I am only a new subscriber to your paper, and am much interested in the advancing strides of Liberal thought. It seems that the times are ripe for organized effort by Liberals in carrying forward their efforts to enlighten a superstition-ridden world. Let us rally and mass together, form in line and attack the defenses of error and superstition and carry them by assault. As many as are in favor of Mr. Guthrie's motion, say aye. Communicate your answer by postal to THE TRUTH SEEKER by next mail.

NEWARK, N. J., Nov. 9, 1890.

MR. EDITOR: In looking over THE TRUTH SEEKER of last week, I saw a letter from Mr. Longford, of Friendship League, Philadelphia, giving an account of the lectures delivered before that body by Miss Ada Campbell, of Australia. My object in writing to you to-day is to add my testimony to that of Mr. Longford, in favor of Miss Campbell, who spoke before this League this afternoon to a crowded house, and who, if we can judge by the enthusiastic applause of the audience, has certainly demonstrated her great ability as an orator. Perhaps if I should say that we are endeavoring to secure Miss Campbell again for next Sunday, it would seem sufficient evidence that we all appreciated her talent and ability. I hope you will publish this, so that other societies will not fail to avail themselvs of the opportunity to listen to this talented lady. With best regards,

CHARLES C. SOHMITT, Secretary Newark Liberal League.

LEXINGTON, ILL., Oct. 30, 1890.

MR. EDITOR: I received the picture book, and I think it is worth double the amount paid for it, and so I am trying to sell a few for you. Please find inclosed $2 for another "Freethinker's Pictorial Text-Book." I will giv you the names of a few people here who are nearly if not altogether Freethinkers in principle, and I think if you would send them a sample copy of your paper they might be induced to take it and thereby great good be the result. I love your paper very much. And also I would like to be able to attend some lectures, but there do not seem to be any very near me. I would contribute considerable to hav a lecture in this city this winter. There has been quite an awakening going on here, and several hav left the churches and declared in favor of intellectual freedom.

I am getting names to the petition to hav the World's Fair open on Sundays. Sunday is the only day I can go, as I am a telegraph operator, and work every day from 9 A.M. to 2 P.M.

Hoping I may see a society of Freethinkers in this place, I am, Respectfully, H. COONS.

NORTH BENTON, O., Nov. 8, 1890.

MR. EDITOR: I cannot do without THE TRUTH SEEKER. The first paper inquired for is THE TRUTH SEEKER, and the pictures are the first things looked at. They are a valuable addition to the paper, and should be printed in book form. I show them to my Presbyterian brethren. We liv in a fiduciary neighborhood of Presbyterians who depend for salvation on faith without works, for their works would damn them. Their preachers and some of their members, with their elastic religion and elastic testimony, excuse one of their members for putting his property in his father's name and running away, and leaving an invalid wife and minor children without the necessaries of life on the cold charities of the world. They hav to be supported by the charities of those neighbors who are not Christians by profession. But it is no wonder when we think where they get their teachings from—the Bible, interpreted by John Calvin. And as for Calvin, the story of Michael Servetus is enough to stamp the arch would-be reformer with infamy. It makes the blood chill to think of the cruelties committed in the name of Christianity. CHESTER BEDELL.

PORTSMOUTH, O., Nov. 3, 1890.

MR. EDITOR: In thinking over the proceedings of the Secular Union at Portsmouth and noting the highly moral tone of all the speakers, I began to think that the word "Secular" hardly indicated the true character of the society, and it struck me forcibly that Secular Moralists would be a better name and indicate the true character of the society much better. The word "Secular" may be made to stand for almost anything, and givs our enemies a good chance to misrepresent us, but with "Moralist" added it would be different. When we were represented as immoral people, the people would take it with a great deal of allowance, and would wonder that an immoral society should take the name of "Moralists," and they would inquire into the facts. To "Secular" might be added Anarchists, libertins, devils, or any other evil name, and it would not be a contradiction of terms. This idea forced itself on me the morning after the convention adjourned, and I place it on record for the consideration of the officers and members of the Secular Union, to be acted upon at the next meeting of the Congress if you please to publish it. JOHN DOWNES.

PORTVILLE, N. Y., Nov. 6, 1890.

MR. EDITOR: The picture book came all right, and it is a good one. I hav set it on mission work amongst the heathens already.

Here is a bit of news from the Oswego Valley Mail:

Rev. E. S. Wilcox, formerly pastor of the Methodist Episcopal church at Shingle House, Potter county, Pa., has quit preaching and is engaged in taking care of saws in one of McKeon Co.'s big mills. There is considerable difference between preaching for $400 per year and filing saws for $1,000 per year.

I was well acquainted with Mr. Wilcox, and only a few years ago he left a job of filing for $3 per day to work for the Lord. But it appears that the Lord went back on him. Well, I hope he has seen the error of his ways.

He could not be a Talmage
And roam o'er holy land.
He could not be a Moody
And with the people stand.
He could not be a Sam Jones
To rave, to rear, and spout.
He could not be a Sam Small
To make the folks shell out.

Yours for truth, JOHN R. COATS.

DES MOINES, IA., Oct. 28, 1890.

MR. EDITOR: Please find inclosed $4—$2 to apply on subscription, and for the other $2 please send the picture book with blank leaves. I am well pleased with the paper, and especially with Heston's pictures. They are superb. If there is anything that does knock the superstition out of the blind bigots, it is to read THE TRUTH SEEKER and then look at the pictures before going to bed. With two or three doses I warrant a sure cure. The sky-pilots need but to look at King David's pictures to know how it is themselvs. I wish you would prevail on Heston to get us up a family record. I know he can do it. We want one we could frame and hang in our parlor. Let it hav say Bruno's picture at the head margin, Bennett's at the bottom, Ingersoll's and Macdonald's at the sides. This would suit me. It certainly would be the most valuable piece of furniture that could be placed in our homes, and the money for it would be the best-spent money that a man ever spent, rich or poor. Let us hav the record by all means. I would like an expression from all Liberals. I am sure THE TRUTH SEEKER will publish their wishes and views, also that Brother Heston will get up the record if we desire it. CAPT. T. J. KENNEDY.

JOPLIN, MO., Nov. 8, 1890.

MR. EDITOR: It is a matter of great satisfaction to me, as it must be to every true, liberty-loving citizen of the United States, that the results of the present election will cause Mr. Blair, of Sunday Rest bill notoriety, to pack up his gospel traps and decamp from the halls of the national legislature. May he never return to disgrace them any more. We bid Mr. Blair a hearty departure. May he lubricate the axles of his gospel cart with salvation oil, and fill his lamps well with Christian grace, that they be a lamp to his path and a light to his feet while he travels the dark and hideous road of priestcraft and superstition, that will surely carry him far away from humanity and civilization. May he be eminently successful in loading up his gospel garbage. May he be triumphantly successful in barreling up his old coagulated Jesus blood, and load it upon a theological ship and sail far, far away never more to return to engage in a diabolical scheme to try to undermine and sap the foundation of the free and independent United States of America, as secured to us by the life-blood of our forefathers of '76. May the time speedily come when the Christian heaven will be looked upon as a reward for crime and their hell as a scarecrow for intellectual cowards and idiots.

Yours fraternally, DR. F. D. OWEN.

EVANSVILLE, MINN., Oct. 25, 1890.

MR. EDITOR: Inclosed find $3.50—$2 for the "Freethinker's Pictorial Text-Book," and $1.50 for the grand paper.

Here is a story about a Lutheran farmer and a Lutheran preacher. Some of us Liberals had a Unitarian, Rev. Kristofer Janson, of Minneapolis, to speak here. He spoke here September 26th twice, first over the Bible and second over the Gods. A few days before he came, this farmer came in one evening (he knew I was one on the committee), and said to me that I was the most miserable man on earth, who could allow such a bad man and Freethinker to come into town. He jumped on his legs and clapped his hands and swore over me, and said he should do all the harm he could to destroy me. Next day the preacher himself came, called on my principal, and wanted him to stop Mr. Janson from coming. He said, "This is my bread, and if he comes he will destroy it for me." My principal said he could not and would not stop him. On Sunday in his church he preached against him, thus warning his sheep not to go and listen to him. On September 26th people from all surrounding districts came into town and heard Mr. Jamieson, and many orthodox were made skeptics. Mr. Jamieson is a grand speaker. On November 1st he speaks here again. Good wishes to all who are fighting the monster we call superstition. MARTIN GRAU.

GOWER, MO., Oct. 27, 1890.

MR. EDITOR: Governor Ingles is a prominent lawyer of Plattsburg, Mo., and I will tell you how I got him as a subscriber. He was in Gower, where I liv, on legal business, and I had just got THE TRUTH SEEKER out of the office and had read John Peck's conclusion of "The Christian's India Rubber God," when I met with Colonel Algair and Governor Ingles. After the usual salutations, I told them to listen while I read the postscript of John Peck concerning the Christian's india rubber God. They gave audience, and when I was through reading Governor Ingles was captured as a subscriber. Long may Brother Peck liv to wield his brainy pen.

I hav been battling as a Liberal and Secularist in the town of Gower, solitary and alone, for the last ten years. But I am not discouraged, for our cause is of too much importance for us to grow weary in well-doing. What a shame that in this the nineteenth century, when thought is speeding its way like electricity through the heavens, it should be necessary for us to stand upon the walls of liberty and warn the citizens of this republic of the destructiv approach of the orthodox wolves of our land. But how true the expression, "Eternal vigilance is the price of liberty." How I long for the prison doors of the mind to fly wide open and let the intellectual star range co-extensiv with the universe! Oh, the grandeur of Reason, walled by the frontal, parietal, and occipital bones, and lit by the great intellectual star that pervades the universe! J. W. HUTCHISON, M.D.

CANON CITY, COL., Nov. 3, 1890.

MR. EDITOR: I write mainly to indorse the idea of forming a Freethinkers' mutual aid and protection association, and I agree with Mr. Hess's idea that this society should hav a political character—not by forming a new party, but by each member working in his own party, for the nomination and election of officials who he knows will favor the complete separation of the church from the state. More effectiv work can be done in this line than perhaps by any other plan. The exclusivly educational method now being followed up is the foundation of success, but final success cannot be attained except through the law-making and executiv powers of the land; and we ought to begin work to secure at least our share of these powers in all electiv bodies from district school directors up to president.

Now, I want to ask if there is anything published suitable for a Liberal or scientific Sunday-school—something adapted to children particularly. If any of your readers know of such books, papers, or tracts, or of the existence of any such Sunday-school as this, I would like to hear from them. This is another line of work which we ought to inaugurate at once. If there is no line of books and papers for this work, some Liberal of means ought to get one up at as low a price as possible. A course something like this would be suitable: History of events showing the effects of the connection of church and state; comparativ religion; collection of scientific and historical facts showing up the errors of Bibles, and a code of natural morals. This, with tracts and papers containing entertaining stories connected with the work in hand, or containing a moral lesson, would, I think, be about what is needed. It would be so much better to teach our children such things as these than to allow them, as nearly all Liberals do, to go to a church Sunday-school and there get stuffed with a little truth mixed up with a great deal of error and superstition. If the children are taken care of in this respect, they will help wonderfully in the next generation. G. P. BRENE.

DAYTON, O., Nov. 10, 1890.

MR. EDITOR: As I hav been traveling over the world for over fifty years, I hav never had time to become a Christian in the common acceptation of the term. It is true I joined one church here and another there, because it was fashionable. I had no time to think of cause and effect. Indeed, until I got hold of THE TRUTH SEEKER, that great and noble paper, which led me to think and seek the truth, I was satisfied to go to church to hear the music and see the girls, and I am compelled to tell the truth, I never once in my life thought of salvation, but only of love to the female sex.

Of late I hav been bothered to death by an ignorant Methodist member by the name of Holden, and on every visit he would ask me, "Do you want to be saved?" Being thus provoked by this ignorant man, I replied finally in these words: "If the dogs and wolves and bears would eat me after death, according to your doctrin my spirit would walk out and go across the river Styx. Now, I believe this is the only world where we can enjoy life, and I do not care where my spirit goes. They tell me spirits are flying about, and that they hav been seen in the big Chicago fire dancing and playing all sorts of tricks; that they fly about one's room; that they sit listening to what we say; that they can read and write; that they enjoy their freedom; that if you send for them in America and they are in Europe they will come; that they know your thoughts and mind; and that they are in every church in the world at the same time like the triune God, Christ, Mary, and all the angels. But I do not believe in one of them." In fact, I got so sick and tired of this fool that I begged him to go and read THE TRUTH SEEKER, and inwardly digest it, and if this would not open his mind to conviction, I advised him to go to the insane asylum, where he would find lots of Christians like himself who had lost their senses trying to understand the Bible and its silly, incomprehensible doctrins. On my giving him these words, so ably and so richly supported in THE TRUTH SEEKER, he picked up his hat and flung his body out of my room, and the last words I heard from him were, "The devil!"

Now, I hav only a few words more to say—that I am poor, old, and unable to take THE TRUTH SEEKER, but if I had millions I would send one to the sixty millions of people in the United States and one to every Christian in the world.

FRED ROBERTSON.

MARCELINE, MO., Oct. 31, 1890.

MR. EDITOR: I hav been listening to some more balderdash to-day, and every time I hear it I feel a kind of inspiration urging me to write my opinions, so that others than those whom I come in contact with may read them. It is just as reasonable for me to believe that everything else has always existed in some form as it is to believe that God has always existed. The Christians hav been urging me to believe that God created everything that exists in six days, and that God himself has existed throughout all past time and before there was a time; that he was without beginning or ending. When I ask them where God was during this eternity before the beginning, and what he was doing, they cannot tell me. When I ask them what he is doing now they cannot tell me. And when I intimate that some law or force governing nature is probably all the God there is, they rant and laugh, and ask, "Do you think everything came by chance?" They cannot believe that the earth, sun, moon, and stars, and everything else in nature, has always existed in some form, but they believe a God has existed always in the past, and that after countless ages of dwelling alone (no one knows where) he jumped up and created the world, sun, moon, and stars, and everything that is, in six days, out of nothing. It may be that my reasoning faculties are poor, for I cannot explain how something could be created from nothing. Neither can I tell why the Christians hav not the knowledge to tell me. If Christians know so much of God, Jesus, and the devil, why can they not answer these hard problems? Like the Agnostic, they are necessarily forced to say, "I don't know." Christians detest the works of Voltaire, of Paine, of Ingersoll, and all other books that oppose Christianity. They tell me all books opposed to the Christian belief are untrue, unreasonable. They believe in one book, the Bible, and disbelieve a score of others. They claim their Bible was given of inspiration. They prove it by the book itself, which is the very poorest source to look to for evidence. If the Bible be false, would it not tell a falsehood to establish itself? And if it be true in all respects, would there not be evidence sufficient outside of itself to prove its purity and to convert all the Infidels in the land? The proof does not exist outside the Bible to prove all it says, therefore I cannot believe it to be God's own word. If the fact of the existence of a personal God was established I could not think the Bible his word. And as the fact is not established, I hav no desire to force the belief upon myself. I do not know; how can I know? And to be honest with myself I should not say I know when I do not know. I hav never seen God, neither hav I met any who hav seen him. Therefore is it not more reasonable to say the sun, moon, earth, and stars hav always existed in some form without a God, than to say that there somewhere exists a God when nobody knows where he is? And if he existed from everlasting to everlasting without being made or created, is it not more unreasonable to believe God has always existed? We never hav seen him, but we do behold things existing in nature. And if God could exist without being created, why, the sun, moon, stars, and everything we behold in nature could hav always existed without a creator or God. For it is certain that they do exist, and it is not certain that there is a God. Christians hang their faith on the teachings of the Bible, but when I read it it becomes so terribly absurd; and if it was true God himself for the most of the time is represented as a relentless demon. If I were fully convinced that there is a God, I would honestly be ashamed to accuse him of what the Bible does. Let all Christians ask themselvs this question, who made God? If he always was, may it not be that all things else hav always been, and therefore did not need a creator? And that would do away with the God idea. Christians, if there is a God, say so—then prove it. If, like me, you do not know, be honest with yourselvs and say you do not know.

Yours for liberty and investigation, CHAS. A. GLENN.

PHILADELPHIA, PA., Nov. 10, 1890.

MR. EDITOR: I am very highly pleased to report that our League had the good fortune to hear yesterday two splendid lectures from that intellectual giant, Charles Watts, who in my judgment is the best expounder of Freethought in this country. We had two magnificent audiences at both lectures; in fact, the spacious hall proved entirely too small to accommodate the evening audience, as many could not obtain entrance, but had to be contented to stand outside to hear, which they did for two full hours. The subject of Mr. Watts's discourse in the afternoon was "Labor and Capital from a Secular Standpoint." The lecturer proved to the satisfaction of the vast audience, judging from the frequent applause, that the salvation of the working classes rested with themselvs. At the close of the lecture an Anarchist and a Socialist criticised the lecture. The former thought that while the lecture was good it was not very profound, and the latter thought that the lecturer was behind the age. To those who hav heard Mr. Watts in his closing reply to his critics, it will not be difficult to imagin how easily he demolished them. In fact, as I said before, judging from the frequent applause, the sophistry of Anarchy was never better exposed before to a Philadelphia audience. The Socialist fared a little better, but nevertheless he came in for his share of a good thrashing, as the lecturer showed to the satisfaction of the audience that he, the Socialist, was behind the age, and not the age behind him. The evening's discourse was, "Mind and Matter—Whence comes Intelligence?" Well, to tell you the truth, words cannot express our appreciation of this grand philosophical and scientific discourse, as he left not a shred of ground for the Spiritualist and Materialist to base an argument upon. While listening to it, I could not but help thinking of Baron D'Holbach's "System of Nature," that I read some years ago, and which made me a Materialist, although the lecturer was far in advance of the time in which that work was written, as all know that hav heard Mr. Watts or read his lectures. As the lecturer expected a lively debate to follow, he curtailed his lecture somewhat in order to giv his opponents an opportunity to reply, as the Spiritualists turned out in great numbers to hear a scholar who they knew was not favorable to their doctrin scientifically speaking. The debate that followed was an utter disappointment to the lecturer. Apart from the statement that tables could go around and giv raps when asked to do so, and other similar testimony, it left the speaker without anything to reply to. I will conclude by giving the League's sincere thanks to all those who contributed toward these lectures, thereby making it possible for us to enjoy these intellectual treats. GEO. LONGFORD, Sec.

ELMIRA, N. Y., Oct. 26, 1890.

MR. EDITOR: Please find inclosed remittance which pays for the best, largest, and greatest Liberal educator in the world to Jan. 1, 1892. I also inclose $1 for the Liberal Literature Fund, and if I could afford it, I would send you $100 for this very purpose, for never was it so absolutely necessary as now to disseminate the teachings of Liberalism. It is astonishing to find by talking with nearly all classes how very uninformed they are upon the great questions of the present relativ to state and church. They seem to think that the state and nation are both subservient and must bow in humble submission to the rulings of the church, and that not to acquiesce to her mandates is to commit a terrible crime. They do not seem to be at all cognizant of the fact that the church is marshaling her forces to completely set to naught the liberties of this country. Only a few weeks ago a person said to me, "We should be willing to leave it to the church and her clergy to make our laws, do our thinking, and prescribe to us what is right or wrong." When such utterances as these, and much worse, are spoken and believed in, it reminds us of the very great work yet to be done by the Liberals of this country to awaken thought upon these questions, and the only way to do this is to lay before the great uninformed masses Liberal literature by which the people can learn of the wily machinations of the church being made upon the rights and liberties which we yet enjoy.

It is somewhat discouraging, I say, to behold how very oblivious the people are concerning the results arising from a practical union of church and state. Almost every day can any beholder see disappearing our personal rights, liberties, and privileges, and not one voice is raised for their retention, and unless the people arouse to action and assert their individual rights and bid "Hands off," they will wake up some morning to find themselvs bound hand and foot with chains of church tyranny. That will set them to asking, "When and how did this all happen? How came all this to be? Why is this thus?" When this happens they will only hav themselvs to blame.

In the last TRUTH SEEKER I noticed your urgent appeal in behalf of the World's Fair Sunday opening. I am very busy now, but after January 1st I will hav more leisure, and shall start a petition in this city, using the blank you hav prepared, and see how many signers I can get for Sunday opening. Though in an orthodox and pious city, I believe I can roll up a petition that will be astonishing. We will petition everybody decent, respectable, and intelligent, being Jew, Christian, Infidel, or pagan, layman or clergyman. We think we will send you a petition that will be commendable. L. DEWITT GRISWOLD.

MONTPELIER, IND., Nov. 9, 1890.

MR. EDITOR: C. E. Boynton and others are advocating a secret order of Liberals, an institution that I hope may be constructed to meet a pressing want at the present time. We can see cases of modern religious persecution, from the time of Abner Kneeland to the present, and they are on the increase. Therefore we as reformers need to combine and organize ourselvs to meet the common enemy, the superstitious tyranny of the Christian church. Webster defines superstition, false religion; and the Liberals pronounce the Adam story, the fall of man, and the atonement all false, and a superstition, therefore our persecution.

England has its declaration of rights, adopted in 1689, which says: "It was therefore declared, the power of suspending and of dispensing with laws by regal authority is illegal, that the commissioners for ecclesiastical cause, and all commissions and courts of the like, are illegal." The French passed their Rights of Man bill in 1789, and in 1776 the United States adopted their Declaration that "to secure these rights governments are instituted among men, deriving their just powers from the consent of the governed," all embracing the primary principles of human liberty—which always hav been and still are invaded by religious bigotry and intolerance. Our present political outlook might be compared to a great cavern, and the farther we look within the darker it is. But we can see the Republican party, controled by the evangelical churches and the whisky ring. And the Democratic party, controled by the Catholic church, or the pope and whisky ring. Both parties extend their whole influence to support the moneyed monopolies of the world, expecting to receive the patronage of the money power in return. The situation of the Prohibition party is aptly described by Parker Pillsbury in the Freethinker's Magazine, where he says, "When it married the church and took the name of Christian, with the pompous W. C. T. U. like the A. B. C. F. M. of one of the missionary organizations, I feared for it. But now that it has polygamously wedded itself to the God-in-the-Constitution conspiracy it has been my despair." I look for the new party organized at St. Louis September, 1890, through the alliance of the various labor factions and some of the Prohibitionists, and what do I find? The convention was opened with prayer, and the preamble to the platform commences with, "We recognize the almighty law-giver who decreed the universal brotherhood of man," etc. And then they named it the National Reform party, which has been the name of the God-in-the-Constitution party for the last fifteen years. I take it that the party is sold to the church. Now that your eyes hav become somewhat accommodated to the darkness, look farther in the cavern and see the evangelical Christians as far as possible taking control of the public schools, and demanding that there shall be religious instruction and even catechising of the religious belief of the children. The Catholics use this as a subterfuge for parochial schools. Look farther in and you will see the cavern strewn with the relics of the Inquisition, martyrdoms, and wars of extermination.

We do not want the old story repeated. We need to organize in a way to get all the strength possible. And I feel sure that a secret order is what we need. And we need it not only destructiv but constructiv. It takes hard work to tear down the old building and clear away the old dirty rubbish. But it takes a great deal more work to erect the grand new structure. But if we will build on strictly scientific principles the structure will endure perpetually. All our civilization is the result of strictly scientific development, though it has been badly retarded by unscientific effort. Mathematical knowledge is necessary in measuring the earth or dividing chemical equivalents. We must measure and weigh in developing machinery, tilling the soil, or building and running manufacturing establishments. Astronomy, geography, and navigation must be understood before merchants can transport and distribute the manufactures to feed and clothe mankind. The sciences are not entirely developed, and new discoveries will be made. Revealing nature's laws to man is scientific labor. Living in harmony with the laws of nature is the true moral code. The best interest of mankind as social beings condemns a few monopolizing the necessities and comforts of life, and the many consequently suffering. It condemns licentiousness, and the use of whisky, tobacco, and poison drugs even when used as medicin; and we as philanthropists will not curse posterity by entailing on them such evil practices.

I would favor naming our order Patrons of Science, and making ourselvs truly such. Be bold and independent Freethinkers; but hav the order so secret that if necessary a person might belong and no one hav a knowledge of the fact except members of the order. I would that the women should be encouraged to join, and that they should be eligible to any office in the order. Ignorant, superstitious women are the mainstay to the church, and the remedy is to educate and enlighten them. Let those that are enlightened apply themselvs to the task. Let the children be well cared for.

Yours for Patrons of Science, WM. ALLEN.

Children's Corner.

Edited by MISS SUSAN H. WIXON, Fall River, Mass., to whom all Communications for this Corner should be sent.

"Between the dark and the daylight,
When the night is beginning to lower,
Comes a pause in the day's occupations
That is known as the Children's Hour."

The Bright Side.

If one looks upon the bright side
It is sure to be the right side—
At least that's how I've found it as I've journeyed through each day.
And it's queer how shadows vanish,
And how easy 'tis to banish
From a bright side sort of nature every doleful thing away.

There are two sides to a question,
As we know; so the suggestion
Of the side which holds the sunlight seems most reasonable to me.
And, you know, we can't be merry,
And make our surroundings cheery,
If we will persist in coddling every gloomy thing we see.

There's a sensible quotation
Which will fit in every station—
We all know it: "As the twig is bent, so is the tree inclined."
And the twigs of thought we're bending,
If to ways of gloom we're tending,
Will be pretty sure to twist and dwarf and quite deform the mind.

There's a way of searching over
The wide skies till we discover
Whether storms are on the way, or the weather that we love;
And the blue may fast be hiding
Back of clouds which swift are rising,
Yet we know the blue is shining still, and spreading far above.

And while that will last forever
(For the true blue fadeth never),
The dark clouds must soon or later be dispersed and fade away;
And the sweet, "bright side" still shining
Will meet the eyes inclining
To watch for it and welcome it, however dark the day.

So, my friends, let's choose the bright side,
Just the happy, glorious right side,
Which will giv us health and spirits just as long as life shall last;
And the sorrows that roll o'er us
Shall not always go before us,
If we keep a watch for blue skies, and will hold its sunshine fast. —Mary D. Brine.

Willie's Tears.

Last night 'mid tears, a sorry shower,
Before the peaceful twilight hour,
Was willful Willie put to bed—
"A bad, bad boy," so mamma said,
But lo! this morning, like the sky
Unclouded shone his clear blue eye.

And when upon his happy view
The meadows gleamed, all teared with dew,
He clapped his tiny palms and cried,
His plump, pink cheeks aglow with pride,
"Last night, last night, O mamma, see,
The angel-boys were bad like me!"

What Ambergris Is.

Ambergris, which is used as a basis for nearly all standard perfumery, was first found an unattractiv mass floating on the surface of the sea or lodged upon the shore. How so unlikely a substance ever suggested itself as a perfume is unknown, but it has been in use for centuries, and it is only until comparativly recent times that its origin has become known. It is nothing more than the morbid secretion of the liver of a sick spermaceti whale. It is described as a fatty, waxy substance, disagreeable to sight or touch, but even in its crude state exhaling a pleasant odor. The crude substance is subjected to chemical action to extract the activ principle, called amberine. It was recently reported that a Maine fisherman picked up a mass of the substance which nearly filled a barrel and is worth $25,000. This is probably an exaggeration both as to size and price, for the largest piece on record was found at the Windward islands, weighing one hundred and thirty pounds. This was sold for about $2,600.

Amber was also first found on the shores of the sea after severe storms. For a time its origin was unknown, but it was early put to use and regarded with a superstitious awe by the ancient Greeks and Romans, its peculiar electrical qualities being noted by them. It is now thought to be the gum of forest trees which perished ages and ages ago, the lands upon which they flourished having become the ocean's bed. Amber has no fixed value, the price being regulated wholly by size, quality, and other considerations. Drops of amber in which are imbedded insects of those ancient times command fancy prices, while the more common kinds are used for making a certain kind of varnish and even in medicin. The world's supply of the two, amber and ambergris, does not wholly depend upon what may be accidentally found. Dredging for amber is now systematically carried on by regularly organized companies, and all spermaceti whales killed by whalemen are subjected to a pretty thorough post-mortem examination, the find of ambergris in the monster's interior often being vastly more valuable than the oil extracted from his blubber overcoat.

Evolution of the Voice.

Darwin seems inclined to believe that as women hav sweeter voices than men they were the first to acquire musical powers in order to attract the other sex, by which I suppose he means that the feminin voice owes its greater sweetness to more persevering culture for purposes of flirtation. I do not know whether the ladies of the present day will own this soft impeachment, or whether they will be flattered by the suggestion that their remote ancestresses lived in a perpetual leap year of courtship.

Other emotions, however, besides the master passion of love had to be expressed; joy, anger, fear, and pain had all to find utterance, and the nervous centers excited by these various stimuli threw the whole muscular system into violent contractions, which in the case of the muscles moving the chest and the vocal cords naturally produced sound—that is to say, voice. These movements, at first accidental and purposeless, in time became inseparably associated with the emotional state giving rise to them, so as to coincide with it, and thus serve as an index or expression thereof. From this to the voluntary emission of vocal sounds is an easy step, and it is probable enough that the character of those sounds was primarily due to the "imitation and modification of different natural sounds, the voices of other animals, and men's own instinctiv cries."

Boys Who Do Not Play.

An Englishman traveling in Germany writes: "German boys never play. They hav no games, no sports. Life is to them a serious business. During a year's residence in a German town—where were a university, a gymnasium, a real schule, people's schools, and various private schools, and where, having two boys of my own in school, I had good opportunity to learn of boys' life—I never saw or heard, with the exception of one game of hide and seek, a single game. Once, in crossing a large court, I saw a company of boys choosing sides for a game of ball. I watched with interest a spectacle so unusual, wishing to see how a German boy would look when actually engaged in a game; but I was disappointed, as the company soon broke up in a fight. I was not surprised, for fighting, not in anger or hot blood, but easily and naturally, is the amusement of the German boy. Not that he is more pugnacious than other boys; but the military disciplin that curbs him in school and the sight of soldiers whenever he steps into the street keep constantly before him the idea and almost the necessity of fighting. This lack of healthful sport seriously affects the boy, depriving him of much enjoyment and making him old before he is mature."

Plain Enough.

No thing is made for nothing. Every part of even the smallest animal's structure is, or has been, of use to him. Otherwise it never would hav been developed.

"Can you tell me, my friend," said an elderly gentleman to the keeper of the menagerie, "what the hump on that animal's back is for?"

"What's it for?"

"Yes. Of what value is it?"

"Well, it's lots of value. De camel wouldn't be no good widout it."

"Why not?"

"Why not? Yer don't suppose people 'ud pay twenty-five cents to see a camel widout any hump on him, do yer?"

A Monster Locomotiv.

The largest locomotiv in the world has just been placed on the Big Four road. It is sixty-five feet in length, and weighs 130,000 pounds. It has two boilers, between which the cab is placed, which is as large as a small house. On the pilot twenty people can be seated. It requires two firemen and one engineer, and its inventor claims it can, under favorable conditions, make ninety miles an hour.

Correspondence.

ROCKVILLE, IDA., Oct. 18, 1890.

DEAR MISS WIXON: I thought I would write to the Corner, because I do not see many letters in it. This is my first letter. Father has taken THE TRUTH SEEKER for about six years. We hav twelve pet sheep, three calves, and eleven little pigs. I am going to school now. I study arithmetic, grammar, geography, reading, and writing. I will close for this time.

Your little Freethinker,
LAURA M. CARLTON.

SNOWVILLE, VA., Nov. 10, 1890.

DEAR SUSIE: Seeing the appeal of our beloved poetess, Mary Baird Finch, for Cook and Casey, in the Corner, I notice no addresses are given, and I feel so anxious that these two helpless old veterans of Liberalism should be helped, I hasten to send their addresses: R. M. Casey, Five Forks, S. C. Prof. J. H. Cook, Columbus, Kan. I would also say that anyone writing me and wishing to help them can inclose the needful, and I will gladly forward it.

Thine for true kindliness,
ELMINA D. SLENKER.

DALEVILLE, IND., Oct. 26, 1890.

MISS SUSAN H. WIXON, Dear Friend: As I hav not written for a long time, I will try and write again. There are three Sunday-schools here every Sunday. There was a man preached here, not long ago, and said that R. G. Ingersoll was dead, but had repented on his death-bed. I told him that I did not want to dispute his word, but Mr. Ingersoll was not dead, and I was happy that I knew it. He wanted to know if I was an Infidel. I told him I was. He wanted to know, then, if I ever knew an Infidel to go to heaven. I told him I had never been there to see, and nobody else that I ever heard tell of. We take THE TRUTH SEEKER, and could not do without it. The town looks dead, for all that the church bells are clattering. It is very cold. Well, as I am making my letter too long, I will close. Hoping to see this in print, I remain,

Your Infidel Friend, ROSA REMSBURG.

BALLSTON SPA, Oct. 20, 1890.

DEAR MISS WIXON: I thought I would write to you, as I did not see any little girl's letter in the Corner to-day. Well, I will say, my little friends hav gone to Sunday-school to hear some more slush and Bible lies, but I thought I would stay at home and tell you about my sister, who livs in Jersey City. She has a big bouncing girl, born two weeks ago, and its name is Maud Ingersoll Frayer; her hair is as white as silver, and her eyes a deep blue. She has lifted her little head alone from the day she was born. I hav a little black skye terrier, and I call him Robert Ingersoll, and I hav lots of fun with him. Mamma wishes the Freethinkers would hold another convention at Saratoga or at the White Sulphur Springs. Ha, ha, ha—wouldn't we hav a nice time singing and swinging? I wish we had a Liberal Sunday-school. I think I am taking too much space in the Corner, so good-bye.

Yours for love and truth,
HATTIE JANE THORPE.

QUENEMO, KAN., Oct. 21, E.M. 290.

DEAR MISS WIXON: It has been a long time since I hav written to the Children's Corner, and I am glad I can truthfully say it has progressed wonderfully since last I wrote, under the able management of Miss Wixon. Success to her and many others that are working for the ever-prevailing truth. In my estimation the Corner is improving and the readers as well.

I always watch for a letter from George Remsburg. Oh, that there were many more such Liberals as he!

We hav taken THE TRUTH SEEKER for about twelve years, and think it one of the grandest Freethought papers ever published.

One day one of our Christian friends came to our house and happened to see THE TRUTH SEEKER and looked at the pictures, and happened to look at the name of the paper and saw it was THE TRUTH SEEKER. She threw it upon the floor, but she got so she would look at the pictures but would never read any. But they, no doubt, set her to thinking upon the subject of Freethought.

My folks are personally acquainted with Prof. J. H. Cook and hav been to his home. They say that he is in very destitute circumstances.

I agree with Mary B. Finch about building monuments over the dead. If they would take the money spent upon building them and build roofed monuments, and build them for the living and helpless Freethinkers, it would do a great deal more good. And that is what we want to work for—do all the good for the human family that we can. Do all the good we can in this world, and the best we can in the next (if there be a next).

That is something like the story of the man that wanted to pray and did not know whether there was a God to pray to or not. He said: "O God! if there is a God, save my soul, if I hav a soul, from hell, if there is a hell." And I think that is the way with a good many of them. They are rather uncertain if there is a God.

I would like to correspond with some of the Liberal girls and boys of the Corner. I am fifteen years of age.

Yours for Universal Mental Liberty,
HENRY R. WATKINS.

[Henry writes a pleasant letter. We hope to hear from him soon again. Thanks for the pretty picture, Henry.—ED. C. C.]

FOR HER DAILY BREAD.
A NINETEENTH CENTURY NOVEL.
Preface by R. G. INGERSOLL.
For Her Daily Bread is the story of two young girls and a younger brother who were left parentless, with little money, fair education, and much courage, to make their way through the world by going to Chicago. The author is also the heroin. The narrativ is, in the main, a history of a working girl's life and experience in the city of Chicago among bluff business men, kind-hearted folks, and disreputable hypocrits. It is just such a story of human life as we should expect Colonel Ingersoll to be interested in; and whatever he admires and appreciates is sure to be worth the attention of the rest of the world. Price 25 cents.

This is the history of an attempt to found a church without superstition, and its success. Uncle Job Sawyer, the pastor, having established his pulpit, uses it to discuss all the vital questions of human concern, religious, political, and otherwise. The book is written in well-chosen language, and easily understood. There is just sufficient narrativ about it to interest the reader and hold his attention while the truth is being brought to his mind.

PROFESSOR KOCH says that he wishes no recompense for his discovery of a cure for consumption, and will in a few days explain it to the world. I pushed him back and said: 'Hold on there!' If he had not desisted, I should hav struck him, or any other living man, if I had known I would die in five minutes. He stepped back, when my daughter said: 'That's my mother.' The priest then said: 'Why didn't you say that before and not be so pigheaded?' I then said to him: 'Go into the house and sleep it off.' He knew what I meant as well as you do. The priest then went to another part of the church and continued his abusiv talk, until his servant, Frank Jones, came in and took him out of the church."

Gems of Thought.

PRACTICAL experiments had demonstrated such facts as the failing of springs on treeless slopes, and the violence of winter floods in districts unprotected by rain-absorbing forests, and tree culture was practiced as a regular branch of rational husbandry. But with the triumph of the Galilean church came the millennium of unnaturalism. Rational agriculture became a tradition of the past; the culture of secular science was fiercely denounced from thousands of pulpits; improvidence, "unworldliness," and superstitious reliance on the efficacy of prayer were systematically inculcated as supreme virtues. . . . Millions of acres of fine forest lands passed into the hands of ignorant priests, who, in their greed for immediate gain, and their reckless indifference to the secular welfare of posterity, doomed their trees to the ax, entailing barrenness on regions favored by every natural advantage of soil and climate.—Oswald.

THE fairest and fruitfulest provinces of the Roman empire, precisely that portion of terrestrial surface, in short, which about the commencement of the Christian era was endowed with the greatest superiority of soil, climate, and position, which had been carried to the highest pitch of physical improvement—is now completely exhausted of its fertility. A territory larger than all Europe, the abundance of which sustained in bygone centuries a population scarcely inferior to that of the whole Christian world at the present day, has been entirely withdrawn from human use, or, at best, is thinly inhabited. . . . There are regions, where the operation of causes, set in action by man, has brought the face of the earth to a state of desolation almost as complete as that of the moon; and though within that brief space of time which we call the historical period, they are known to hav been covered with luxuriant woods, verdant pastures, and fertil meadows, they are now too far deteriorated to be reclaimable by man, nor can they become again fitted for his use except through great geological changes or other agencies, over which we hav no control. . . . Another era of equal improvidence would reduce this earth to such a condition of impoverished productivness as to threaten the depravation, barbarism, and, perhaps, even the extinction of the human species.—Professor Marsh.

Lo! the world is rich in blessings;
Earth and ocean, flame and wind,
Hav unnumbered secrets still,
To be ransacked when you will,
For the service of mankind.
Science is a child as yet,
But her power and scope shall grow,
And her triumphs in the future
Shall diminish toil and woe,
Shall extend the bounds of pleasure
With an ever-widening ken.—Anon.

To the World's Columbian Exposition Commission:

Learning that there is an organized movement among the more conservative church people—manipulated by a "Sabbath" organization—to induce your honorable body to close on Sundays the World's Fair, to be held in 1893 in Chicago, the undersigned respectfully put in this counter petition, and ask that the Fair may be open to the public on each Sunday of its continuance. We ask this for the following reasons:

1. That the American principle of separation of church and state may be maintained.

2. That public morality may be subserved by providing a substitute for the immoral places to which men may resort when no moral amusements are available.

3. As a matter of justice also to the people of Chicago who have given of their means to make the Fair possible, tens of thousands of whom can visit the Fair only on a general holiday; and as a matter of justice also to the visitors to the Fair, whose time or means may be limited, and who certainly are entitled to great consideration at your hands.

4. For the public good. The opening of the Fair on Sunday will be for the benefit not only of Chicago, but of the whole country. The rights of no one are infringed, the happiness of no one disturbed. Those who wish to attend can do so; those who do not can otherwise spend the day. This is a solely humanitarian question, a question of human relations and human welfare, and, therefore, the only standard by which you can decide is that of the public welfare.

5. It will benefit the Fair, attracting a much larger attendance, interesting more people in it, and increasing its receipts.

6. To the objection that Sunday opening of the Fair will destroy the day as a rest-day, we affirm that the tendency would be exactly the opposite. The more beautiful you make Sunday, the more attractive, the more noble and varied in its pleasures and instructions, the more difficult it will be to change its character, the less danger there is that employers will ever have the power to transfer it from its present position to the days of toil. With choice of Sunday occupation restricted to attending church or visiting a saloon, the average workingman would choose to keep on laboring.

7. Finally: Opening the World's Fair on Sunday will harm no one but the keepers of immoral places, while it will benefit the Fair itself, the people of Chicago, and the visitors to the Fair, thereby conducing to municipal prosperity, individual education, public morality, and the development and good of the whole country.

LOOKING FORWARD.

Notes and Clippings.

THE holy synod of the Russian or Greek church has just issued a decree imposing a religious penance from three to five years in length upon all widows and widowers who are wicked enough to attempt matrimony for the third time; and for all widows of sixty who are found guilty of the second offense a rigid penance of two years' duration is prescribed.

THE emoluments and the jobbery of the Church of England are alike libels on religion. The dean of Windsor had £2,000 a year, with large perquisits and a luxurious residence. Canon Farrar has just been elected chaplain to the House of Commons. He already draws the emoluments of two other offices—St. Margaret's vicarage, £500, and a canonry of Westminster, £1,000. What with the archbishop of Canterbury's £15,000 a year, a palace, perquisits, etc., and a host of his colleagues' enormous draining, the clergy of the church may indeed literally be poor in spirit, but, excepting the curates (the position of thousands of whom is as financially deplorable as that of the dockers), they are certainly not poor in pocket.

OF the recent conference on the subject of moral instruction in the public schools, the Catholic Herald says: "Among other specific questions are: 'What does expediency dictate as to religious exercises in public schools?' 'How far does expediency dictate that state-supported schools should inculcate the principles and morals of religion?' and 'What should be the ground and character of instruction in morals in our public schools?' If our Presbyterian brethren really wish to solve these three questions in the manner most conduciv to religion and morality, they will adopt the teaching of the Catholic church and condemn all godless education as the most dangerous invention of the devil."

A DISPATCH from Pittsburgh says: "At the meeting of the National Sabbath Association in this city this week a radical program was mapped out. In connection with Captain Wishart of the Law and Order Society, they propose to revive the Blue laws of 1794. Their first attack is to be on the Pittsburgh Sunday newspapers, and then on those of Philadelphia. Pittsburgh Sunday papers hav an aggregate of one hundred and fifty thousand subscribers. These will be stopped from selling, and the carriers and newsboys will be arrested and fined for distribution. The Rev. Mr. McCrary says it will be just as easy as falling off a log to stop all the Sunday editions of papers in Pennsylvania. Lawyers who hav been interviewed say that they can stop every form of employment on Sunday, unless the Blue laws of 1794 are modified or repealed."

A PECULIAR sect, calling themselvs the "Slaves of Christ," has been discovered in the district of Dunilovo, government of Vladimirsk. The adherents of the sect believe that if one dies by the "red death," his soul goes directly to the abode of the saints. One who makes up his mind to die like a saint gets baptized and partakes of the holy communion. He then lies down on the floor with his feet to the door. There, from beneath the floor or from a cavity made especially for the purpose, creeps a man dressed in red clothes with a large red pillow in his hands. The attending worshipers begin to sing a dirge, while the red man throws the pillow over the doomed man's face, and holds it there until the man is suffocated. If the man who dooms himself to the "red death" is strong, he is bound to the floor with ropes, so that in his struggles at the last moment he may not be able to overpower the "slave of Christ" who executes the horrible ceremony at his request.

THE Christian Advocate wails: "Consider the history of Sabbath laws and customs. Two hundred years ago, in Scotland and New England, the laws for the observance of the Sabbath were so stringent that the Jews, in their strictest periods, had not surpassed them, except in the more frequent use of the death penalty. Naturally and justly a reaction arose against such an extreme of rigor. A 'great popular current and movement of the ages' has taken place; and with what result? The Sabbath is almost destroyed in this country. Little by little, with the consent and supported by the practices of many Methodists, Presbyterians, Baptists, and Congregationalists, the land has been filled with railroad excursions on the Sabbath, and the streams, adjacent seas, and lakes filled with steamboat excursions; and the rural districts during the summer hegira are covered with city and town Christians, of whom most hav left their Sabbath behind them, such as it was. In many of the cities theaters are opened, and little or nothing is done to preserve the sanctity of the day. It is yet uncertain whether the World's Fair in Chicago will not be opened on the Lord's day, with the probability that the popular current will determin that it shall be opened, and thus remove the last visible difference between the continental Sabbath and that of this country."

SINCE August last all eyes hav turned toward Berlin in anxiety to learn more of the reported discovery by the great bacteriologist of a cure for the widespread and dreaded disease, consumption. Dr. Koch's official medical communication is now given to the world, and it is noteworthy that of all persons who hav written on the subject of this important discovery Dr. Koch himself is the most diffident, most modest, and most anxious that the world should not believe too much. This is the best assurance of good results from his discoveries that can possibly be given to the world. When, in 1882, Dr. Koch made his brilliant discovery, the tubercle bacillus, he expressed a belief that the means would one day be found to check its ravages. After working untiringly to discover this means for eight years, he now believes himself on the high road to success. More than this he does not say, unless it be that he believes that what he hopes will prove a remedy for tubercular disease will in any case be the means of detecting its existence. One piece of advice may well be given to readers here. It is, do not rush to Berlin. The hotels, hospitals, and homes of private clients are full there already, while as yet no possible means exist of treating one tithe of the sufferers who are already there. Victims of tubercular disease who hurry to Berlin just now are certain to incur risks far more serious than any remedy yet discovered can possibly mitigate.

Is There a God?

II.

The God that Christians worship, is not the God for me.
He hath no parts nor body, he cannot hear nor see.

In all known ages and climes men hav occupied much time in searching for their origin, and, in all known ages and climes, they hav utterly failed to discover any origin, but the result of their researches has been to set up "a power and a principle" and call it the maker of heaven and earth and all that therein is. The failure of man to discover any creativ power, has ended in the imagination inventing one; and as each person, in the absence of any facts to guide him, assumes the privilege of taking his own view of this question, the result has been that the deities of all ages and all countries hav been as numerous, as paradoxical, and as whimsical as the fancies that created them, and they hav been just as hideous and as cruel as the passions of their authors; and these gods, the inventions of man's imagination, hav been handed down from age to age. What is God? I must confess that if I had been compelled to commence this article by giving a definition of the word "God," I should not perhaps hav undertaken it, for the very word presents such a vague and undecided idea, that I cannot comprehend what is meant by it; and to add to the difficulty, those professing a knowledge of the subject arbitrarily fix different meanings to the word, so that it is impossible for me to form anything like a correct idea. In fact, men can hav no idea of God. The most they can think of is a great man, and so God has always been fashioned after his maker—man.

From the earliest ages of man's existence, he found himself confronted by a double problem, "the world" and "himself." The origin of both was, to him, a mystery, and the easiest way out of the difficulty was to invent a god, and "God knows" with what terrible results, and what prodigious obstinacy, he has clung to his invention. He has turned it and twisted it, he has explained it in a thousand different fashions, and all this without having yet satisfied himself.

With the primitiv people, as it must necessarily be with the savage tribes of our own day, all believed that they saw God in what they did not understand. The winds, the tempest, the thunder, and the lightning they regarded as menaces or punishments for their faults, and not being able to battle with the elements, in their rude and savage state, which acted upon them despite their resistance, they therefore attached to them ideas of power, and worshiped them. But, as man progressed, learning to profit by the lessons of experience, becoming less fearful, he abandoned these gods, and began to worship those objects and animals which were useful or agreeable to him. Later still he worshiped the sun, the moon, and the stars, and then, in the course of his upward growth, he became dissatisfied with these and began to worship an idea. And it is thus that, since the first periods of the world's history, man believed he saw God in all he did not understand, in everything that filled him with wonder and fear, in all that struck him with astonishment. But since these ancient times the idea of God has become proportionately modified to come up with the intellectual progress of the people. And now, to-day, there is almost an unlimited free trade in the supply of gods. I say gods, for there are gods of all sizes, shapes, and colors. You cannot purchase two gods exactly similar. But if you desire a God, you hav only to search the Christian warehouse, and there you will find an extensiv variety of every shape, style, and fashion adapted to your taste. The only requirement with them to-day is, that you shall use the name of God, it being of very slight consequence whether you believe it or not.

It has, at all times, been a favorit move among the sky-pilots to point to the mighty sky, with its myriads of glowing stars, and the calmly serene moon, and turning to the "pitied skeptic" ask, "Who made and governs all these?" Our senses being turned to a wonderful and inspiring sight, we yield to the influence of awe, natural to the breast of man, and our imagination, clouded in a veil of mystery, lulls us into a passiv belief. We cannot explain the phenomena we see, but the divines undertake to tell us they can explain everything, and tell us God made all. But this is an unfair mode of dealing with the matter, for I might answer, and with as much right to be believed, that if God made the sun, the moon, and the stars, then the devil sent the comets, the nebulæ, the meteors, and others not mentioned in the account of the creation. But nevertheless, I can watch in the stilly silence of midnight for hours the stars rise and set; I can pierce the vaults of heaven and muse on the firmaments with pleasure; I can rise with the dawn and see the sun in all its grandeur, in the beauty of its majesty, breaking the clouds in the east with its piercing rays, but still I am brought no nearer to a solution of the problem—"Is there a God?" On the eternity of the universe the philosophic mind, free from the degrading servility of superstitious fears, rests, as upon the rock of ages, past, present, and future, whilst the vulgar mind, enfeebled by credulity, rolls to and fro, drunk with imaginary fears of burning worlds and of the human race being swept away by a deluge of waters. Whilst the latter looks up to heaven, to a frowning, vindictiv, inexorable deity, the former beholds nothing but light, beauty, order, and harmony. The one sees through the eyes of faith the heavens rolled up like a scroll, and the stars falling like lightning; the other contemplates the rising sun with emotions of delight, as that splendid luminary sheds over the earth a flood of light and paints her in her richest garments and gayest colors, and givs life and vigor to the millions of beings that dwell upon her surface. O ye religionists, which is the better way to worship, fear and tremble before a vengeful and wrathful deity, or contemplate nature and adore her beauty?

"The fool hath said in his heart, there is no God," says the believer, but my answer is that the fool in his folly hath tried to conceive an inconceivable God and to explain the inexplicable.

"Is there a God?" is a question many might ask with good reason to justify the inquiry. The patriot struggling for freedom fails in his effort; he is torn from his home, his wife, his children, and his friends; he lies languishing in prison, while the usurper, the tyrant, rules in luxury. He may well ask, "Is there a God?" The poor unfortunate girl, now an outcast, a street-walker, who perforce must liv by her shame, and who is now hunted and shunned by her own Christian sisters, will cry out with plaintiv voice, "Is there a God?" The man who by our present cruel system finds himself swindled out of his rights without any hope of redress, when lying faint and exhausted from want of food, while the robber still enjoys the luxuries of fashionable life, might well cry out in tones of bitter anguish, "Is there a God?"

Over the past hangs a cloud of gloomy and obscuring infatuation and folly. Only worship a God, whether it be a dunghill fly or that which animates the ferocious crocodile or the grotesque monkey, and you are certain of heaven and the rewards of devotion and piety. But act justly, appreciate truth, and above all dare to utter it, and you are threatened with an awful responsibility in a future state of existence. Worship a deformity, an idol, a nonentity, and your faith is a passport through society, and heaven smiles upon your docility, your submissiv humility. Throw off the sacred yoke, dare to be mentally free, and you are a doomed man, you will be shunned as a pestilence, an evil to be avoided. If you were to liv in all the purity of an angel of light, you would be clothed in the garments of darkness. The finger of scorn would be pointed at you, and you will be condemned as devoid of sanctity. But in the midst of all this, supported by the calm dignity of reason and internal consciousness of truth, neither the scorn of men nor the threatening dungeons of tyrants—not even the approach of death—can disturb the peace of mind of that man who, discarding Gods, contemplates the universe as one indivisible and indestructible whole!

JOHN R. CHARLESWORTH.

The Dangerous Obtrusivness of the Clergy.

I fear the Greeks although they come bearing gifts.—Laocoon.

I was a temperance man in 1829, and resident in a county in which there were more than a hundred distilleries. At that time the temperance cause was as unpopular in the church as the antislavery cause afterward was, when it began its career under the lead of Garrison and Lundy. In the Pennsylvania town where I lived, consisting of two thousand inhabitants, the only person besides myself that professed to be a temperance man was a class-leader of the Methodist church, whose only son was a drunkard. This good old man, who was in both senses a mainstay of the church, nevertheless passed under a cloud of reproach for his so-called wild and unscriptural principles, from the darkness of which he never emerged till he died. For, not only was every farmer who had a spring on his place a distiller of whisky, but the churches of all denominations regarded a temperance man as a crank, whose influence was pernicious.

Then began what was called the Washingtonian movement, which was conducted with great vigor and progressed wonderfully. Lecturers, who understood anatomy and physiology, had plates representing the human brain and stomach in large size, and I hav heard them address an audience of two thousand people, in the open air, showing the deadly effects produced upon these vital functions of the body by the use of liquors, proving that they were well called "ardent," or burning. But, in process of time, after the Washingtonians had made temperance meetings and practices popular among the better classes of society, the clergy quit their ridicule and abuse of the reformers, and, uplifted with the conceit that they were, exclusivly, the divinely authorized leaders and teachers of the people in morals; and seeing that the movement might be made an adjunct and auxiliary to the church, they stepped in and took the reins of government into their own hands. The first thing they did was to teach from the pulpit, and in the temperance meetings, that a drunkard could not reform, and giv up the suicidal habit of drinking, until he first became converted to religion and joined the church. Even Murphy, now, who is a lineal descendant, but a small pattern, of the old Washingtonians, instead of teaching a drunkard to stand upon his own legs, and be too much of a man to be a slave to a damned vice like drunkenness, cocks him up on stilts and makes him promis that, relying on the grace of God, and the ever-present sufficiency of Jesus, to prevent him from falling, he will henceforth keep sober. Of course, the poor fellow is only reformed while the religious excitement lasts, but when he associates again with his old cronies, and the odors of whisky and tobacco smoke salute his olfactories, he waits a little to see if God's promised grace, and the help of Jesus, do not come to rescue him from temptation, and finding that no such miracle is wrought, he, too, forgets his promis, and thinks he may indulge just this once; and down he goes into the gutter, stilts and all.

Now, just look at what clerical domination has done for the temperance cause in our day! It has converted a moral reform movement into a religious, politico Prohibition party, which aims to regulate by law, not only the personal habits of the people, but their religious opinions. They wish to abolish the manufacture, sale, and use, not only of ardent spirits, but fermented liquors of all sorts—wine, beer, and even cider; for, unless cider is used the same day it is expressed from the apple it becomes "fermented" liquor and goes under the ban. It has played upon the sensitiv and sympathetic nature of women and enlisted them in the political movement, so that it has controled the politics of states, and is training up a set of people of both sexes skilled in all sorts of lying and fraudulent practices. In the very first plank of its political platform it proclaims the treasonable heresy that civil government derives its authority, not from the people, as the national Constitution declares, but from God; and that, the Bible being a complete and final expression of his will, and the clergy being the sole authorized and recognized interpreters of that will, the state must look to these interpreters as their guides in legislation. To this end the clergy, through the Prohibition party, are straining every effort to Sabbatize the nation by law. They publish forged documents. They circulate known falsehoods, and make their ignorant and confiding dupes believe the great lie, that it is a sin against God to do any manner of work on the first day of the week, which they, without the least authority of scripture, but in face of its clear teachings, call the "Sabbath," the observance of which is enjoined in the decalog—the national constitution of a handful of people called Jews.

Having been an eye-witness to the things I hav narrated, and seeing that the clerical touch is death to any organization that promises to do good on a large scale, I was not surprised, but angered, to see that, in the late single tax convention which met in New York city to organize a political league for the purpose of reforming our present unrighteous system of taxation, the clergy, though in small numbers, appeared among the members and asked to be recognized, not as citizens, like the rest of us, but more than citizens—as clergymen, embassadors of Jesus Christ, authorized by God himself to be the teachers and guides of men, in morals and politics as well as in religion. Considering where the seventy odd thousand of the clergy of this country stand on moral and humane questions, this handful of gentlemen are entitled to a world of credit for having any bowels of compassion at all for the millions of our countrymen who are robbed of so much of their hard earnings by the iniquitous character of our state and national methods of taxation. But like the rest of the cloth called "reverend," because they feel themselvs entitled to the fear and reverence of their fellow-men as persons invested with supernatural authority by the powers of the unseen world, they seemed tenacious of that recognition, even as members of a political association. When a clergyman in this country is either appointed or chosen to a political office of trust under the national Constitution, the moment he receives his commission and enters upon the performance of his duties, he lays down all his claims as a divinely authorized embassador and teacher of morals, and is recognized at home or abroad solely as a citizen of the United States, intrusted with matters which concern this world alone. The single tax conference was also a purely secular association, having nothing to do with religion, either for or against, but confined in its object and functions to the affairs of this world, as much so as a board of railroad directors or a Wall street board of trade. Why, therefore, the reverend gentlemen should so insist, as they did, on being recognized as clergymen, seemed strange.

I noticed that this pertinacity arrested the attention of that eagle-eyed and broad-minded statesman, Mr. Croasdale, who, with a firmness and courtesy beautifully blended, led the conference to settle the policy of the single tax movement, on the right principle of welcoming all persons to our platform, but simply and alone in their high character as American citizens. Mr. Croasdale has not forgotten the legend of the Trojan horse. He sees also what a set of howling dervishes, intoxicated with the fumes of their own fanaticism, the clergy hav made of the old temperance cause, leading their followers into organized treason; and to believe the colossal and blasphemous absurdity that the laws of a human legislature, in matters of reform, can do what the laws of God hav never yet been able to accomplish; and he has no idea of throwing away the hard labor of years by allowing religious fanaticism to hav any share in promoting the movement of tax reform. The reverend gentlemen whom I am criticising are all excellent men, and would be shocked at the idea of becoming Sinons to the cause of single tax, and betraying it into the hands of the clergy as a ruling class. But when this cause, on account of its popularity, may become a mighty instrument for doing things, and the plutocrats and monopolists become alarmed at its power, who knows how many of the clergy they may bribe to come in, and either swamp or pervert the movement? The wealthy classes are now the dangerous classes, and the fearful thing in excessiv wealth is that, as a general rule with some exceptions, it can do as it pleases with men, women, and legislatures state and national. Three hundred thousand dollars, we are told by a California editor, is the price a millionaire has to pay for a seat in the United States Senate. In other states it is not so much, but as a rule office and legislation are as purchasable as pig iron and cotton bales. The history of the temperance cause, and the mutations through which it has passed, from good to bad and from bad to worse, until it is now aiming to Sabbatize the country and bring about the union of state and church, should warn the single taxers against the first step toward an alliance with the church and clergy.

Mr. Garrison, of Boston, during the debate in the conference on a platform of principles, expressed his regret at the absence of able women in our ranks, and wished that we had so good an organizer and so activ a reformer as Miss Frances Willard, the leader of the women in the National Women's Christian Temperance Union, and of the men in the Prohibition-God-in-the-Constitution party. But if the past has any lessons of wisdom to teach the present, it would not be a year before this prolific mother of associations and expedients would make the single tax movement a mere branch of the religious and revolutionary propaganda at the head of which she stands.

Let us remind the reader that there is no resemblance between Miss Willard and her fiery cohorts on the one hand, and the antislavery women of fifty years ago on the other. The grand women who stood by their fathers, husbands, and brothers, in that righteous contention for justice to the enslaved, were not religious women. The religious women were all in the churches, and like their preachers, were the scornful and bitter foes of the Abolitionists. As the churches were organized bodies, extending all over the country, and had the mighty advantage of organization, in carrying out a moral reform, without involving a conflict between the sects about religion and theology; and as they all professed to believe in the Ten Commandments, one of which said: "Thou shalt not steal," either human bodies, or the wages of their labor; Garrison implored them to lead the movement for the peaceable abolition of slavery as a moral evil. But he might as well hav preached to the generations of the dead, sleeping in the graveyards of the country; for the clergy taught, in nearly every pulpit, that slavery was a divine institution; and instead of warring against it, they attacked the Abolitionists, and called them godless rebels against the divine authority of the Bible. The antislavery women, like the men, did not deny the charge of being Infidels, for, if human slavery was a Bible institution, as the clergy claimed it to be, they were Infidels to such a cursed religion. But they put the question of slavery on moral and economical grounds. They declared that slavery was injustice to the slave, a withering curse to the soil, to the master, and to his family, an eating, deadly cancer in the bosom of the republic, and demanded its immediate destruction. They were careful not to invoke the aid of religion per se, for they well knew that its natural place always had been on the side of power, and against the interest of the masses.

I am glad to see that so impartial and judicious a woman as Frances M. Milne, of California, in an article on "Woman and the Single Tax," in the Standard of October 15th, with the fidelity and foresight of the Trojan patriot, says:

> And just here I would like to say one word with all tenderness and sympathy for religious feeling. In the conduct of such a society as a woman's single tax union, there is, I fear, a great danger of warping it from a broad and practical enthusiasm that finds its expression in action, to a narrow formula of piety that finds its goal in a routine of prayer and semi-sermon. I am not impugning the sincerity of those who follow such methods. I only question its wisdom, though such a cause may draw a following for a time that seems to justify it. But with all the reverence and ardor of my soul, with the deep conviction of the fatherhood of God, which Mr. George's writings hav made to me a divine reality, I long to see women in this great movement, rising above the narrow ruts of a perfunctory observance of religious ceremonial.

The tenderness of woman's heart, and the zeal and faithfulness with which she carries out her convictions of duty—attributes for which men love, and trust, and worship her, are the very features of her natural character out of which the priesthood oftentimes convert her into a unnatural, reckless, irresponsible, religious fanatic. When a woman, either from a sense of duty, or interest, enters into business relations, or politics, let her come as a person claiming no right on the score of being a woman, endowed with personal charms, or a religionist, animated with fiery zeal as a propagandist. There is no danger of men, who are men, failing to treat such a woman with profound respect. But she must not forsake her gender, and become mannish, coarse, and imperativ. She must not undertake to descend to 'practical politics," and fight with beasts at Ephesus. In short, she should model her character after the Grimpkes, the Lucretia Motts, the Lydia Maria Childs, the Abby Kelley Fosters, the Susan B. Anthonys, and the rest of the antislavery women who formed that brilliant constellation in our American history which will shine in history forever.

Now, in concluding what I hav to say on this subject, since the sentiment called religious draws its motivs to human action chiefly from the hopes and fears of another and future state of existence, concerning which we know so little, however much we may believe; and since the history of religion proves it to hav been, in all past ages, as well as in the present, a meddlesome and destructiv agency in the affairs of this world, social, political, and scientific, I, for one, protest against the very idea of the single tax movement becoming a contingent, or mere wing, under the control of either Miss Willard, the ableand accomplished head of the Prohibition-Sabbatarian-God-in-the-Constitution party, or, of General Booth, the commander-in-chief of the Salvation Army, with its drums, trumpets, and hallelujah lassies. Let us be guided by the spirit of the national Constitution, which, while it protects every person in the belief and propagation of his own form of religion, as a secular and political government, neither affirms nor denies any statements of creeds and ceremonies, but totally ignores the whole of them. Mockery of Thanksgiving.

The following is a copy of a letter from the secretary of the Washington Secular Union to Governor Ferry of Washington:

WASHINGTON SECULAR UNION,
2104 SIXTH ST, SEATTLE, WASH., NOV. 1, 1890.

To ELISHA P. FERRY, Governor state of Washington, Dear Sir: As the time is approaching for issuing the annual Thanksgiving proclamation, the Washington Secular Union (with a membership composed of good and worthy citizens in nearly every election district of the state, alike east and west of the Cascades) would respectfully call your especial attention to Art i, Sec. 2, of our state constitution, "Absolute freedom of conscience in all matters of religious sentiment, belief, and worship shall be guaranteed to every individual," and earnestly entreat that your forthcoming proclamation may be in accord and compliance with that guarantee. The officers and members of the Washington Secular Union claim that under our state constitution each and every good citizen possesses equal right to believe and profess, or to reject and ignore, any religious system, however wrong or erroneous their so doing may seem to others. That each and all good citizens hav the right to believe or disbelieve in the existence of any God; to worship, praise, or pray to, or refuse to praise, pray to, or worship any God, just as they sovereignly please, always provided that in the exercise of such right they shall not interfere in or prevent the exercise of the same rights by others. That no individual, nor any number of persons, whether self-associated or delegated by others; no majority, however large or overwhelming, possess any right to use coerciv means to restrain any persons from the full enjoyment of any religious sentiment, belief, or worship, or to induce them to profess any religious faith, or acknowledge any God, or perform any worship, or observe any feast, fast, prayer, or other holy days, or contribute any means to support any religion, and much less any which they do not conscientiously hold to be true. And therefore that any official act either of the executiv, the legislativ, or judiciary departments, enforcing any religious or sectarian doctrin, dogma, rite, ceremony, or observance, or which shall be intended directly or indirectly to effect such a purpose, is in fact a union of church and state, an attempt to hoist the cross above the flag.

Our government is civil, not ecclesiastical; has no religion, and therefore no authority to issue proclamations calling on citizens to acknowledge any God, or to observe any time for prayers, fasts, feasts, or worship. Hence any proclamation by the governor of the state, or any other government official, of a day to be devoted to worship or "thanksgiving to an almighty God," or any proclamation for any holiday in which citizens are advised to assemble in places of worship, or in which reference or allusion is made to religion or religious worship, is an act of official impertinence, an act of spiritual intolerance and oppression, and a gross violation of our state constitution. It is not alone an unrighteous stretch of power, but a pandering to a class of fanatical religionists—who acknowledge their religion is of human origin, without hope or expectation of any divine help or support, or it would not need to be bolstered up by acts of the secular government, ignoring the constitutional rights of others. For to appeal to, or accept aid from, the secular power, is to admit they doubt, nay, are well convinced, that all divine aid would be withheld, or at best prove inefficient.

The Washington Secular Union makes no protest against the appointment by the executiv of any day as a secular holiday. If any person or persons choose to spend the entire twenty-four hours of any public holiday, or any part thereof, in thanksgiving, prayer, praise, or worship, we would defend their right to do so. We hav no desire to encroach on the rights of others; we simply desire to secure our own, as guaranteed by the constitution. Any holiday is all right if appointed without reference, or any allusion, to religion; all wrong when interfering, dictating, or even suggesting any religious observances, doctrins, or exercises.

It is claimed "Thanksgiving proclamations do not prescribe, but only recommend, a day of Thanksgiving, and hav no binding force or influence." Then they should most certainly be dispensed with, since they disturb, irritate, and outrage the sentiments of a large number of good and worthy citizens.

But since they do hav force and influence, we ask, why should one class of citizens be favored above all others, and their religious belief be pandered to by the government, and the belief and sentiments of other equally good and worthy citizens be snubbed or ignored?

Our state constitution in its preamble reads: "Grateful to the supreme ruler of the universe." Force and matter are regarded by many hundreds of intelligent citizens as the supreme rulers of the universe, and it must be admitted that if gravity, electricity, magnetism, and chemical affinity are real forces, eternally inherent in matter, then of necessity the Gods, Jupiter, Brahma, Joss, Osiris, Thor, Mithra, Juggernaut, and Jehovah, must one and all be imaginary beings; and we suggest it is not in the province of the chief executiv of the state to decide which of these supreme rulers shall be thanked, since absolute freedom of conscience in all matters of religious sentiment, faith, and worship is guaranteed to every individual.

And further, if any citizen has especial cause for gratitude to any God or Gods, it is an insult to the intelligence of such citizen for any government official (servant of the people) to issue instructions as to when, and to which of the "supreme rulers," the citizen shall say "Thank you."

Jefferson said: "The government has no right to indirectly assume an authority over religious exercises, which the Constitution has directly precluded it from." "I do not believe it is for the interest of religion to invite the civil magistrate to direct its exercises, or that the general government should be invested with power to effect any uniformity of time or matter among them. Fasting and prayer are religious exercises, the enjoining them an act of disciplin. Every religious society has a right to determin for itself the time for these exercises, and this right can never be safer than in their own hands, where the Constitution has deposited it."

Madison declared: "The broadest principles of the Constitution would entirely preclude the chief executiv from thus interfering in the religious affairs of the nation." "Notwithstanding the general progress, there remains a strong bias toward the old error that without some sort of alliance or coalition between government and religion neither can be duly supported. Such indeed is the tendency to such a coalition, and such its corrupting influence on both the parties, that the danger cannot be too carefully guarded against."

Grant said: "Leave the matter of religion to the family altar, the church, and the private school supported by private contribution, but keep the state and church forever separate."

No possible wrong, loss, or injury can result to any citizen from your careful exclusion from your proclamation of any holiday all mention, reference, or allusion to religion or religious duties or observances.

We confidently rely on your using every endeavor to insure to each and all citizens of the state "absolute freedom of conscience in all matters of religious sentiment, belief, and worship."

Yours respectfully,

C. B. REYNOLDS, Sec. Wash. Sec. Union.

Mr. Wakeman on the Fallacies of Anarchism.

An audience even larger than that which honored Mr. Watts November 15th, assembled last Friday night at the Liberal Club to listen to T. B. Wakeman's discussion of "Some Essentials that Mr. Pentecost Overlooks." The chairman of the evening, Dr. E. B. Foote, Jr., before introducing the speaker, announced that a petition to President Harrison, asking for the pardon of Mr. Heywood, now in Charleston state prison, was being circulated, and that those of the audience present who had some sympathy, if not with Mr. Heywood at least with his unfortunate family, would find copies awaiting their signature in the rear of the hall. Several persons present affixed their names at the close of the lecture, and in all about twenty-five signatures were got. Mr. Foote then introduced Mr. Wakeman, who spoke in substance as follows:

The intellectual part of the community has during the latter years witnessed three important convulsions in the religious world of the United States, in the dissent and consequent assumption of interesting positions of three orthodox clergymen: Professor Felix Adler, the leader of the Ethical movement; Dr. McGlynn, of Antipoverty fame, and Hugh Pentecost, now one of the foremost Anarchists of the country. Professor Adler has done some good, but, aside from other shortcomings, he has reached certain individuals only, owing to the narrowness of his platform. Then Dr. McGlynn—his great heart went out to the people, he saw the suffering and the distress of the masses, which the church did nothing to alleviate. He now commands large and enthusiastic audiences, and his followers love him as a father. But what practical good has he done? We can find no trace of the influence of his teachings either in the family or in the municipality. What measures has his party laid before the legislature? None. Last election he promised to follow the Commonwealth party, but in the last minute memories of his clerical past made him desert and he and all his followers vote for the clerical combination party, the People's Municipal League.

But we will not concern ourselvs with those men and their platforms to-night; we will turn our attention to Mr. Pentecost. He was a Protestant minister, hence somewhat nearer to us Freethinkers. Both my family and I highly respect Mr. Pentecost. We watched him when he threw off his clerical garb, we noticed his intellectual growth and supported him, and, to some extent, we do yet. What has Mr. Pentecost done? During the later years nothing but harm. He has placed himself outside society, has declared war upon society, and induced by his writing and speeches, others to follow him. A leader of a movement cannot be reached by the voice of the people. Others, outsiders, must speak the word of warning and correction. The Anarchist movement, like any other, when attaining a certain stage of development cannot be directed. The leaders become leaders in name, not in fact; they themselvs are carried along with the progressiv current of the movement. So also to some extent with Mr. Pentecost. Yet that is not all. Mr. Pentecost, like Felix Adler and Dr. McGlynn, is a clergyman. And the intellectual vision of a clergyman is necessarily limited; his station in society, his one-sided education, make it impossible to be otherwise. To a clergyman there exist but two essential factors in the universe—the individual, who has a soul to be saved, and God, for whom the soul is to be saved. The clergyman looks upward, and hence his mistake. We must not look upward, but forward. If the minister did so, he would perceive that between him and his God stands the third factor, the most important one, humanity. This is perceived by all the great philosophers of modern times, by Spencer, Bain, Mill, and Auguste Comte, who in his Positiv philosophy expressly states, "Between man and God we hav humanity." Mr. Pentecost has no use for a God, but as he is looking upward just the same, he, like his former brethren, fails to perceive humanity. To him there is but one factor, the ego; before it was God and I, but now it is I only—the I has from a part become a totality. If in possession but of the slightest smattering of the science of sociology, he would know that society is an organism and human life an organic action, therefore subject to laws greater than the will of the individual. Humanity grows, and it is the duty of each generation to bequeath to the future a better race and better conditions. The bequeathing of the latter, the better conditions, is indorsed by Mr. Pentecost. But his way of doing it is rather ridiculous. He attempts nothing less than a discontinuance of the human race, and a destruction of society. He says, I am endowed with a free will, society has no right to command me, and government of any kind is brutality. He hates the sight of a policeman, and has no respect for anyone that votes. I will protest, he says. And he and his fellow-Anarchists do protest, and, not satisfied therewith, refuse to take any part in the affairs of the community. But what is this but an attempt to destroy the organic action of society? It is high treason against the organic life of society.

Society cannot exist without coöperation. It is like a great machine. Stop the running of some of its parts and all will come to a standstill. Let a certain proportion of society refuse to coöperate and society will come to an end. The will of the individual is nothing; only in solidarity can it make its influence felt. The grandest idea ever conceived by man is the one of continuity, and if we compare mankind to a cross, it is the sustaining part, the base, while the horizontal part, the arms, are solidarity, representing the individual efforts. The head of the cross is the ideal, and the center, where the vertical and the horizontal lines cross each other, is humanity. It is from the base, from the idea of continuity, that we draw our strength; from it, as from the roots of a tree, we derive, through inheritance, our growth.

We descend, Professor Huxley tells us, from group of social animals, and their social instinct never died out. As far back as our knowledge goes it can be traced, and side by side with it an ever growing sentiment of coöperation. But a coöperativ state is possible only when each individual, as well as the aggregation of individuals, is protected and governed. Government of some kind or other is a necessity, and although I admit that in the current sense of the word it is in most instances nothing but tyranny, it was not so in the past, and will not be so in the future. To govern meant then to guide, to use a helm. And a government as a guide and protector of each as well as of all, we cannot be without.

When a government is bad we hav a right to destroy, to abolish it, but upon the condition only that we institute a new and better one. But the Anarchists want no government, even for protection. They consider rents, profits, and taxes robbery. Yet taxes are necessary, they sustain the government. Mr. Pentecost thinks Grover Cleveland is a murderer, because he, when a sheriff in Erie county, cut the rope at an execution. But this is not so. It was not the man Cleveland, it was the sheriff of Erie county, that did the act. He did so in the name of the people, for the protection of the people.

The Anarchist aims at liberty. But he will never get it. On the contrary; he removes us farther and farther from it. Take Illinois—the liberties of the citizens are taken away by Anarchy; law after law against freedom is enacted, and more will yet be added. Society must defend itself against those who attempt its very life, and force will be used so long as force is necessary. Individualism is opposed to freedom; liberty can be gained by coöperation only. Socialism and Nationalism, which are in the line of evolution, hav a future before them. They aim at emancipation from nature and monopoly; they are scientific. But Anarchism, that tells man to separate himself from his fellow-men, is unscientific, is unmitigated nonsense. If Mr. Pentecost wishes to be a teacher for the good of mankind he must first study a little sociology.

At the conclusion of the lecture Mr. Wakeman was vigorously applauded, and Dr. Foote, after calling attention anew to the Heywood petition, said that the floor was open now for the critics, and that he hoped Mr. Pentecost was present, as he had been most cordially invited both by Mr. Wakeman and by the club, and a default to appear would cause considerable disappointment. But as Mr. Pentecost was conspicuous by his absence only, one of the club's stock critics, Professor Eccles, took the stand. The professor stated that he did not think Mr. Wakeman had done justice to Mr. Pentecost. In fact, he said, they don't disagree very much. The greater part of the way they go hand in hand. Both agree in believing that poverty is the seed from which most crimes spring, and that the workingman's wages are stolen by his employer. Both believe in coöperation, but Mr. Wakeman says we can not coöperate without the existence of government, while Mr. Pentecost says we can. It is all nonsense predicting future happiness here on earth. We can not know anything beyond our nose. It is not safe to belong either to the Liberal, progressiv party, or to the orthodox. Yet the former is the best. But how many of those belonging to it are right? The only safe party is the third party. We protest, he continued, we fight them all, and when we see victory, when one's rights are allotted to one, we applaud it and adopt the discovery. Then the professor, who evidently was the only right man in the right party, took his seat.

He was succeeded by Mr. Robertson, an Anarchist, who wasted most of his time in pleasantries, remarks on the late police interference in New Jersey, and generalities. He said at last that the Anarchist does not protest against government, but against the government, against such artificial bonds of society as the emperor of Russia and the English Parliament. By and by we shall all come together without harming each other, and what use then of government? Man has a right to secede, and to be told, You shall belong to society, is an act of oppression, as it is to compel him to pay taxes to sustain institutions he doesn't like. Mr. Wakeman had mistaken egoism for egotism, but they are widely different.

Another gentleman then took the stand. He said he agreed almost entirely with Mr. Wakeman. The Anarchists did not understand the value of organization. They could not see that in society a sum is greater than the aggregate of its parts; that the organized, directed effort of society must of necessity be greater than the sum of the efforts of the same parts when not organized. He then pointed out the difference between individuality and individualism. The former is all right, but the latter is nonsense, and Anarchism is individualism ad absurdum. Self-dependency belongs to the lower orders of animal life, and altruism to the higher. And for the special benefit of Mr. Wakeman he added that there is no such thing as an individual thing, and that liberty does not exist.

He was followed by Professor Gunton, who was very lively, speaking as he did with both arms and feet. He said Mr. Wakeman's argument was good. Anarchism, which is war on everything and everybody, is dangerous to society, and causes it to turn against that doctrin in self-defense. To Professor Eccles he stated that science is science only because by it and through it we can predict the future, and that we learn not by success only, but even more by mistakes made. Individualism leads not to independence, but to slavery. Every atom above the mere stomach is social. Not individualism, not independence, but interdependence, is what we need.

Mr. Wakeman now rose to answer his critics. And Professor Eccles was his first victim. He wondered, he said, if man could learn nothing by experience, what the professor continued to come to the club for. And as for this third party, to which everything was right, and everything wrong, he could not see the good it was to the world. It reduced everything to zero, but zero is nothing; and indeed he was not surprised that the professor belonged to this nothing party that night, as always Professor Eccles had said nothing. As for Mr. Robertson, his statements were unmitigated nonsense. We are born into society and we can't get out of it. Would Robinson Crusoe, as he designated Mr. Robertson, swim across the river to get over to Brooklyn? He thought not, yet that was the only way he could get over there without the coöperation of society. Secede? Nonsense! We can't secede. And it won't do to fly in the face of society. He, the speaker, had always been in favor of free speech, and the hanging of the Anarchists he deemed but judicial murder. The Anarchists were but overgrown children; they needed a guardian, and he proposed to be one himself. As for artificial bonds, everything in social life is artificial, but not therefore unnatural. To the third speaker he answered that liberty does exist, yet not in the popular sense, only in the meaning of right of choice, and as such it is a growing end. To Professor Gunton he said that although mankind had made many mistakes, yet, as the professor could see from history, the mistakes were in the minority. The past is not all wrong. If it was, where would the professor be now? Individuality can be realized, and it is not each for each and all for all and the devil take the hindmost—and they are almost all hindmost—but it is, Each for All and All for Each. Here the professor interrupted, stating he had never said so, to which Mr. Wakeman retorted, "Don't interrupt a man in his prayers," a remark which was greeted with a hearty laugh by the audience.

Religious Hypnotism.

I read with great interest Mr. Spofford's article in THE TRUTH SEEKER entitled as above. I can fully understand it under its more ancient name, mesmerism, or impressible psychology. This phase of philosophy now under its more modern name is equally wonderful, but it is one and the same thing.

Mesmerism, or impressible psychology, is far from being a new discovery. It was lectured upon by Professor Britton, Dr. Bovee Dods, Professor Benton, and many others in New York city and Brooklyn in the years 1851–2, but under its original name.

Its prevailing influence in healing the sick and alleviating pain both mental and physical, before large audiences, was remarkable, and its singular antics were much the same as described by Mr. Spofford.

It would be well was mesmerism better understood among our savans. If so, it would account for many now inexplicable occurrences frequently transpiring in the human family, among animals and reptils, which are now known under the general term of fascination. I hav said better understood, but I must qualify this suggestion by saying hypnotism or mesmerism is a dangerous knowledge in the hands of unprincipled people.

Our great Doctor Franklin was in Paris when M. Mesmer was giving exhibitions of this peculiar quality in that place, and because the doctor and his learned associates could not be affected or influenced, they unitedly published and denounced Mesmer as an unblushing charlatan and fraud (vide Franklin's Letters). However, we can now afford to excuse the doctor; it was to him something so perfectly new.

The immortal Thomas Paine, some years subsequent, perhaps paying more and greater attention to the subject under more favorable auspices, decided more favorably as to its existence.

He thought the frantic outbreaks at revival meetings and Methodist outpourings could be solved upon their strange, unreasoning element. Mr. Paine himself was also conscious of a prompting influence pervading his own mind at times, when he was writing; and he confessed that it was an inspiration of these promptings he was indebted to for all that he knew. Read Paine's "Age of Reason."

Being an Spiritualist, it may be supposed I write from a Spiritual standpoint of observation. I think I can assert with confidence that all our advanced Spiritual thinkers rate mind as matter, but matter in an inconceivable state of sublimity, or attenuation; and assert too that henceforth our individuality never dies. Divine Vengeance from Heaven.

Who can hereafter say that God is a respecter of persons and does not slay the righteous with the wicked? Read:

The village of St. Mahlen, near Hildesheim, has been visited recently by severe hail storms which hav done a great deal of damage To-day the people gathered in a church to pray for a cessation of the storms. While the services were in progress a thunder storm came up and the church was struck by lightning. Four persons were instantly killed and twenty were injured, four being rendered completely blind The people were panic-stricken, and in the rush for the doors two children were crushed to death.

What was it that so offended the almighty? Was he angry because his children assembled to pray for a cessation of ruinous storms? How could he be, when he has promised that whatever is asked shall be received? Did their sin lie in dictating to the almighty maker and ruler of heaven and earth? No, no, not that, since every prayer is an intervention. Where, then, was the trouble? The prayer of the wicked is an abomination in the sight of the Lord. Were these people then exceedingly wicked, and did their intercessions exasperate their heavenly father beyond all endurance? Why, he smote them as if they had been in a vile dancehouse engaged in a bacchanalian revelry, cursing and swearing, instead of in the house of God in solemn prayers of faith, penitence, and distress! If he thus smites his faithful followers, how can the ungodly sinner escape? Can the Infidel and scoffer fare much worse? Does the Christian serve his God for naught? So it would appear as far as this world is concerned. Why did not God swoop down upon some wicked Infidel gathering, knock Robert Ingersoll sky-high, and scatter his blasphemous audience pellmell, and let his own children alone when they are worshiping him in fear and truth? I am amazed and puzzled by this great mystery of godliness. ELLA E. GIBSON.

The Jews and Christianity.

The common sense of the Jews has seen the follies and frauds of Christianity, and their courage has withstood its aggressions, even to the enduring of its abominable persecutions. Were the system founded in fact or sustained by reason, there could be neither motiv or reason to persecute. Having neither of these to start or sustain it, its votaries are driven to force, tortures, and the most fiendish murders to keep it alive. Absurd as much of the Old Testament is, it seems not to hav made its believers so intolerable as are the believers of the New. While it has had its sacrifices, it has kept free of a divine son from a virgin, put to death too by his own father. This is the center, the heart, the soul and life of Christianity. From such a fountain of bloody murder, what can be expected of the streams? Let the Spanish Inquisition, the St. Bartholomew's massacre, the burning of witches, answer. Should Protestants in their two hundred conflicting sects try to escape by denying Christianity to the Catholics, the answer is ready and overwhelming. The Catholic is the church, and the only church, their divine savior founded. To Peter, it is written, he gave the keys, and upon him, that rock, is his church built. By his successors are the keys yet carried, and will be so long as his church and his kingdom shall stand. Protestants are crumbling, Catholics strengthening.

But compared with Christians in all their numerous divisions and sects, the Jews are the better sort of people. Tested in all respects, they stand, Saul like, head and shoulders above the so-called New Testament order. They are one, united, and therefore stand, while the Christians professing to follow Christ are divided and must gradually fall. Besides, the Jews are the better friends of science, the more industrious; frugal, and less extravagant. Instead of being paupers or defaulters, they are generally independent, honestly meeting their contracts and debts. The notion has prevailed that they would not work, but gain their living exclusivly by trade. Such, however, is not the fact. Undertaking, as many do, a handicraft, they stick to it till it is well learned and independence acquired. So of agriculture, gardening, and horticulture. Near Vineland, N J, a large area of land, some years ago, was purchased in its nativ forest, settled by the Jews, cleared, improved, and cultivated to this day most successfully. Better citizens in that nor any other region New Jersey has not nor ever will hav. Even Quakers, being the most honest Christian sect, hav not quite equaled this colony. Besides, the orthodox Quakers are slumping down to the orthodox sects, losing nearly all their reform has gained, while the Jews are rising and advancing to less silly ceremony and above the absurdities of the Christian scheme. Progressing in Freethought, they are becoming more and more skeptical of their Bible. Its worst passages are being discarded, its best utilized in their lives. The influence of their scriptures has kept them back from the front rank in science, since Genesis and geology, revelation and evolution, must ever antagonize. Nevertheless, as revelation secedes from their mentality the Jews progress in nature and in her sciences. In this progressiv city they are among the more reliable and intelligent citizens. Unhampered by parties, sects, or prejudices, they converse, investigate, and act with hopeful freedom, tolerating errors so long as reason is left free to combat them. Hence we find encouragement in the prospect of their gradual reinforcement of our Liberal Freethought platoons, conquering our fellows the world over by the power of truth, kindness, and pure love. Items of Foreign Freethought News.

October 23 the case for blasphemy expressed in a funeral oration by Dr. Voelkel was overruled by the court in Naumburg; but to make up, two new indictments for twelve blasphemous expressions hav been brought against him in the courts of Mühlhausen and Neuburg.—Freireligiöses Sonntags-Blatt.

The German state church is fast losing her members. Almost every German paper announces that some families hav left the church; the last instance brought to our notice is in Schoenberg O-L, where fifty families left in a body and formed a free-religious society, for which Dr. Voelkel lectured the last week of October.

The trouble in the camp of the Swedish Freethinkers is more serious than we thought, and can but hurt the progress of the cause. We should not be at all surprised to find that the society has in the person of Mr. Berghell found another Axel Lindquist. We hav received quite a bulky package of papers and letters, and will in the next TRUTH SEEKER giv our readers a correct statement of the affair.

To giv our readers an idea of the branches taught and subjects discussed in Roman Catholic schools for young ladies, we know no better way than to giv the topics treated in an educational journal, Angelica Blatte, published by the Ursula nuns in Austria: "Do witches exist at the present time? Can certain prayers and gifts procure absolute forgivness of sins? Ought we to reverence the holy rosary more than we do? Can the situation of hell be geographically determined? Are wicked people actually roasted there over a brimstone fire? Will God smile upon and bless the person who procures a new subscriber for Angelica Blatte?"—Der Freidenker. And it is this kind of wholesome teaching that we may expect our children to get in the by and by, when the church gets the grip a little closer on our republic. Let us organize to effect an actual and total separation of church and state.

The Catholic church taken as a whole is a dangerous institution, but more dangerous than the rest is the Jesuit order, which never scruples to lie for the glory of God and the holy mother church. In the republic of Brazil the imperialistic and the clerical party hav combined to save said country from "Infidel government and unbelief," but the necessary holy enthusiasm has been wanting. To remedy this a telegram, said to be from Pope Leo XII., was produced by the Jesuits. The holy father sent in it his best wishes and the apostolic blessing to his dear children of the New Catholic party. It worked wonders. The clericals violated laws and defied the government, and at last the latter resolved to put a stop to the papal machinations, and through its embassador in Rome protested to the pope against his meddling in Brazilian affairs. Both the pope and his secretary declared that no telegram was sent by the former to Brazil and that on the contrary he was on the best terms with the republican government, which he wished all possible success, and that he had no desire to encourage the "Catholic party." When a pope says that he is on the best terms with a republican government, he must be badly off, and we trust the Brazilian government takes his expressions at their actual value, and looks out for further clerical machinations.—Das Menschenthum. GUSTAVE NELSON.

Wants Only True Liberals.

TO THE EDITOR OF THE TRUTH SEEKER, Sir: Reading carefully the proceedings of the Secular Union's fourteenth anniversary at Portsmouth, O., I find that a good many things hav been said, but in my opinion, and probably thousands of men's, the end looked for has not been accomplished. Why? The Secular Union is ready to take as members Christians, Jews, and gentiles if they are willing to say they are Liberals and subscribe to the Nine Demands. Now, the question is this, Are men and women, if they object to the teachings of the Bible, true Liberals? I say no. Why? Because a true Liberal in the acceptation of the term must be a moral man or woman—one that will stand up and liv an honorable life and induce their fellowmen to do the same. If that is accomplished we may hope that freedom of thought and the maxims of Thomas Paine and Robert Ingersoll will be reached and the end of Agnosticism fully accomplished. All I hav to say to the workers of the Secular Union is, be careful who subscribes! Test the character of men and women. By so doing you may do a good work, that will be beneficial and lasting.

Lectures and Meetings.

MISS ADA CAMPBELL has been reëngaged to lecture next Sunday, November 30th, for Friendship Liberal League, in Philadelphia. The subjects of the lectures hav not yet been announced. The hall at her lecture last Sunday evening was crowded to suffocation.

Christians Want to Boycott the World's Fair.

The Cumberland Presbyterian (Nashville) says: "We heartily join in the protest against the proposition to keep open the coming world's fair at Chicago on Sundays. It may be that these protests and petitions can be made emphatic and overwhelming enough to prevent this contemplated insult to the Christian religion, this formal abolition of the Sabbath, for it will amount to that. Those who are to decide the matter are supposed to be Christian men, and they may respect the united voice of Christian people. But to make our protests certainly effectiv they should carry with them something more than words. Make it certain that a Sabbath-breaking exposition will not pay and the exposition will not dare to break the Sabbath. Some stronger leverage than words and entreaties should be brought to bear on the managers. These managers must make the fair a financial success. The financial question with them is the tender nerve. The protest that touches that will be effectiv. If Christians cry out against Sabbath desecration, and yet pay their money, and send their exhibits, their cries will probably mean or effect little. Suppose every Christian in America should pledge himself to stay away from a Sabbath-breaking fair, and keep his money and goods away, would not that at once decide the question? But if Christian patronage is certain in either case, and if there is hope of a large addition to the income from Sabbath-breaking patronage, will not the directors be tempted to yield to the anti-Sabbath demand? It is certain that the fair cannot succeed without the presence and patronage of Christian men and women. No board of managers will dare take any step which will cause this to be withheld. Therefore the Christian people of this country hold the decision of this matter in their own hands. If we believe in the Sabbath strongly enough to demand its preservation, to boycott a fair that refuses to preserve it, it will be preserved."

TO E. M. I now take pen in hand to apprise you that the debt is discharged, the obligation fulfilled, and the promis kept. The subject of these remarks became a resident of California on the eighth day of the present month of November, and, I am informed, favors its father in the matter of sex. He was too late for election this year, but will vote in 1892, provided he is not himself a candidate for some high office. This Native Son of the Golden West was recognized at once as Eugene Leland Macdonald, although he has so far declined to acknowledge his identity. The mother is happier than she ever was before. She is also in her right mind, and I would that I could say as much for the father, who has been in a state of wild excitement since the eighth. In acquiring a son I fear that I hav lost many cherished friends among my male acquaintances on account of my inclination to thrust information upon them about said son. When they see me coming nowadays they make haste to get over on the opposite side of the street or to conceal themselvs where I cannot find them. Even my friend Burgman, the tailor, with whom for many months I hav been accustomed to exchange theosophic thought, now turns upon me a cold ear and a deaf shoulder, says good-bye, and skips around the corner at my approach. Christianity and Evolution.

CHAPTER V.

THE DOCTRIN OF ORIGINAL SIN.

Next to the doctrin concerning the divinity of Christ, probably the one which has engaged the largest amount of attention and been fraught with the most serious consequences is what is known as the doctrin of original sin.

For, after all, this doctrin is the root of the Christian tree. Abolish original sin, and Christianity has no raison d'etré.

What is this doctrin?

Briefly put, it is this.

About six thousand years ago God created man perfect.

But although perfect, he was endowed with what Christians term "a free will;" and by the exercise of this power the perfect man showed himself to be most imperfect, and on the very first day of his existence went irretrievably wrong by disobeying the command of deity.

From that moment man became a sinner, with the germs of human depravity sowed deeply in the human heart. Man could do nothing good of himself, not even think a good thought. All good deeds were accomplished by the aid of God.

Man being a sinner, he wanted a savior. That savior he found in Jesus Christ. Such briefly was the belief of the early Christians. In course of time, however, two other doctrins got attached to this one of original sin, viz., the doctrin of grace and predestination, and hav been for centuries associated therewith.

By many religionists these doctrins are so inextricably mixed up that they not only confuse the minds of believers, but clear thinkers hav some difficulty in separating them so that their value may be tested.

Calvinists carry the doctrin of original sin to the extent of saying that the whole race of mankind was so affected by Adam's sin that the whole of his posterity must suffer the consequences of it. In other words, that God was so exasperated at the sight of Adam disregarding his command that nothing would appease his wrath until he had revenge.

And so Christians maintained that all mankind deserved damnation—but that God in his infinit mercy sent a part of himself down to die in order that by the sacrifice of innocent blood the sins of mankind should be washed away.

Although Christ came to die and actually did die to save mankind, Christians still believe that nobody would be saved unless God had given them grace and predestined salvation for them before the foundation of the world.

And yet notwithstanding this doctrin of predestination—which means that God has mapped out the course of men's lives from the very beginning—they nevertheless talk of "free will," which is the very antithesis of such a doctrin.

It is interesting to learn how men first reconciled in their own minds such contradictory ideas, but according to a good authority (Dr. Priestley: "Corruptions of Christianity," p. 94) the early Christians first got their minds possessed in favor of some of these ideas after a very heated controversy, and the rest was gradually introduced by the more subtle-minded priests centuries after. Toward the end of the fourth century there occurred a great controversy called the Pelagian—in which the above-named doctrins were fiercely debated. Before this time, however, very little had been heard respecting them, but after this time they developed rapidly enough and ultimately became important dogmas of the church.

Most of the early fathers of the church seem to hav held the opinion that God was prepared to save all if man would but repent and forsake his evil ways. Even Justin Martyr could not accept the doctrin of predestination. "God," he said, "has not made man like trees and quadrupeds, who can do nothing from choice and judgment; for he would not be worthy of reward or praise if he did not choose what was good, but was made good, nor if he was wicked could he be justly punished, as not having been such of himself, but only what he had been made" (Apol. 1, Ed. Thirlly, page 65).

Clemens Alexandrinus believed in free will and repudiated the doctrin of predestination. Austin put the case even more strongly when he said: "No man can be justly condemned for doing that which he was not able to resist."

Origen believed in the freedom of the will, and considered that all men could be virtuous if they chose, and that the vicious were those who suffered the consequences of the abuse of free will.

Early in the fifth century, soon after Pelagius, an English monk, had made himself famous over the discussion above-named, a number of minor questions came up for consideration. One was the efficacy of baptism, some Christians maintaining that by baptism men's sins could be washed away. Pelagius opposed this superstition and suggested the washing of babies who were sinless, and maintained further the good Secular doctrin that good works alone were acceptable in the sight of God.

Pelagians, then, were the heretics of the fourth and fifth century, and they carried their heresy as far as affirming that they neither believed in the doctrin of predestination nor in that of internal grace. They also declared their belief that man does not die on account of the sin of Adam, but by the necessity of his nature.

These ideas made some progress during the next two centuries, but at various councils' meetings they were generally condemned.

In the ninth century some of these heresies were revived by a monk named Godeschalchus, who denied the efficacy of baptism, but contended that God had predestinated mankind—the majority to damnation; while the few would be saved through the efficacy of Christ's blood.

This latter doctrin met with opposition from one Rabanus Maurus, who was condemned by the council of Mayence and died in prison.

From the ninth to the sixteenth century, however, the doctrins of predestination, original sin, and grace grew considerably, and at the Reformation seemed to hav been adopted by Luther and his followers.

Calvin held these doctrins, and maintained them with such zeal and vigor that he got his name identified with them. Afterward the church abandoned some of them, and those Christians who clung tenaciously to them were known by the name of Calvinists.

Thus we see that the doctrins of the church hav not always been the same; that they are subject to the law of growth and decay. To-day it is doubtful what the opinions of the representativs of the church on these subjects really are. Of some it may be said that they maintain a mixture of both; they say that on the one hand God has predestined man's salvation from the beginning, but that man nevertheless possesses a free will—which is like saying man is free in the same sense as a bird in a cage. That he can move—but that his movements are circumscribed within certain limits. Man's will, however, is either free, or it is not; man's career is either mapped out for him by God, or it is not; and the uncertainty of Christians respecting the answer to these questions, shows that Christianity is not a definit, coherent system—but that every man is free to make his own creed so long as he still calls himself by the name of Christian.

ARTHUR B. MOSS.

Policy vs. Morality.

It is a frequent remark of Liberals that they do right for the sake of right. And doing right for this sake is called morality.

Now comes the question, Is man apt to do things for the mere sake of doing them, or for the effects, results, or consequences of doing them?

Every rational mind prior to a meditated action forms a mental forecast, more or less correct, of its consequences; otherwise it follows blindly an unanalyzed conviction that is a prompting of conscience.

Suppose men No. 1 and No. 2 refrain from stealing bread when they are hungry.

The only reason that No. 1 can giv is that it is not right to steal. No. 2 thinks to himself in this way: "If I steal that bread it may prove to be a very expensiv meal, and in the course of time my fellowmen will regard me much as the farmer regards the crow that steals his corn. I am no crow or rat, and before I hook that bread I will try to strike a job and make a dollar." Now, it is evident that No. 2 is quite a philosopher, and he proposes to try the easiest methods of obtaining the bread first before he hazards the consequences of stealing it. Of course No. 2 is acting the part of the policy man, but all that No. 1 can say is that his conscience says he must not. Conscience is something that No. 1 has had ever since he was a small boy. It constitutes several pages of his individual ancient history, which pages hav now become a sacred volume to him. He reads them over often, but he does not get down on his mental all fours and dig out their philosophy, if they hav any; the fact is, he never goes behind the returns in regard to anything.

Now, any Christian would be satisfied with No. 1's morality, while No. 2's morality seems quite satisfactory to the Infidel writer, while quite a number of Liberals occupy the intervening space between the Infidel and the Christian.

Now, we will throw the motivs of No. 1 and No. 2 into the same basket and call the basketful morality.

Along comes No. 3 who won't steal and No. 4, and we likewise pile their motivs into our basket. No. 3 combines the motivs of No. 1 and No. 2, while No. 4 is not hungry, thus he has no motivs at all either way, but we put them into the basket all the same.

Now, in examining the basketful of motivs we can put the reverend superstition on the right hand with the lambs, the policy on the left hand with the goats. But however we manipulate the contents of that basket we can only make out of it superstition and policy. Let us take another example. Suppose No. 5 contemplates committing a murder. Another fellow has cut him out in respect to his best girl, and he is mad, but he has three reasons for not committing the murder in question: 1. He fears his rival's ghost and other ghosts—superstition. 2. He considers that if he kills his rival the rest of the human race will hunt him down and kill him as they do other dangerous animals—policy. 3. It always made him feel faint to look at blood, and his sympathies further restrained him from committing the deed—sympathy.

Taking up other examples of morality, in every case we will find it made up of one or more of the three components, superstition, policy, and sympathy.

Now, why should the word morality as applied versus theft command any more respect than the word policy in the same connection? Ah! we recognize the superstitious element which givs policy its sanctity, and lo, it is no more policy but morality!

Even Liberals bow the head and almost bend the knee when before the shrine of morality, but policy they profess to scorn.

Find a man that clearly reasons out why he does not steal and his reasoning is the logic of policy.

Ask him why he does not murder and animal sympathy also has its piece to speak.

Policy is of man's reasoning parts, sympathy springs from his animal brain. Policy cultivates sympathy, and the two make what is called humanity. Teach a child to use policy in all his actions, and he will think out what his conduct had best be, and if his policy is far-sighted and wise, he will find that morality's record is not hard to beat; his policy will be the best—in fact, the rational morality—old-fashioned morality being only superstitious policy. Religion's contempt for earthly things is a part of her professed contempt for policy.

Policy is useful, but not ornamental, like morality.

Morality glitters with the badges of her high pedigree. She is the child of conscience, that still small voice, that ghostly, unsubstantial whisper, that as children we used to hear when we were bent on stealing pie. Yes, morality has the glitter, lots of it, but policy is the gold.

Freethought has dug the graves of Gods and devils—has shown that heaven, hell, and small hereafters pay no dividends of time to man.

But one little ghost, called conscience, still hangs round some very Liberal brains. That little ghost has never been guilty of one quality (virtue) that policy could not match. That little ghost prompted every persecution of a pious past. Therefore let us make a little grave for him beside his heavenly father's grave. And let the divine aristocracy, from great Jehovah down to the "still small voice," rest now and forevermore. Amen.

DR. C. E BOYNTON.

The Vagaries of Spiritism.

There is one very important fact our Spiritistic friends entirely ignore, viz., that consciousness and mind are always and solely concomitant with form or organized living bodies, and not otherwise.

But these being absolutely finite in duration, limited in time, ever beginning and ending, it is evident that, originating and co-existent with and dependent upon them, the mind must end when the forms are no more.

The theory of the intelligence of atoms, like the sexuality of atoms, must be consigned to the realms of absurdity, because both ignore the important fact that sex as well as mind necessitates form, or complex aggregation of atoms, to produce these various results.

The ultimate atom can no more be termed a form, than one stone can be termed a building which it requires thousands to construct. Now, all forms being finite, all atoms, by virtue of their physical and chemical attributes seeking their affinities, continually construct and compound forms, which, however, when evolved to a certain degree of perfection, by the immutable order of nature are destined to final disintegration, destructiv of their several forms of organic and inorganic life. Therefore it seems unreasonable to insist that one form of life is exempt from this universal order of nature, namely, man's mind, supposed to be incarnate as an "immortal spirit," and, as such, qualified to exist in eternal statu quo forever.

"Spirit," if real, must possess form. If formless it cannot exist, much less be a "spirit" and all it implies. If possessed of form it cannot be eternal. There is absolutely no analogy in nature for eternal, infinit forms. There is only one thing eternal—the ultimate atom, composing in infinit aggregation the universe. In its tout ensemble, in its universal whole—the infinit all—this alone is eternal.

In its detail, in its innumerable parts, the universe ever changes forms, evolves vegetable and animal life—rocks, worlds, suns, stars, and systems—all of which, however, after certain periods of existence are destined to destruction, disintegration, death, and absolute extinction as such forms. Crudely we may compare the universe to a huge kaleidoscope composed of countless million parts. We behold ever changing views and forms, yet the huge cosmic machine is forever the same.

And, upon this eternal evolution and involution, birth and death, growth and disintegration, building up and tearing down, formation and destruction, absolutely depends the eternal activity of the universe. Were all forms not destined to resolve back into their original elements, there would positivly be no motion, life, or potentiality in the universe now. All would be exhausted, completed, arrived at conditions of universal standstill, even an eternity ago. For if but one particle of matter were abstracted from its infinit whole every million of years to build up, construct, or evolve a single eternal form, a "spirit" exempt from the law of decay and death, and this process continued during all the ages of beginningless time, there would, indeed, be no universe now, but solely an infinit aggregation of such indestructible forms or "immortal spirits."

Therefore, it is self-evident to thinking minds—to men and women of brains who can, and are willing to, think—that the very existence of the universe depends upon the non-immortality of every form of life and the destructibility of all minor phenomena, the matter composing human forms being needed in its constituent elements to perpetuate the endless chain of eternal cosmic life.

Has the "immortal part of man" form? Spiritists must, and do, concede it has. Then let them define its character, and explain by virtue of what law of nature it is exempt from the universal order of nature which decrees that all forms must end.

As stated, "spirit" necessitates form, form necessitates constituents, constituents necessitate substance—matter. What are these constituents? Are they something or nothing? If something, they are material and subject to the laws of all material; if nothing, there are no "spirits."

"Spirits," then, are either material forms or nothing. If material, they must possess weight, consistency, form, color, occupy space, and be subject to the laws governing all material forms, paramount of which is—that all forms must end. But if real, why can "spirit" matter not be defined, produced in our schools of science, weighed, analyzed, seen, and grasped by our understanding?

But furthermore, if real, "spirits" must possess organic form. This self-evident proposition quiets forever all arguments intending to define "spirit" as forces or fluids similar to electricity, air, ether, magnetism, etc., all of which may be to a certain extent incomprehensible to man. But such inorganic forces or fluids, and organic beings, as "spirits" necessarily must be, hav nothing in common. No one claims that these are intelligent. But to resemble or to be a human being, possessing all the attributes and form of such a being during all eternity, necessitates a form similar to a human being, or we surely are confronted with a miracle. And it must be an organic form. But organic form necessitates anatomic form, for without anatomy there is no organic life. The leaf, flower, tree, infusoria, and all species of animal and vegetable life possess an anatomy as real as that of a horse, ox, or man. The difference is one of degree only. But anatomy is not thinkable without matter—actual, real, visible substance. It may require a pretty strong microscope, but if it exists, it is visible to man. This anatomy then, like man's, must be composed of constituents—lime, sulphates, oxygen, nitrogen, etc. But every grain of this matter composing man, at death is laid away under the sod. If man, when he draws his last breath, weighs one hundred and fifty pounds, six ounces, and fifteen grains, he still, after "his spirit has escaped," will weigh one hundred and fifty pounds, six ounces, and fifteen grains.

It is absolute then that man's "spirit" does not weigh a grain. What then is this "spirit?" What constitutes his form? What shapes his spiritual anatomy? What material is it, unknown to science, that can organize itself into a living human form—that can assume the shape of a beautiful woman, with rosy cheeks, ivory teeth, golden hair, etc.—yet not occupy space, not weigh a grain, indestructible in its organic form, and exist beyond reach of microscope, telescope, scalpel, crucible, and evade the search of a vast majority of the ablest minds in existence?

Human hair is composed of certain constituents. These constituents are absent in the "spirit"—buried. What is spiritual hair composed of? What constitutes spirit teeth, eyes, flesh, blood, and bones? Are not the substances producing teeth, flesh, blood, and bones originally in the body, an absolute necessity to their existence? Then how in the name of reason can spirit teeth, etc. (and all "spirits" hav teeth), exist without this substance? What produces the brilliancy of the eye, the warmth of flesh and breath, the circulation of the life fluid, in the absence of all the essential elements necessary to their existence?

Life necessitates blood or circulating fluids. Without circulation there is no organic life in plant, tree, beast, or man. What causes life within the spirit body? What circulates in it to make life possible? And in what does it circulate? Is a living body thinkable without blood, veins, arteries, etc., or are these thinkable in "spirit form?"

Life necessitates lungs. "What does not breathe does not liv," is a maxim of science. But the lungs of man are also laid away in the grave. How can a spirit man or woman breathe without lungs, or if possessed of breathing apparatus, what is it made of and why does it weigh not a single grain and be invisible to our senses?

In short, a spirit resembling a human being necessitates flesh, blood, bones, lungs, heart, stomach, brain, and all. Without all these, I insist; a "spirit," resembling a human form, is utterly unthinkable. But, in the alleged "spirit," all these are positivly absent. Nothing tangible is substituted to take its place. How can man then continue to exist when all that is necessary to make a man exists in another form?

The idea of spirit existence is the giant delusion of the world. Its source is ignorance, egotism, and deception. Ignorant of the actual processes of the complex human form generating mind and sensation, they hav divested it of all powers of sensation and volition and invested an invisible, unknowable, unthinkable "spirit" form, or nothing, with powers to think. Not knowing how man thinks, they hav from nothing built up a nothing, of which, however, they know absolutely nothing, and which is nothing, but which, they insist, can do all the thinking and reasoning which the material man cannot do. "How foolish," they say, "to assert that dead matter can think;" entirely ignoring the fact that, though the mental process evolved from the human body may not be fully understood, yet in man we behold the climax of nature's achievements, the crowning work of nature, whose capabilities physically and mentally are indeed not yet fully revealed to himself, but that to divest him of his powers of volition and invest an unknown nothing or an airy nothing with such capabilities is, to say the least, unreasonable. And postulating an invisible man within visible man to do the thinking, is greatly complicating the problem.

But they are blinded by their delusion. Like theists, who postulate an unknown nothing to create and govern the universe when they do not know how it governs itself, they hav solved the problem to their entire satisfaction and insist, "our immortal spirits do it all." But how our "spirits" do it all they sadly fail to make clear. Is volition, mind, etc., any less of a mystery after positing a spirit body inside the physical body? How does this body think? I transpose their exclamation: "How foolish to assert that this spirit body can think and reason!" "There must be another invisible spirit within this body, and another in this, ad infinitum!" Are we any nearer a solution to existing problems by positing an unknown God as the ruler of the universe or an unseen "spirit" as the ruler of man?

Egotism has blinded our friends, blunted their perception and made them unreasonable. Invented in the dark ages by a cunning priesthood, to make their services valuable and to rob men of their money, these ideas hav gained in strength in the course of ages from the fact that they promised conditions of continuous happiness never attainable on earth. It flattered their vanity and pleased their egotism. The wish gave strength to their faith and millions were lured into accepting it as a fact, simply because they wished it to be true. And this is the source of its strength now, in spite of its unreasonableness and impossibility.

The more we endeavor to grasp the idea the more effectually it vanishes. We hav an idea, but when we apply reason, it explodes. When we reach out our hand we clasp one of flesh and blood or none. When we think of our loved ones we hav lost we must think of them as invested with the physical form, or, alas! they are creatures of fancy, hallucination—nothing!

State Schools or Church Schools.

From the Sun.

The conference of Protestant ministers and laymen which discussed the subject of religion in the schools at the university building on Tuesday, ended by adopting a report sustaining the principle of the separation of church and state, and yet demanding that "the practical truths of religion shall be inculcated in the public school system."

What are the practical truths of religion which are so far beyond the domain of controversy that they may be inculcated without stirring up partisan religious opposition? Even all the ethical teachings of Christianity are not accepted universally as sound and salutary. A distinguished Jewish writer assails the Christian doctrin of non-resistance as subversiv of the dignity and manliness essential to a character deserving of respect. Human progress, he contends, would be impossible if the command to take blows and insults without resentment were actually obeyed by Christians. The Jews, too, are among those who are most interested in the public schools, and every year we find the Jewish pupils taking the lead in proficiency and good conduct.

Why was this conference of Tuesday participated in by Protestants only if the religious teaching it asked for would be satisfactory to the whole body of Christians themselvs? The Roman Catholics were not represented, though the chief obstacle in the way has been the inability of Protestants and Catholics to come to an agreement as to what the essential practical truths are.

Meantime the parents, who seek for the instruction of their children at the public cost, are not concerning themselvs about the matter. The trouble with thousands of them is rather to find room for their children in the schools. The applications for admission increase with the growth of the population, while in this town the school accommodations do not keep pace with it, but are insufficient, notwithstanding the multiplication of private, charitable, and parochial schools.

Those parents know very well that the instruction must be wholly secular or wholly religious. The demand of religion is not that it shall be recognized in education as a desirable auxiliary, but that it shall shape and control the whole as the most essential object of pursuit. It is false to itself if it does not so demand, and subordinate the eternal to the temporal. If it is true, education without it is vain. If it enters into the school at all, it must come as the master and not as the servant. The state must bow in subordination to the church. State schools must be abolished, and church schools must be substituted.

In other words, the introduction of religion into the schools means the overthrow of the whole public school system. They cannot be state schools unless they are purely secular, and they cannot be religious schools without becoming purely church schools.

The practicable way of overcoming the religious opposition is to make the state instruction of the most elementary kind only, leaving the church and private enterprise to provide whatever else is desired by individuals. It is also the only way consistent with our theory of government. The trouble has come from the state's undertaking to do more than it has the authority to do.

Functions of Public Schools.

From the World.

A strong and influential ecclesiastical body in this state has addressed itself to like bodies representing other denominations in an effort to secure some agreement among the several churches upon a simple scheme of instruction in the fundamental doctrins of religion which all can urge for adoption in the public schools.

The Baptist Ministers' Association has declined to join in the movement upon the perfectly sound ground that it is not the business of the state to teach religion at all or in any form in schools maintained by taxation. Thus, at the outset, an important denomination declines to accept the proposal, and even if all the churches were agreed concerning it there would still be a large body of citizens and taxpayers to whom the proposal would be obnoxious, and these hav rights equal to any others.

Any scheme of the kind would be attended by serious danger to the schools, and probably by bitter controversies. But the fundamental objection is that the teaching of religion in a republic which emphasizes the separation of church and state is not and can never be a function proper to the state.

The same objection applies in a less but still a considerable degree to the alternativ suggestion of the Baptist ministers that the school shall teach morals. If by this no more is meant than that theft, lying, etc., shall be shown to be wrong and shameful, that is done already both by precept and by the ordinary disciplin of all the schools. But if the proposal means that some form of systematic morals shall be taught the question at once arises of the "sanction" of morals. Upon what shall the system to be taught be founded? If upon the Bible, the teaching becomes theological at once, involving not only the question of scriptural inspiration and authority, but a hundred other questions of interpretation. If it is founded upon any authority outside of the Bible or the church, that very fact would make the teaching obnoxious in the highest degree to all those who regard such teaching of morals as directly antagonistic to religion. In either case wrong would be done.

Clearly the right thing is to confine the public schools rigidly to their proper function of giving secular education, leaving the matter of instructing children in religion and systematic morals to their parents, pastors, Sunday-school teachers, and others specially charged with that duty. With such teaching the state has nothing whatever to do, and properly can hav nothing to do.

The Protestant Attack Upon Our Schools.

Five years ago the Presbyterian synod appointed a committee to work to get the Bible and the Christian religion into all the schools of the state. What this committee had accomplished up to last year was printed in The Truth Seeker. This year public work of the committee culminated in an invitation to all other denominations besides the Presbyterian to send delegates to a conference to be held in this city Monday and Tuesday of last week. Of the fourteen denominations to which the invitation was extended, the Disciples of Christ, Congregationalists, Episcopalians, Independents, Lutherans, Methodists, Presbyterians, Reformed Dutch, Reformed Episcopalians, and Reformed Presbyterians replied that they would send delegates; the Unitarians, United Presbyterians, and Universalists made no reply, and the Baptists, through their New York State Pastors' Conference, held at Lockport on October 28th and 29th, unanimously decided by a rising vote not to take any part in the movement. Their reasons for declining to take part in the conference are worth giving, and the sect deserves credit for its abstention on such legitimate grounds. These reasons are set forth in the following resolutions:

"We believe that it is a manifest injustice to tax those who do not believe in religion for the maintenance of schools in which are taught religious principles which they do not wish their children to learn; and further, that the inauguration of such a system of religious teaching in our public schools forms a valid argument for the division of the school funds with those who might not relish such teaching, thus resulting eventually in state support of schools in which the creed of Agnosticism, Buddhism, Confucianism, Judaism, or Romanism might be taught.

"We believe that the state ought not to teach religion, because this would mean, in our age, religious instruction by unregenerate persons who do not know what true religion is, and whose instruction would in a large degree be marked by hypocrisy, formalism, irreverence, and error. We do not wish such persons to instruct our children religiously. The state should teach only that on which all are agreed, and should not invade matters of conscience or religious opinion. If the state may teach religion in schools the state may teach religion in churches of her own establishment. It is only on this broad ground that we can oppose those who would subtly instil Romanism or the creed of Agnosticism into our public instruction."

Without stopping to ask the Baptists what the "creed" of Agnosticism is—a question they would hav difficulty in answering—we hasten to assure them that they are on the right road. All people must hav equal privileges in institutions which all support, and if evangelical Protestantism is to be taught in the schools, then Atheism, Romanism, Judaism, and all other isms must hav equal opportunity at the children.

The religious instruction which the Presbyterians and those who agree with them desire to be taught in our schools is comprised in these assertions:

The existence of a personal God.

The responsibility of each soul to God.

The immortality of the soul.

The reality of a future state of rewards and punishments.

The authority of the Ten Commandments and of the Sermon on the Mount.

These are considered common Christian tenets and their teaching would be considered unsectarian. To this end, the synod asks for a law "suitably providing for the incorporation with the school curriculum, as an essential part of it, of these theistic truths."

Roman Catholics were also invited to this conference, but they also took no part in it. Away back in 1885, Vicar-General Preston, replying for Archbishop Corrigan to a similar invitation, set forth that church's views as follows:

"The most reverend archbishop desires me in his name to say, in response to your letter, that the Catholic church has always insisted, and must always insist, upon the teaching of religion with education. For this reason we cannot patronize the public schools, and are forced to establish our own parochial schools. The question, where there are many different denominations, each with its own creed, is a difficult one to settle. We could be satisfied with nothing less than the teaching of our whole faith. Protestant denominations, if they value their own creeds, ought to feel as we do. Denominational schools are to our mind the only solution of the question. This plan should satisfy everyone, and would save the state a vast outlay of expense.

"The points you propose, while better than none, would never satisfy us, and we think they ought not to satisfy many of the Protestant churches; while the Infidels, who are now very numerous, would certainly reject them.

"We believe that the country will yet see the ruinous effects of an education from which religion has been excluded."

There were many speeches made at this conference, and the drift of the affair may be gathered from the subjects under discussion—"How Far Does Expediency Dictate that State-supported Schools Should Inculcate the Principles of Morals and Religion?" "What Should Be the Ground and Character of the Instruction in Morals in Our Public Schools?" "What Should this Conference Do to Carry Out Its Views Upon This Subject?" and others of the same nature. The most dangerously revolutionary and Anarchistic address was by William Allen Butler, his subject being, "What Do Our Constitution and Laws Hold as to Religious Teaching in the Public Schools?" Our public schools, he said, are a part of the general system of government in this state; and their management constitutes a department which must be administered in the same manner as every other department of the government, in view of the Constitution and the law of the land governing all the relations of the people to each other as members of society. With this position as a base, Mr. Butler went on:

"Viewed in this light, we find that while there is in this state an absolute divorce of church and state and a controling mandate against interference by the state with the freedom of religious opinion and worship, there is not, and never has been, any divorce between Christianity and the state, or between the state government in its administration and the Christian religion as revealed in the scriptures. On the contrary, it was settled long ago, and cannot now be disputed, that Christianity is a part of the common law of this state as it was a part of the common law of England at the time when New York ceased to be a colony of Great Britain and became a sovereign state. . . .

"Custom, which is largely the source of law and the interpreter of its intent, makes the Christian religion a part of the orderly conduct of affairs in the administration of the government. The daily sessions of our state legislature are opened with prayer offered by Christian ministers, a recognition by the legislativ department of the government, which most nearly represents the people, of Christianity as the religion of the people, and, as already remarked, a sound public opinion upholds in many parts of the state religious exercises in the schools.

"This being the case, it seems plain that in the administration of that department of the government which relates to public instruction regard must be had to the existence of the Christian religion as a part of the general law and to its practical operation as a chief factor in the order and well-being of society, as well as to the proper safeguards against interference with freedom of opinion as to all matters of religious belief, faith, or practice.

"This recognition of the Christian religion as a part of the law is a wholly different thing from setting up or inculcating opinions, creeds, or doctrins based on human interpretation of the scriptures, or on any human authority. There is certainly nothing in the constitution or laws of this state which prevents such a recognition or which debars the department of public instruction from giving it practical effect in the daily exercise of the schools so far as to sanction the reading of the scriptures without note or comment, the use of the Lord's prayer, and, under proper safeguards, the inculcation, without admixture of human doctrin, of Christian morals, i.e., the precepts of the decalog as perpetuated by Christianity.

"If, as the courts hav held, the Christian religion is in fact a part of the law under which we liv, then, although we hav no established church, we hav an established religion based on a divine revelation, any malicious aspersion of which, or of its divine author and founder, constitutes a crime against society. The institutions of this religion are protected and enforced by law. On the plainest principles of public policy in a state thus maintaining and enforcing the Christian religion as a part of its customary and declared legal organization, public instruction ought to be Christian and the Christian religion should be recognized and made manifest, not by way of doctrin deduced from its scriptures or interpretation of their meaning, but in attestation of the fact of its supremacy as a constituent part of the law of the land.

"The legal status of the public schools in this state, therefore, includes the existence and controling power of the Christian religion, not as a doctrin, but as a fact. Opinions about religion, or the authority of the scriptures, in whole or in part, or the proper translation or interpretation of their original text, hav nothing to do with this established fact, which inheres in the social organization and government of the state, and which in every department of that government should hav due recognition. It is conceded that good morals should and do necessarily go hand in hand with good education, but it is not conceded by all, and it is denied by many, that any positiv assertion of the binding force of the Christian religion, or its precepts, can be admitted in the public schools. . . .

"If the views above expressed are correct, the question to which they relate may properly be answered by the statement that the constitution and law of this state authorize religious teaching in the public schools so far as to secure a recognition, in the administration of that part of the state government to which the care of the schools is confided, of the Christian religion as revealed in the holy scriptures, as part of the actual law of the land, binding upon all our citizens.

"This will warrant the reading of the scriptures without note and comment, the use of the Lord's prayer, and such inculcation of Christian morals, free from any instruction as to religious doctrins or opinions, as shall serve to impress upon the minds of the pupils the difference between right and wrong in human conduct and affairs, and the rules which should govern the dealings and intercourse of men in a community where the Christian religion is a constituent part of the established law."

It will be seen from these remarks that Mr. Butler is a reactionist of a very dangerous type, and that the organization which supports his position is one not helpful to freedom and liberty of expression. Time was when his statements would hav been held tenable and true, but that time has passed. The country has outgrown the colonial period of its existence, when it took its all from England; and though the old common law is too often quoted in our courts, happily on this one point the people hav decided that it does not apply. Fossilized judges sometimes quote it, it is true, but they are in the minority. The people are making a new "common law," and that is that religion of any sort has nothing to do with the state.

There is, however, one statement in Mr. Butler's address of peculiar significance. It is this: "If, as the courts hav held, the Christian religion is in fact a part of the law under which we liv, then, although we hav no established church, we hav an established religion based on a divine revelation, any malicious aspersion of which, or of its divine author and founder, constitutes a crime against society." Here we hav the foundation for blasphemy laws, the foundation for dungeons for heretics, the kindling of the auto-dä-fé. It seems strange in these days to hear this voice from the tombs crying that the state should punish the heretic, and enforce the institutions of Christianity! Has Mr. Butler been asleep for two hundred years and just woke up? What manner of men are these Presbyterians?

Of the efforts of these sects to get their peculiar doctrins firmly established by law in our schools we hav often spoken. The efforts are not without danger to the people, though the tendency of the times is toward farther separation of church and state rather than toward closer union. The Catholics are a factor to be reckoned with, and no compromise with them seems possible. By and by, perhaps, in return for state money for Catholic parochial schools, the Romanists may be willing to turn the public schools over to the Protestants; but as this means the destruction of the schools, the public, which is in neither house, will then be heard. We do not believe the American people will ever surrender the schools in such fashion.

The Picture Book in Canada.

When Watson Heston designed the pictures which hav illumined the first page of THE TRUTH SEEKER for the past four or five years, he had no idea that he was doing an immoral act.

The photo-engraving establishment which completed them would undoubtedly disclaim the charge.

And when we printed them in the paper and then arranged them in book form it certainly never flitted through the editorial mind that anything immoral was being done.

Mr. John Herring, manufacturer of agricultural implements, at Napanee, Ont., liked the pictures so well that he ordered, paying cash therefor, two copies of the book. In doing this, he also had no thought of being immoral and infracting the Canadian law.

But it seems we were all wrong, according to the collector of customs at Napanee, as per the following, addressed to Mr. Herring, but by implication making confederates in crime of the other parties:

"CUSTOMS DEPARTMENT,
"OTTAWA, November 3, 1890.

"SIR: The Collector of Customs, Port of Napanee, Ont., having reported to me that a seizure has been made from you on the 31st day of October, 1890, of the following, viz.: 2 Copies of a printed and bound Book entitled 'The Freethinkers' Pictorial Text-Book,' for an infraction of the Custom Laws of Canada, the said book being of an immoral character and therefore prohibited from importation into Canada; Wherefore take notice that if such Seizure be maintained, the said book or moneys if accepted on deposit in lieu thereof, become liable to forfeiture, and each party concerned in such infraction of the law subject to penalties under the provisions thereof."

Mr. Herring was given thirty days to make reply to this formidable charge, which he has done as hereunto subjoined, both to the commissioner at Ottawa and to the public in an open letter printed in a journal at Napanee:

"DEAR SIR: I see by the papers that a seizure of immoral literature by our argus-eyed customs collector, G. M. Elliott, has been pretty well advertised throughout the country, and as many who read the notice might think there was a foundation for the statement, and my name having been given in connection with it, allow me to request the publication of the following letter in reply to the notice and oblige:

"TO THE COMMISSIONER OF CUSTOMS, Ottawa, Dear Sir: I am in receipt by mail of the notice sent me of the action of G. M. Elliott, collector of customs at Napanee, of the seizure of what is termed the 'Freethinkers' Pictorial Text-Book.'

"I ordered a copy from THE TRUTH SEEKER office, New York, but as I hav not had the pleasure of perusing it, I cannot say as to its contents.

"I fail however to see in the title anything to warrant the collector of customs showing the iron hand by seizure and dubbing the work 'immoral, seditious, treasonable.' I am judging from appearance now when I say I believe it is as much of one as the other and nothing of either. My judgment of its contents comes from the heading as advertised, and I feel convinced that the book does not contain matter beyond the Bible quotations, that any unprejudiced reader will take exceptions to as 'immoral, seditious, treasonable.'

"I am not a newsdealer, but a private gentleman, and purchased the volume for my own information with no expectation of anything of this sort following.

"I appreciate Mr. Elliott's desire to maintain morality, but must apply the scripture passage of 'straining at a gnat and swallowing a camel.'

"I quite understand your duties to report upon the merits of the seizure and evidence in rebuttal in your report to the minister of customs, and shall be quite willing to yield to his decision. I cannot for a moment think the narrow view taken by the official here will influence that decision. All men in Canada cannot be clothed in black or their garments made from the same pattern. Upon the subject of church and state it is desirable or at least permissible to become informed.

"The large number of authors quoted in this volume who hav achieved reputations so grand as to be taken as guides by millions of men cannot in truth be classed as making 'immoral, treasonable, and seditious' statements.

"If this seizure is to be made a test case, it will assume an importance beyond its deserts.

"In any event I hav confidence that the heads of the department will look at it as statesmen representing the nation, yielding freedom without stint in the matter of opinion, not in the narrow groove of sects or bigots, but rather in the broad light of intelligent freedom.

"I am, dear sir,
"Yours respectfully, JOHN HERRING."

Mr. Herring, being a citizen of Canada, constrained himself to write more respectfully of the Napanee customs authorities than we can, for having edited the book and knowing what it contains, there seems to us no name for the collector who calls it immoral so fit and perfectly applicable as Perfect, Absolute, and Hopeless Idiot. Had we been disposed to quote from the Bible we could hav made the book of such a character as to come under the collector's definition; but some of the language of holy writ will never defile pages of ours. Therein are we away up in the top branches of the tree while the collector is wallowing in the mud at the roots. There is not in the book, from first page to last, a word or a picture that tends to immorality. The whole tendency of the work, on the contrary, is to warn people away from the paths trod by such men as Solomon—in the matter of collateral wives—and to also warn the parsons away from the alluring baits dangled before them by their enemy the devil. The book also shows the evil effects of Bible "temperance" and other teachings, the abuses of the union of church and state, the absurdity of theology, and the untruthfulness of the church's claim to be a divine and beneficent institution. The authorities quoted are all good men and women, most of them eminent as historians and philosophers. And for anyone to say the book is immoral is to write himself down an ass.

Mr. Herring does not propose to submit to the narrow and prejudiced decision of the Napanee collector, but will defend his right to select his own books. It seems impossible that the Ottawa authorities will sustain the Napanee subordinate, but as ridiculous things hav happened in Canada. That, however, will not prevent Canadians from reading the book if they so desire.

The Pre-Millennialists.

A daily paper of this city double-leads a column of editorial consideration of the pre-millennium views of many evangelical Christians, which views, it asserts, are very common now, as shown by a Baptist convention recently held in Brooklyn to discuss the subject. The program of the second coming of Christ is thus outlined by the journal aforesaid: "This expectation is very different from the confidence which led Miller to predict the precise date of the second coming fifty years ago. The present millennialists do not undertake to cipher out from the prophecies of scripture the exact day of the reappearance of the Lord. They merely interpret the signs and portents of this particular period as indicating that the beginning of his earthly reign approaches. They look for it in this century, perhaps, more certainly in the early part of the next century. The prevailing opinion among them, too, is that the coming of the Lord will precede the millennium, and not follow it. They are pre-millennialists, as contradistinguished from the post-millennialists, who believe that the second advent will follow the thousand years of peace and happiness, during which all mankind will be brought into the way of truth and godliness. Their argument is that sin and iniquity were never more powerful than now, though Christian activity is greater than ever, and that the time has come when the Lord must appear in person to gather out from the prevailing wickedness his hard-pressed and sorely tempted followers, and to take them up with him into the air. The dead in Christ will be translated first, and then the living saints."

Of course, holding this belief, the second adventists, or millennialists, believe that they are occupying themselvs with the only subject which is of any importance to mankind. Thus thinking, it is a matter of astonishment to the daily paper that the pre-millennialists are "going about their way as usual, selling and buying, eating and drinking, and drawing their salaries with promptness, though the awful event is so near at hand. We cannot understand it. They are straining their ears to hear the notes of the awful trump, and yet in their worldly affairs they are proceeding like the rest of the people, who expect to liv and die in the old way."

To this the popular small boy would say: "Huh! it's easy enough!" And we agree with the small boy; it is an easy thing to remove the wonder from the occurrence. The pre-millennialists do not really believe what they profess to believe. To really believe in the literal second coming requires the scriptural test, which no Christian in the world ever could stand—If ye hav faith as big as a grain of mustard seed, you can remove mountains. No Christians really believe the whole of the New Testament, which is plainly seen in their avoidance of serpents and deadly things. And the pre-millennialists are like other Christians. They profess to believe, will dispute and argue over texts, and make great fuss and pretensions, but when it comes down to honest faith they possess it not.

Another thing. Experience has made the second adventists cautious. When the Millerite craze was upon the people, along in the forties, many of the victims gave away their property, in most instances to the preachers of their very faith, and these preachers not only took it but kept it when the Lord failed to keep his appointment with them. But the people know more now than they did then, especially about Christianity; and the experience has not been valueless. The pre-millennialists may rave over their religion as loudly as a Methodist exhorter at a revival, but they will hang on to their worldly possessions as tightly as a parson clings to the contribution-box!

Testing the Sunday Laws.

The Seventh Day Adventists hav engaged Don M. Dickenson, of Wisconsin, who was postmaster-general under Cleveland's administration, to test the constitutionality of Sunday laws in the United States Supreme Court. The test case will be that of R. M. King, of Obion county, Tenn., who was arrested on a charge of violating the "Sabbath Day" by plowing in his field. He was tried in the state circuit court and convicted; he then appealed to the state supreme court, which sustained the lower court, and he was sent to jail.

Mr. King has now been released on a writ of habeas corpus, issued by Judge Hammond of the federal court. The petition stated that he was illegally imprisoned in the county jail of Obion county, by virtue of an alleged mittimus issued by the circuit court clerk of Obion. He claimed that he was falsely imprisoned and deprived of his liberty contrary to the fourteenth Amendment to the Constitution of the United States. The case was to come up on the 24th instant. Through this case Mr. Dickenson proposes to examin into the matter of the prosecution of the Seventh Day Adventists for Sabbath-breaking throughout the country. He will, if possible, devise some means of testing the validity of conviction in states especially where the prosecutions hav savored of religious persecution. The case of Mr. King is to be made a test case, and, no matter what the decision of Judge Hammond may be, an appeal will be taken to the United States Supreme Court.

The Advent claim is that the Sunday laws of the various states are unconstitutional, as abridging the privileges and immunities of citizens of the United States, and depriving persons of liberty and property, and denying them equal protection of the laws, inasmuch as discrimination is made between the keepers of the seventh day and the observers of the first. At first flush, this would seem to be a valid claim, and that so eminent a lawyer as Mr. Dickenson has gone into the case is some evidence that lawyers so regard it.

If the Adventists win it will be worse for the Christians than the "original package" decision was for the Prohibitionists. It is of course impossible to say how a court will twist around a subject, but if it shall declare that Sunday laws are not enforcible upon those who hold sacred a different day from the majority, it seems hard to believe that it will not necessarily hold such laws non-enforcible also upon those who hav no sacred day at all. The outcome of this case will be watched with absorbing interest by every Freethinker in the country.

THE Rev. J. B. Converse, of Morristown, Tenn., publishes the Christian Patriot for the purpose of convincing the world that the Bible settles all political as well as spiritual matters. To find out if other people think as he does, he prints in his paper seven questions—Does the Bible illumin questions of public policy? Can what it says be learned without prayer and study? Should Americans pray to God to teach them how to vote? and so on. The Editor of THE TRUTH SEEKER answered them, but evidently not to Mr. Converse's satisfaction, for he prefaced the publication of the answers with this comment: "Mr. E. M. Macdonld, editor of THE TRUTH SEEKER, 'a journal of Freethought and reform,' has very kindly sent us an answer to 'the seven questions.' We will venture the assertion that Mr. Macdonald has not read through the Bible—about which he speaks so dogmatically—in the last five years. If he will read it through carefully, marking on the margin every passage that refers to labor, to government, and to wages (consulting the commentaries when he is in doubt as to the meaning of any text), we will giv him a silk hat; and that hat will contain more sense than any hat he ever wore." This is indeed a generous offer, but we would like to transfer it to Mrs. Colman. At the American Secular Union Congress she confessed that she had just read the Bible through, verse by verse, and she incidentally remarked that it is the worst book she ever read. Let Mr. Converse send her the best bonnet she ever wore and we will guarantee that it will go on a head already containing more sense than any head holds which imagins that a book written from twenty-five to sixteen hundred years ago can be a moral or economical guide for the people of a republic in this age.

MR. EDITOR: You will find inclosed order for $9—$5 to pay up the old score and $4 for two copies of the "Pictorial Text-Book." These are times which try men's, and women's souls too, here in the West, with about a sixty per cent crop, and the advance on goods caused by the McKinley tariff bill passed. We can hardly see our way clear for the next twelve months. We had hoped to send you a subscriber, but cannot just yet. Success to THE TRUTH SEEKER.

MRS. E. WILLCOX.

BRUNSWICK, Mo., Nov. 13, 1890.

MR. EDITOR: I write to tell you that another stanch Liberal has left the ranks. On Wednesday, the 5th of November, William Tyler, aged 78 years 7 months and 5 days, died at his home near Brunswick. He died as he had lived, a Liberal to the last, although all the Christians around here thought he would repent when it was too late. His body was taken to St. Louis and cremated, according to his wish, by his wife and lawyer. He leaves a wife and two married daughters to mourn his loss. He was a loving father and husband, and a stanch friend to all who were in distress.

A FRIEND.

WILBER, NEB., Nov. 14, 1890.

MR. EDITOR: Herewith I send $2 for the "Pictorial Text-Book." I want the "Text-Book" to show my Christian friends Heston's handwriting on the wall of this republic that they may see portrayed the possible condition of their children after Rome takes possession of all the chestnuts that the Woman's Christian Temperance Union is burning its fingers to rake out of the fire. They tell me I will certainly be set over and counted with the goats in the sweet by and by. So be it; I tell them perhaps if Porter enumerates, some of the sheep may get left.

ALEX. MOOBERRY.

LUMBERVILLE, PA., Nov. 18, 1890.

MR. EDITOR: Inclosed please find check for $8.50 for the picture book and other works. Although I am too well supplied with daily and weekly papers, so much so that all my time is devoted to the current news of the day, to the great neglect of many interesting books that I should read, still, being an earnest Liberal, I must do my part to sustain THE TRUTH SEEKER, and thereby aid in the advancement of Freethought. If our pioneers are not supported, the rear guard will never be brought up to the point of attack, and that point is the brazen front of religious intolerance. Send catalog of your books.

Yours for advance, WATSON KENDERDINE.

PRINCETON, KY., Oct. 27, 1890.

MR. EDITOR: I hav made a great deal of effort to get one or more additional subscribers to THE TRUTH SEEKER, but I cannot do it. There are two or three men here who are Liberal in their views but are so timid that they dare not read a Freethought paper.

I inclose also a newspaper clipping relativ to the "location of the soul" which is very remarkable, and new to me. I should like to hav your opinion or that of some readers on the subject of the location of the soul, expressed in THE TRUTH SEEKER.

I also inclose under separate cover a statement of the untaxed property (itemized) in the city of Louisville, Ky. This furnishes further evidence of the great unfairness of exempting church property from taxation.

Respectfully yours, O. P. ELDRED.

BUTTE, MONT., Oct. 28, 1890.

MR. EDITOR: I hav been doing my mite for Freethought here. I will send you a copy of the Boulder Age. Mr. Will Kennedy, editor and proprietor, is a friend of mine. I hav marked two pieces to draw your attention, and hope you will giv them an editorial or notice. Mr. Kennedy is the father of our Australian system of voting in Montana, served two terms in the state legislature, and is now a candidate for state senator. I should like to see you exchange papers with him. I hav sent him a copy of THE TRUTH SEEKER at different times, and if he will exchange papers with you I think he will get more interested, and would be a good, live worker for our cause. We had a labor movement here, and the Rev. Mr. Livingston, of Bozeman, helped to kill it for this campaign. I will send you a copy of the Western Star which tells the story. C. A. LINDSAY.

DAHLONEGA, GA., Nov. 2, 1890.

MR. EDITOR: I would be pleased to open correspondence with a number of Liberal families—Infidel or Spiritualist—who are tired of the exigencies of Northern winters and wish to move South. I can giv to such, information that will be of advantage to them. No speculation is contemplated on my part, further than to secure for myself the advantage of congenial associations and surroundings, and furnish to a score of Liberal families a matchless opportunity to establish themselvs in a friendly climate abounding in every facility and advantage of comfortable, pleasant, and healthful homes. Persons who may wish to investigate my standing for honesty and integrity, are referred to E. B. Stahlman, president N. & L. R. R.; Hon. D. A. Nunn, United States collector; A. W. Wills, postmaster; Mr. Allen, comptroller state treasury, all of Nashville, Tenn.; also Gen. W. W. Murray, of Huntingdon, Tenn.; Hon. S. W. Hawkins, of Memphis, Tenn., and others. Address me at Dahlonega, Ga.

WARREN SMITH.

SMEDLEY, PA., Nov. 10, 1890.

MR. EDITOR: Please find inclosed $5—$2 for the "Pictorial Text-Book," and $3 for which please renew my brother's, J. V. Prim's, subscription. My brother was drowned on the 17th of August, while bathing in the Cumberland river, Kentucky. Brother and I and a friend were in bathing together. We all started for the shore, when he was seized with the cramp. He called to me and we went to his ass stance, but were unable to save him. He died bravely and without struggling, his last act being to shake my hand as he sank beneath the rapid current. He was an unbeliever, being an admirer of Ingersoll, Paine, and all men who fight for the liberty of man. He was brave, never fearing to speak his honest opinion. I was at Pineville, Ky., and my brother came to see me. He had intended to stay there with me, and intended to hav his subscription renewed. He was twenty-two years old, being three years older than myself. He was buried without any clergyman being present, and without any religious service. Wishing THE TRUTH SEEKER and Mr. Heston much success, I am,

Yours respectfully, JAMES N. PRIM.

WAVERLY, WASH., Nov. 4, 1890

MR. EDITOR: I inclose in addition to my subscription $1 for the pictures. Whether they are beautiful or pleasing to the sight or not, they speak volumes of truth—that is, the ones on the front page of the paper. I expect to be a subscriber to your paper as long as it is used to wage a warfare on superstition and injustice. I never hope or wish to see anything favoring freeloveism in it, as, for my part, I hav no use for freelovers. But many Christians look upon Infidels as such. About three years ago I attended a religious meeting where the preacher enlightened his congregation by telling them what depraved, low-down freelovers Robert G. Ingersoll and D. M. Bennett were. No, Mr. Editor, let our homes be homes of virtue, beauty, and kindness. Let not such a blighting curse as free love ever enter them. If we do, we shall hav something worse than Roman Catholicism or the dram-shop either, I think. Ingersoll has said somewhere that the mainstay of our country lies in her free homes. If it is so, let it always be so, and let truth, purity, and morality be the religion to be taught in them. With respect to the TRUTH SEEKER family, I remain,

Yours truly, B. F. DASHIELL.

CHICAGO, Nov. 16, 1890.

MR. EDITOR: You did well to giv Watson Heston a fair chance for artistic fame, in reproducing his cartoons in the "Pictorial Text-Book." Now the pictures—printed with care and on finer paper—show to vastly greater advantage than when appearing in the hurried production of the paper. Perhaps these may mollify some whose esthetic tastes hav undergone a strain to accept the crude production. With their conception no Freethinker can find fault. They are vivid and powerful appeals to both imagination and reason, full of satirical force. An artist is not one who merely draws, but one who possesses the creativ power. Certainly Mr. Heston has this, for there was no field from which to copy, and he has done nobly to devote what genius he possesses to the promulgation of radical thought. Even in great paintings we can find points for criticism, and doubtless if we were fully aware of the unfavorable conditions under which they were made we would marvel more that he could do them as well. If the remuneration were larger the pictures could be finished much finer, as THE TRUTH SEEKER could then secure better press-work and paper. In this form the pictures are decidedly an improvement, and are well worth the price. E. A. STEVENS.

COLUMBUS, O., Nov. 8, 1890.

MR. EDITOR: I had the good fortune in a conversation I had with a barber, a few evenings ago, to say that I had sent to England for the Freethinker, edited by G. Foote, as I could not get anything of the sort here, when he said, "Why, I can giv you the address of a house in New York where you can get anything you want." You will find $5 inclosed—$3 for one year's TRUTH SEEKER and $2 for the pictorial arguments against the church. I would like to say that I am an Englishman; hav been out here about two years. I was brought up with a sect called the Plymouth Brethren, a sect that is more bigoted than Quakers, and I fully believed in them. I was always told to believe what the Bible said and nothing else, but I accidentally came across some of Darwin's works, which set me thinking, and I soon came to the conclusion the Bible was wrong. And not only that—I believe it to be one of the most obscene books in existence. It is not fit to be in anybody's hands. My parents always said the Lord would make a missionary out of me. If he does, it will not be to help prop up the old musty notions that are in the Bible. I am doing my best to upset the old superstitious notions I can. Hoping I shall get the paper and book as quick as possible, as I am eager to see them, I remain, Yours in the faith of the brotherhood of man and the doing away with everything that keeps lazy loafers around to preach once in a while, J. H. WHITE.

PITTSBURGH, PA., Nov. 9, 1890.

MR. EDITOR: Charles Stowater, one of the most convinced and outspoken Freethinkers, quit life at 4 o'clock A.M. on November 7th last, at the age of seventy-six years. Mr. Stowater was born in Freiberg, Saxony, of very poor mining parents. His love of books caused the education he got. He became a clerk and traveling agent for a large mercantil business house. In 1848 he took his part in the overthrow of existing governmental abuse, which failed and made him an exile. In this country he experienced various trials, but the evening of his life was made pleasant by the grandchildren of his wife (who passed before him), by keeping house for him one after the other as they married away. He was freight and ticket agent on the Allegheny Valley railroad. He founded a good home. He was respected by all, especially those who had dealings with him. He gloried in universal freedom, and was a warm admirer of our most beloved deliverer of mental slavery, along with the hosts of others who work for the same cause. He was a man of great and reflecting mind; would pick up hints and ideas wherever he found them, and comment over them for hours. He wishes to express his sincere feeling of gratitude to his beloved and estimable housekeepers who made the evening of his declining years so happy through their many virtues. C. R. L.

STRASBURG, ILL., Nov. 18, 1890.

MR. EDITOR: I see by the report that the last congress was a grand success, persons traveling long distances and spending good money to advance a cause that they believe to be right. I do not believe that there was one Liberal there that had a doubt about the justice of our cause. Now, if we are honest—and I think we are—is it not about time to stop building castles in the air and build a few more on earth? We hav been talking "Organize" for the last ten years, and are still playing a lone hand. Of course, if we win it will count four, but how can we win when the majority of players say we lose and count the game for us? Suppose we stop talking and try a little work. Everybody lift—"He—oh—he!" Let us try a state organization, $2 admission, good for five years. The state society can divide with the national. If we get five members, that makes $10 for the good of a good cause; and should we get more we are not out anything, and hav given the Liberals a chance. Let us do something. If we try to organize by state and fail, we hav made a success, for every little boost that truth gets helps. And in this state the preachers are on the run. They are actually scared, and all they want is some organization to surrender to. I believe that the time has come when a state organization is a public necessity to prevent preachers from committing suicide. A. YORK.

WALLA WALLA, WASH., Nov. 12, 1890.

MR. EDITOR: The subject of a secret Liberal organization being, apparently, the one that is uppermost in the minds of many in your army of intelligent correspondents, I will contribute my mite to the rapidly accumulating "testimony" of the brethren. That such an organization can be made a success, numerically, and that it can accomplish ends of vast importance, seems not to be questioned. The only questions are, What shall be the scope of its work, and what the qualifications for membership?

Mr. S. P. Benton, in a recent article, answered both these questions, but I cannot conceive why he makes the qualifications for membership "white, male persons," etc.

We Liberals often boast of the part that was taken by Freethinkers in the emancipation of the colored race in the Southern states; we grow indignant, and justly so, when recalling the utterances of the churches in support of the divine institution, slavery; we hurl invectivs against a religion that taught one "image of God" to rivet the chains of bondage upon another "image of God" in ebony. And yet we are not to use the most powerful instrument within our reach to strike from the same unfortunate race the shackles of superstition. Admit to the order colored men who hav already emerged into the light of truth, and then send them among their own people in the South, and the "race problem" will be half solved. It is a well-known fact that the great body of negroes are extremely superstitious. Being so, they cannot be good citizens. One needs only to observe how much power a self-constituted "prophet" has over these deluded people, and how little they care for civil or even moral law when undergoing the excitement incident to a "revival," to be convinced that religion is a great factor in the problem. Let colored men, educated in the Liberal order, go among their kinsmen and lift from their minds this veil of darkness, and all mankind will be placed under a debt of gratitude.

Can Mr. Benton assign any reason for debarring women from membership? If the order is not to be a fit place for ladies, let us never talk more about the elevating influence of Liberalism? And surely no order would be otherwise than honored by the presence of that most intelligent and lady-like lecturer, Helen Gardener; or that writer whose every utterance is an embodiment of purity and womanly kindness, Miss Wixon; or our mothers and daughters—if these cannot enroll their names as equals of the sterner sex, let the order go to thunder. HARRY LEE.

NEW CAMBRIA, KAN., Nov. 8, 290.

MR. EDITOR: Mr. Morris McAuliff, chairman, and Rev. A. C. Pattee, editor of the official organ, the Salina Union, were the two great moguls of the People's party of Salina county. At the present time I am probably the best-known worker for Liberalism in the county, and I liv with a little woman who is known by some as the author of the articles in the official organ of the state for the Alliance, the Advocate, over the signature of "An Alliance Woman." Mr. W. J. Boggs asked the central committee why Mrs. Abbott had not been sent out as a speaker. Mr. J. C. Lloyd said it was on account of her religious opinions. But when Golden Belt Alliance passed resolutions that she be sent there, they succumbed, to the extent of notifying her privately that she had been requested to speak there, and we were also notified privately to go to Glendale Alliance, and by public notice under the following cover, "For Saline Valley Alliance, Abbott" and others. Is it not plain they were ashamed of us? And why? "On account of our religious opinions." Is that doing unto others as you would like to be done by? Are you not following Ingalls's advice—"endeavoring to ascertain what is popular rather than what is right?" Are you not setting an example for class legislation while proclaiming so loudly against it? If you recognized us at all, why did you not come up like gentlemen and giv us public notice, as you did the rest of the speakers? Did you not know that every reform movement, including the revolution of this country in its inception, was carried to a successful culmination by Infidels? For proof of this assertion I will refer you to the "Bennett and Humphrey Discussion" between D. M. Bennett, the founder of THE TRUTH SEEKER, and Rev. G. H. Humphrey, Presbyterian minister of New York city. There you hav both sides, and there you will undoubtedly find that all the great reforms that hav taken place were led by Infidels, and such weak-kneed fellows as you are were seeking for what was popular rather than what was right. All we ask is, as Ex-President Grant said, "Keep church and state forever separate." We are asking no favor for Liberalism, so the church people need not be alarmed. All we ask is that a Liberal receives the same recognition that a Christian does. And we do not hav to ask their leave. It all rests with ourselvs whether even a Liberal lecturer leaves the lecture field or not and takes the stump in the time of a political campaign. All we hav got to do is to demand his services, and I will guarantee he will be heard just the same as the dominie who leaves his pulpit for the same purpose. And rest assured that no political party of the present day will dare to disregard your demands, because Liberals are becoming too numerous to be slighted in such manner.

JOHN W. ABBOTT.

SOLDIERS' AND SAILORS' HOME, QUINCY, ILL., Oct. 26, 290.

MR. EDITOR: I hav recently been the happy recipient of a great number of copies of the New Ideal, Mr. Hart's "Candle From Under the Bushel," "Pioneer Pith," and a number of other publications of advanced reform ideas, and though I am satisfied that never before was there such an awakening on moral, social, and political, not to say religious questions, yet I cannot share the complacency of Mr. Bellamy, nor the fond dream of Mr. Ingersoll, i.e., that the dream of the poet and prophet, the millennium, is so near. And my best reason for not agreeing with them is the fact that Liberals are so much divided among themselvs, not only as to the means but as to the time for propagating truth and opposing superstition and falsehood. I find many who are utterly opposed to convincing people that there is no truth in the orthodox ideas of inspiration, of hell and the atonement, etc., for fear that society, morality, and law will not survive the shock. They insist that men who are imbued with an uncommonly strong desire to benefit humanity will maintain their moral equilibrium, but that the great majority are restrained from becoming outlaws and desperadoes through fear, although we are aware of the fact that our prisoners, convicts, and criminals are mostly of the believing class, and that even the murderer almost invariably has a hope of heaven—which is only born of that selfish, soul-corrupting doctrin of the atonement. Persons who still uphold the Bible as a preventiv for crime are as inconsistent as the man who contends that drunkenness is the only security for good behavior and sanity. Make a man drunk on faith in the following matters, and what moral demeanor can we expect from him?—viz.: "If any man come to me, and hate not father and mother, wife and children, brothers and sisters, yea, and his own life also, he cannot be my disciple;" the example of God sending out lying spirits to deceive his own prophets; together with the apostle Paul, who acknowledged himself to be both a fool and a liar; and the many crimes upheld, and the encouragement that all shall be forgiven except the sin against the Holy Ghost (and no one knows what that is).

I am astonished that among so many able and enthusiastic writers there is little said upon that science upon which, it appears to me, accomplishment of all social and moral reforms rests, viz., phrenology. For it is admitted by all who hav studied the subject and accepted it as a true science, that through a rigid practice of the same the highest state of evolution can be obtained. Let us suppose, for example, an island to be peopled by a few persons under control as regards marriage of a most skilful phrenologist, so that every child would be born with a perfectly organized brain—with Ingersollic mind, so that superstition could hav no lodgment. This appears to me to be the short line to follow. And yet it may be necessary to work upon longer lines to attain means to reach the phrenological line. Under the existing state of society, as much as we boast of our civilization and intellectual development and moral courage, the major part of the laboring class hav far too much reverence for aristocracy, too little individuality, to appreciate anything of a reform nature, on account of mental deformity. What a wonderful saving the rigid practice of phrenological selection would bring about!

Yours for humanity, EX-REV. JOSEPH N. MAXEY.

IPAVA, ILL., Nov. 5, 1890.

MR. EDITOR: I was at church a few days since, and it happened to be the day set apart or sanctified for the Lord's supper. As the preacher discoursed upon the subject pertaining to that feast I wondered what must be the thoughts of men and women who hav a good quantity of the "milk of human kindness" flowing out from their hearts, who acknowledge a creativ power, a natural cause that givs life and force to everything, when they read the Exodus of the Jews, after the Lord had hardened Pharaoh's heart that he might hav a good opportunity to punish him with lice, frogs, rain, hail, locusts, etc. Then he said (the Lord, mind): "Yet will I bring one plague more upon Pharaoh . . . that my wonders may be increased in the land of Egypt. . . . Take a lamb . . . without blemish. . . . The congregation of Israel shall kill it and eat it in the evening, and they shall take the blood and strike it on the two side posts and on the upper door posts of the house wherein they shall eat it. . . . For I [the Lord] will pass through the land of Egypt this night and will smite all the first-born in the land of Egypt, both man and beast, and against all the gods of Egypt I will execute judgment. I am the Lord. . . . And it shall come to pass when your children shall say unto you, what mean ye by this service?" How shrewd, how Jew-like. He knew the children would ask many questions about such a service, and he knew the real cause must be hidden from them or the child would learn to abhor what the parents gloried in. A thoughtful child naturally would ask why God passed over the land of Egypt and killed all the first-born of those who did not hav lamb's blood smeared upon their door posts. If I had a boy or girl, or both, I would feel proud of them if they would question such absurdities.

Think of killing all the first-born. What had they done? What did God want all the innocent killed for? Does he love blood still? Is he so much like a wild beast that he craves the blood of the innocent? Why should a God want his wonders increased? Reader, think a moment. Would it not be more natural, more reasonable, taking the condition of the Jews at that time into consideration, making Moses their Lord, to suppose the whole thing was a scheme, a deeply laid plot, hatched by the Jews to deter the Egyptians? They, the Jews, were about to take exodus with all they could borrow (steal) from the Egyptians, and they desired to do something to throw Pharaoh's army into confusion so they could escape with their plunder. Now the Lord's supper, Christ's supper, was made in commemoration of that event. That is, J. Christ made a feast that he and his followers might celebrate and rejoice exceedingly that God in the past had killed little babes by the thousands, that a wicked, lustful, thieving people might escape with their stolen property, led by a murderer, whose sayings hav caused the earth to run red with blood and bound millions of human beings in chains.

The preachers and the priests would lead the people to believe this Jew-God, who delighted in magnifying his wonders in the land of Egypt, has the power to damn all who will not subscribe to their ideas and contribute to their support. Surely the intelligent people who eat at this feast in 1890 must be a misguided, or else a very cruel, selfish people. Think of all the church people throughout the land eating the broken body and drinking the life-blood of man—"This do in remembrance of me," but really in remembrance of one of the most heinous and inhuman deeds that has ever darkened the pages of history. When I see the people eating this supper—good people, among whom are many of my friends, honest in purpose, and desirous that I join with them—I pinch myself to find out whether I am dreaming. No, it is not a dream, but a sad reality. When men and women are so blinded by their early teachings that they cannot see their own condition, it is indeed sad. Could they realize, for one moment, the awfulness of accusing the designer, the creator, of doing that which any man or woman, with one grain of humanity, would shudder and refuse to do, the change would be wonderful.

God, creator, cause, life, force, or nature, call it what you may, is inexorable, and has no pets, no elect. The word is that which we see on every hand. It is beautifully grand; the more we know the nearer we can approach the cause. This word cannot be translated. It needs no revision. Men and women are their own helpers. They hav in the past helped man more than woman. Knowledge teaches that women are men's equal, while God—that is, the Jew God—teaches that women are subject to men. Let men help women more than they do, and let men and women who are honest and hav a purpose at heart, who are anxious for the advancement and the perpetuation of humanity, who desire to see men progress and women become their equal or superior in everything honorable, write their true sentiments, and the world will grow better in spite of foolish creeds and parasites who liv in the creeds as worms do in decaying bodies. It is high time for all Liberals to be on the alert, for God's own elect are at work day and night. They are very joyful over the passage, "There will be weeping and wailing and gnashing of teeth." When will that time come? Why, it will come when we submit ourselvs to the powers of the pope, the caste, and become slaves to their imaginary God.

Yours for humanity, C. S. RANDOLPH.

JOPLIN, Mo., Nov. 10, 1890.

MR. EDITOR: I am not a subscriber to your paper and rarely see a copy of it, but to-day a copy of the number for October 25th came to my hand and my eye fell upon an article by Robert Gunther, of Eureka, Cal., headed "The Death Penalty." I read it and it refreshed a flood of thoughts that hav at times during the last few years surged through my mind. And it occurred to me that you might giv me space in your paper for a brief expression of them. For I think that it is only through a medium which has been freed from the shackles of a blind following after things which are orthodox and hoary with age, that such thoughts can be made public.

I am evidently not so old a man as Mr. Gunther, and advancing years may bring about a radical change in my views on this question, but as I view it to-day, his advocacy of capital punishment after forty years' condemnation of it looks to me like progressing backward. True, he only advocates it as a measure of public protection, because the government (he had better hav said the mismanagers of the government) fails to protect. But would he not better help to bring about the final reform he hopes for by continuing to array himself with those who are working for this reform, rather than to number himself with those who hinder reform by advocating the old methods? That our penal system is all wrong, I think no liberal mind will deny. It is founded wholly upon the Mosaic law, and it is an astonishing fact that every so-called Christian nation has followed Moses in their treatment of their criminal classes, rather than the higher humanity of the gentle Nazarene. The most striking characteristic of the Old Testament God is his desire for revenge and his rigid application of punishment for wrong done. And these attributes of the Jewish Jehovah hav been the models held up by the priests for the guidance of legislators in framing penal statutes. It is astounding to me that they hav been so universally followed—followed even by our humanity-loving, tyrant-hating forefathers when they established the laws of our own loved country. So far as I can see, this adoption of the Mosaic penal code is about the only reason the church can adduce for calling this a Christian nation.

Not only must the criminal be punished because correction is good for him and may make him fearful of being again caught in wrong-doing, but he must be made to suffer in order that the outraged majesty of the law may be revenged and appeased. (In Africa they would call it a fetich and chop the offender's head off to keep it from getting mad at the rest of them.) So argue the Christian legislators, and the "Liberal" legislators vote yea and excuse themselvs by saying that society must protect itself from these depredators. Well, I guess that is true. Society must be protected as long as mankind is animated by the Methodist doctrin of a hope of reward and avoidance of the wrath to come. But it seems astonishing to me that they never seem to stop to inquire whether society could not be better protected in some other way—whether, indeed, society is protected at all. A man, smarting under the provocation of a ruined honor, kills the worthless ravager. For the murder he is imprisoned or hanged. What protection has society received? Does his punishment protect other families from such soulless marauders? Does it not, on the contrary, encourage them by rendering honest men fearful of defending their honor where the law will not defend them?

A thief steals a fine span of horses. The owner of the horses spends hundreds of dollars in hunting the thief. At last he is caught and sent to the penitentiary for a term of years. Who is protected? The owner of the horses? He has spent several times the worth of the team to get them back and catch the thief. Does the imprisonment of the thief pay him back his expended money? The thief cannot steal while he is in the prison, but is there anything in prison life that assures society he will not steal again when he gets out? And his family, what of them? Will anyone employ and trust the son of a convicted thief? What remains for him but to steal also, or starve? Is that protection to society which includes the family of the criminal in his punishment and forces them by depriving them of support and by social ostracism, into the by-ways of crime? Does hanging the murderer protect the murdered man's family from the pangs of want, the wretchedness of begging, or the misery of the public almshouse, usually but little better than a prison? Is it a protection to society to compel them to pay taxes to support a prison filled with a horde of idle prisoners, or worse than idle, farmed out for less than their keeping as slaves to some avaricious contractor?

It seems to me it is about time to consider this criminal question from a business standpoint, and drop the theological and sentimental twaddle which has heretofore characterized its discussion. Let the penitentiary be a manufactory conducted by the state, its capacity limited only by the number of hands to be employed. Let the labor to be performed be the most ennobling in its kind, instead of, as now, quarrying stone and making shoe pegs. Let the prisoner, if he has a trade, follow it, and if he has none, let him be taught one; and if he won't work, let him be kept on bread and water till he does. Let the term of imprisonment be determined, not by arbitrary lines, based on the enormity of the offense committed, but by the question of restitution, i.e., the value of stolen property be restored to its owner, the loss of time in cases of bodily injury be made good; the family of a murdered man be supported by the labor of the murderer until they become self-supporting, etc. Let the convict workingman receive the same wages for the same work that the free workman receives—nay, the state might set a good example by paying better wages than the average manufacturing corporation. Let his wages be put into three funds: one to pay for his keep, another to make restitution, and the third to support his family. If he has no family, let it be set aside to start him in life again when his term expires. And in order that convict labor shall not ruinously compete with free labor, let the manufactured goods be put upon the market at the highest market price. Let the comforts of a home, rather than the horrors of a prison cell, surround the convict; let his time be occupied by the ennobling influence of honest and skill-engendering labor, books, music, and recreation; and let him learn by his experience that he must make restitution for the wrong he does; and then the reformation of the criminal class will become something more than a cant phrase to furnish preachers occupation for their idle hours.

"Between the dark and the daylight,
When the night is beginning to lower,
Comes a pause in the day's occupations
That is known as the Children's Hour."

Spangler's Spring.

Here, in the dim and unknown past,
By nature's laws your lot was cast,
Where spreading oaks their branches fling
To shade and guard you, crystal spring.

When prehistoric man here dwelt,
Perhaps some swarthy form here knelt,
Some captiv slave or savage king,
And drank from you, clear, bubbling spring.

Here no doubt were Indian braves,
Who slumber now in unknown graves,
Perhaps they heard your waters sing
A solemn dirge for them, dear spring.

The red deer often crossed your stream,
And here was heard the panther's scream;
The wild bird with his flashing wing
Has dashed your spray, clear, sparkling spring.

And when war's maddening hosts had come,
With clash of arms and beat of drum,
Whose echoes made the valleys ring,
You freely gave, bright, welcome spring.

For many on this battle-ground,
With fevered brow and bleeding wound,
Your cooling waters eased the sting
Of glorious death, O noble spring.

Here, pilgrims on life's weary way,
The old and young, the grave and gay,
Will to your shrine a tribute bring,
A smile for you, bright, sparkling spring.

The scholar here in pensiv mood
May for his mind hav ample food,
Reflecting how poor mortals cling
To life's short day, clear, gushing spring.

And so 'twill be when we are gone—
Your purling stream will still flow on,
The wild birds here will chirp and sing.
Farewell, farewell, bright crystal spring.

Why the Leaves Turn.

Probably not one person in a thousand knows why leaves change their color in the fall. The common idea is that the red and golden glory of the autumn is caused by frost, but a little reflection will convince anyone that the common idea is wrong. Sumach and many trees change in September, long before frost comes, so we must look elsewhere for the cause.

Divested of scientific terms the cause has been explained thus: The green matter in the tissue of a leaf is composed of two colors, red and blue. When the sap ceases to flow in the fall, and the natural growth of the tree ceases, oxidation of the tissue takes place. Under certain conditions the green of the leaf changes to red; under different conditions it takes on a yellow or brown tint. This difference in color is due to the difference in combination of the original constituents of the green tissue, and to the varying conditions of climate, exposure, and soil. A dry, cold climate produces more brilliant foliage than one that is damp and warm.

There are several things about leaves that even science cannot explain. For instance, why one of two trees growing side by side, of the same age and having the same exposure, should take on a brilliant red in the fall and the other should turn yellow, or why one branch of a tree should be highly colored and the rest of the tree hav only a yellow tint, are questions that are as impossible to answer as why one member of a family should be perfectly healthy and another sickly. Maples and oaks hav the brightest colors.

The Intelligence of Toads.

Toads, in the presence of snakes, usually remain perfectly still. In this is their only safety. For did they make the least movement they would be immediately caught. I hav known a hungry snake to lie waiting for over an hour for a frog to move, and even push him with the nose to stir him up. This has been called "snake-charming," and indeed it looks like it, but the toad is the charmer and the snake the charmed. I remember one day I dropped a toad in the midst of a pit of snakes I had in my back yard. He at once became perfectly still, though surrounded by more than a dozen hungry snakes. There was a circle of fierce heads and glaring eyes around him, but he would not move. The circle narrowed until the protruding tongues almost touched him, yet he was immovable. Just then I was called away for over half an hour, but on returning found the toad in grave dignity still holding the fort by most masterly inactivity.

Instinct in Common Pigeons.

The common pigeon is not generally thought to hav a great share of intelligence, but the following story related by a sportsman is an instance of a wonderful instinct at least. Our object, he says, was to shoot a rabbit, but the evening was dry and windy, and the grass not toothsome enough to suit bunny's dainty palate. So looking around I espied a flock of pigeons—blue rocks. One was pied, having white feathers in its wing. Getting fairly within gunshot I fired, and the rest of the flock flew away. The pigeon lay motionless while I reloaded and walked toward it to pick it up.

Judge of my surprise when two pigeons swept past me, touched it on either wing, and it flew rapidly away in company with its preservers, settling on the roof of a barn a quarter of a mile distant. The explanation was probably this: The poor bird's legs were doubtless broken, so that it could not rise without assistance. The companions must hav seen this by a sidelong glance as they flew away, and swept round again on their errand of mercy.

Pussy's Reply.

"With four such soft and lovely paws,
You never ought to show your claws,
You naughty puss," said Belle.
"That your red lips, without a doubt,
Were made to kiss and not to pout,"
Said puss, "you know quite well!"

He Is Going to Stick to Him, Too.

Matron: "You appear to be very fond of your little playmate. It is pleasant to see such love among children."

The bigger one: "Yes'm; he's got er penny to spend."

Correspondence.

LEWISTOWN, MONT., Oct. 23, 1890.

DEAR MISS WIXON: I never see any letter in the Children's Corner from around here, so I thought I would write one.

I stay in town and go to school. I liv with my brother; he is an Infidel, and takes the grand old TRUTH SEEKER. I like to read the Children's Corner and look at the pictures.

I go to school and study history, geography, grammar, arithmetic, and spelling, but I never go to Sunday-school or church.

As this is my first letter, I won't write a very long one. Ever yours,

MINNIE JACKSON.

AKRON, O., Oct. 29, 1890.

MISS SUSAN H. WIXON: I wish to thank you for the good work you are doing in impressing the truth on the minds of the rising generation, and showing up superstition in its various forms.

I herewith send you some lines I hav written on "Spangler's Spring," after a recent visit to the famous field of Gettysburg, where twenty-seven years ago I tried to do my humble duty. Perhaps these lines may interest some of THE TRUTH SEEKER readers. If you deem them worthy of publication I shall feel very thankful. Wishing that you may meet with success in all your undertakings, I remain,

Your friend, CONRAD WALDSMITH.

CALISTOGA, CAL., Oct. 25, 1890.

MISS SUSAN H. WIXON: Not long ago you had a list of valuable books in THE TRUTH SEEKER. I would like to know where to get some of them and the price, or, if you hav any second-hand ones of the following subjects, I would buy them off you: one on microscopy; one on chemistry (Frecenius's); Langley's "New Astronomy;" mineralogy; "Underground Life," and one on archæology. If you do not hav them, please inform me where I can get them ordered. I inclose a few stamps. Yours respectfully,

JOHN DUMBACHER.

[We hav no second-hand books treating of those topics. Should any of our readers possess the books referred to, and be willing to dispose of them, they can write to the address above. Scientific books (new) can be ordered through the Truth Seeker Company. —ED. C. C.]

GRANTFORK, ILL., Nov. 5, 290.

DEAR MISS WIXON: As I hav not written to the Children's Corner for a good while, I thought it would not hurt to write a few lines. What is the matter with the Children's Corner? The two last numbers of the Children's Corner did not hav a letter in them. Are the friends of the Children's Corner losing enthusiasm? Winter evenings are coming, when everybody has time to write, but it seems they forget the Children's Corner. We hav just undergone a siege of the Catholic missionaries; they stayed here a week and never made a solitary convert. I was in three nights, but am as bad a heathen as before, if not worse. A lady friend of mine gave me a few books to read on the Catholic religion; I read them, and showed her some of the mistakes, and when I got to argue with her, at last her only argument was: "You will find out when you are dead." Well, I don't think I shall find out anything after I am dead once. Because I am like that fellow that was sitting up with a corpse overnight. The corpse was lying on the table, and something happened to shake it off the table. The man went and picked the corpse up and slammed it on the table and said: "Here, lie there, dead, dead!" And that is the way. I think if a man wants to find out anything, he had better find it out before he is dead. Hoping that in the future the Children's Corner will hav more letters, I remain,

Yours for Universal Mental Liberty,
NICHOLAS J. KRAFT.

BUFFALO, N. Y., Nov. 2, 1890.

DEAR MISS WIXON: Papa has renewed his subscription to THE TRUTH SEEKER, and I welcomed with usual warmth the Children's Corner. I read George Remsburg's interesting letter, but was more interested in your reply. I sincerely wish your hopes may materialize and we shall hav a Liberal young people's paper. I will do all in my power to bring it about and help you all I can. I think it would be an excellent thing. "As the twig is bent the tree is inclined." I think every Liberal that is interested in the welfare of his children ought to contribute to its support. I wrote my first letter to the Corner when I was eight years old. And now I hav passed my fourteenth birthday. I see many of the "old familiar faces" in THE TRUTH SEEKER, and I shall take pleasure in occasionally contributing a little essay, if you think it worthy a place in the Corner. Hoping that you will push the project of a child's paper, I remain,

Your friend, as of old, IDA A. BALLOU.
991 Exchange street, Buffalo.

[A greeting to you, Ida, and we are pleased to hear again from you. Thanks for your interest in the project of a paper all for young people. It will come some time, perhaps sooner than we think. Yes, write as often as convenient. We are desirous that all who read the Corner may contribute to its columns occasionally. Think, and write your thoughts. It is development. We note a marked improvement in Ida's letter over the one written when she was a wee girl of eight.—ED. C. C.]

LANSING, MICH., Nov. 2, 1890.

DEAR MISS WIXON: This is my first attempt to write to the Corner.

For some time my parents hav wanted me to write, but I hav lacked the subject.

My former home was in Montezuma, Cayuga county, N. Y., and you will no doubt remember me the better when you recall that memorable occasion of Messrs. Remsburg and Reynolds's visit to that place.

Nearly two years ago we came to Michigan.

I hav been attending school ever since, and I am now in the eighth grade.

Our school, otherwise excellent, has, like many others, still coupled with its management more or less superstition, such as singing so-called sacred music and reciting the Lord's prayer, much to my dislike.

A few days ago my teacher wished all of her pupils to be prepared to giv a quotation and the name of the author.

This was my opportunity to make my schoolmates acquainted with Ingersoll and some of his eloquent words, also to jog the orthodox mind somewhat and yet be in harmony with the disciplin of the school.

At the call of my name to giv my quotation I arose and in loud accent gave these words: "Why should man be afraid to think, and why should he fear to express his thoughts?" (Ingersoll). "Splendid!" exclaimed my teacher.

A girl schoolmate of mine, the daughter of a very superstitious gentleman, had no quotation, and came to me for one.

I had on my tongue's end the eloquent words of that most wonderful thinker, Thomas Paine, "The world is my country, and to do good my religion."

She copied them, and when her name was called she arose and repeated those words. With the exclamatory remarks of my teacher, "That is splendid," my schoolmate sat, and this ended a happy little episode in the public schools of Lansing, which may yet bear fruit.

I think my teacher was so much pleased with those most beautiful words from those two eloquent men that she spoke without considering the authors to be "Agnostics," and bestowed a "thoughtless" compliment on them.

I hope this may be the cause of developing in the school a desire to read the works of both authors, and thus good will hav been done, and my object attained.

Your friend, ANNA J. ROSS.

[We are proud of our brave friend Anna. No more eloquent words can be found in any language than those uttered by the leaders of Freethought. And they are true. Quote them often, fix them in the memory, treasure them, liv up to them, and we shall hav eventually a country redeemed from the thralldom of bigotry and superstition.—ED. C. C.]

French Invasion of Ireland in '98.

Leaves of Unwritten History That Tell of a Heroic Endeavor and a Lost Opportunity to Throw Off England's Yoke.

By VALERIAN GRIBAYEDOFF.

With a map and numerous illustrations by well-known artists. Handsomely bound in silk cloth. Ink and gold side stamps. Price, $1.50.

The present volume is an effort to rescue from comparative oblivion one of the many extraordinary episodes of the great French revolutionary war. . . . It points a moral that amidst republican institutions like ours, will not fail to receive appreciation. It shows, on one hand, the elevating influence of newly acquired ambition, . . . and on the other the debasing effects of Religious and Political intolerance both on the tyrant and the victim. Contains a heretofore unpublished letter of Thomas Paine to the French Directory.

DONALD KENNEDY

Of Roxbury, Mass., says

Don't write to me when taking the first bottle of my MEDICAL DISCOVERY. I know how it makes you feel, but it's all right. There are certain cases where the DISCOVERY takes hold sharp, but it is the diseased spot in you it has taken hold of, and that's what you want. The DISCOVERY has a search warrant for every humor, from backache to scrofula, inside and outside, and of course it makes a disturbance in your poor body, but the fight is short, you are better by the second bottle; if not, then tell me about it, and I will advise. I will, however, in the future, as in the past, answer any letter from a nursing mother.

Sincerely yours,
DONALD KENNEDY,

THE TRUTH SEEKER CO.

FOR HER DAILY BREAD.

A NINETEENTH CENTURY NOVEL.

Preface by R. G. INGERSOLL.

For Her Daily Bread is the story of two young girls and a younger brother who were left parentless, with little money, fair education, and much courage, to make their way through the world by going to Chicago. The author is also the heroin. The narrativ is, in the main, a history of a working girl's life and experience in the city of Chicago among bluff business men, kind-hearted folks, and disreputable hypocrits. It is just such a story of human life as we should expect Colonel Ingersoll to be interested in; and whatever he admires and appreciates is sure to be worth the attention of the rest of the world. Price 25 cents.

TRY-SQUARE:

OR,

The Church of Practical Religion.

BY REPORTER.

This is the history of an attempt to found a church without superstition, and its success. Uncle Job Sawyer, the pastor, having established his pulpit, uses it to discuss all the vital questions of human concern, religious, political, and otherwise. The book is written in well-chosen language, and easily understood. There is just sufficient narrativ about it to interest the reader and hold his attention while the truth is being brought to his mind.

He added that no one could be a good soldier without being also a good Christian, and therefore recruits who take the oath of allegiance to their earthly master should also and above all things prove themselvs true to their heavenly Lord.

THE Sioux and Cheyennes around Pine Ridge agency, S. D., continue in a state of religious excitement, and threaten war. They maintain a "ghost dance," and say they will continue it till the coming of their messiah, though that be not till spring. It is reported that they hav killed seven whites near Lebeau. Troops are held ready at all stations, and eight hundred cavalry, with artillery, hav started thence from St. Louis. The settlers are alarmed, and wish more protection.

BERLIN is in as much excitement over Professor Koch's supposed cure for consumption as it would be if in a state of war. One of the first acts of the Reichstag, or German parliament, when it meets, will be the thanking of Koch in the name of the nation. Several physicians hav been delegated to inoculate with the lymph subjects of consumption or other tubercular affections, and their quarters are besieged by sufferers. The composition of the lymph has not been revealed. American hospitals hav sent physicians to Berlin to investigate.

URIAH DELIVERING HIS DEATH WARRANT.

And it came to pass in the morning, that David wrote a letter to Joab, and sent it by the hand of Uriah. And he wrote in the letter, saying, Set ye Uriah in the fore-front of the hottest battle, and retire ye from him, that he may be smitten, and die.—2 Sam. xi, 14, 15.

Gems of Thought.

THE banditti of Italy hav great confidence in these things [charms], and whenever they start upon an expedition of theft and plunder, they take images and pictures of saints with them, such as hav been blest by a priest or pope. They pray sincerely to the Virgin, to giv them luck, and see not the slightest inconsistency in appealing to all the saints in the calendar to assist them in robbing honest people.—Ingersoll.

No candid person who is acquainted with history can fail to perceive the difference between the amount of reverence bestowed in the present day, by the great majority of men, upon mere speculativ doctrins or ritualistic observances, and that which was once general. If we examin the church in the fourth and fifth centuries, we find it almost exclusivly occupied with minute questions concerning the manner of the co-existence of the two natures in Christ. If we examin it in the Middle Ages, we find it absorbed in ritualism and pilgrimages. If we examin it at the Reformation, we find it just emerging beneath the pressure of civilization from this condition; yet still the main speculativ test was the doctrin concerning the sacrament, which had no relation to morals; and the main practical test on the Continent, at least, was the eating of meat on Fridays. In the present day, with the great body of laymen at least, such matters appear simply pueril, because they hav no relation to morals.—Lecky.

IT is Science who has bestowed upon our race all the benefits by which man has become "the paragon of animals." Electricity, which under the form of lightning is, in the absence of science, a source of terror and death, becomes in her presence not only perfectly harmless, but a gentle Ariel engaged in carrying our messages round the earth.—Wilson.

To the World's Columbian Exposition Commission:

Learning that there is an organized movement among the more conservative church people—manipulated by a "Sabbath" organization—to induce your honorable body to close on Sundays the World's Fair, to be held in 1893 in Chicago, the undersigned respectfully put in this counter petition, and ask that the Fair may be open to the public on each Sunday of its continuance. We ask this for the following reasons:

1. That the American principle of separation of church and state may be maintained.

2. That public morality may be subserved by providing a substitute for the immoral places to which men may resort when no moral amusements are available.

3. As a matter of justice also to the people of Chicago who have given of their means to make the Fair possible, tens of thousands of whom can visit the Fair only on a general holiday; and as a matter of justice also to the visitors to the Fair, whose time or means may be limited, and who certainly are entitled to great consideration at your hands.

4. For the public good. The opening of the Fair on Sunday will be for the benefit not only of Chicago, but of the whole country. The rights of no one are infringed, the happiness of no one disturbed. Those who wish to attend can do so; those who do not can otherwise spend the day. This is a solely humanitarian question, a question of human relations and human welfare, and, therefore, the only standard by which you can decide is that of the public welfare.

5. It will benefit the Fair, attracting a much larger attendance, interesting more people in it, and increasing its receipts.

6. To the objection that Sunday opening of the Fair will destroy the day as a rest-day, we affirm that the tendency would be exactly the opposite. The more beautiful you make Sunday, the more attractive, the more noble and varied in its pleasures and instructions, the more difficult it will be to change its character, the less danger there is that employers will ever have the power to transfer it from its present position to the days of toil. With choice of Sunday occupation restricted to attending church or visiting a saloon, the average workingman would choose to keep on laboring.

7. Finally: Opening the World's Fair on Sunday will harm no one but the keepers of immoral places, while it will benefit the Fair itself, the people of Chicago, and the visitors to the Fair, thereby conducing to municipal prosperity, individual education, public morality, and the development and good of the whole country.

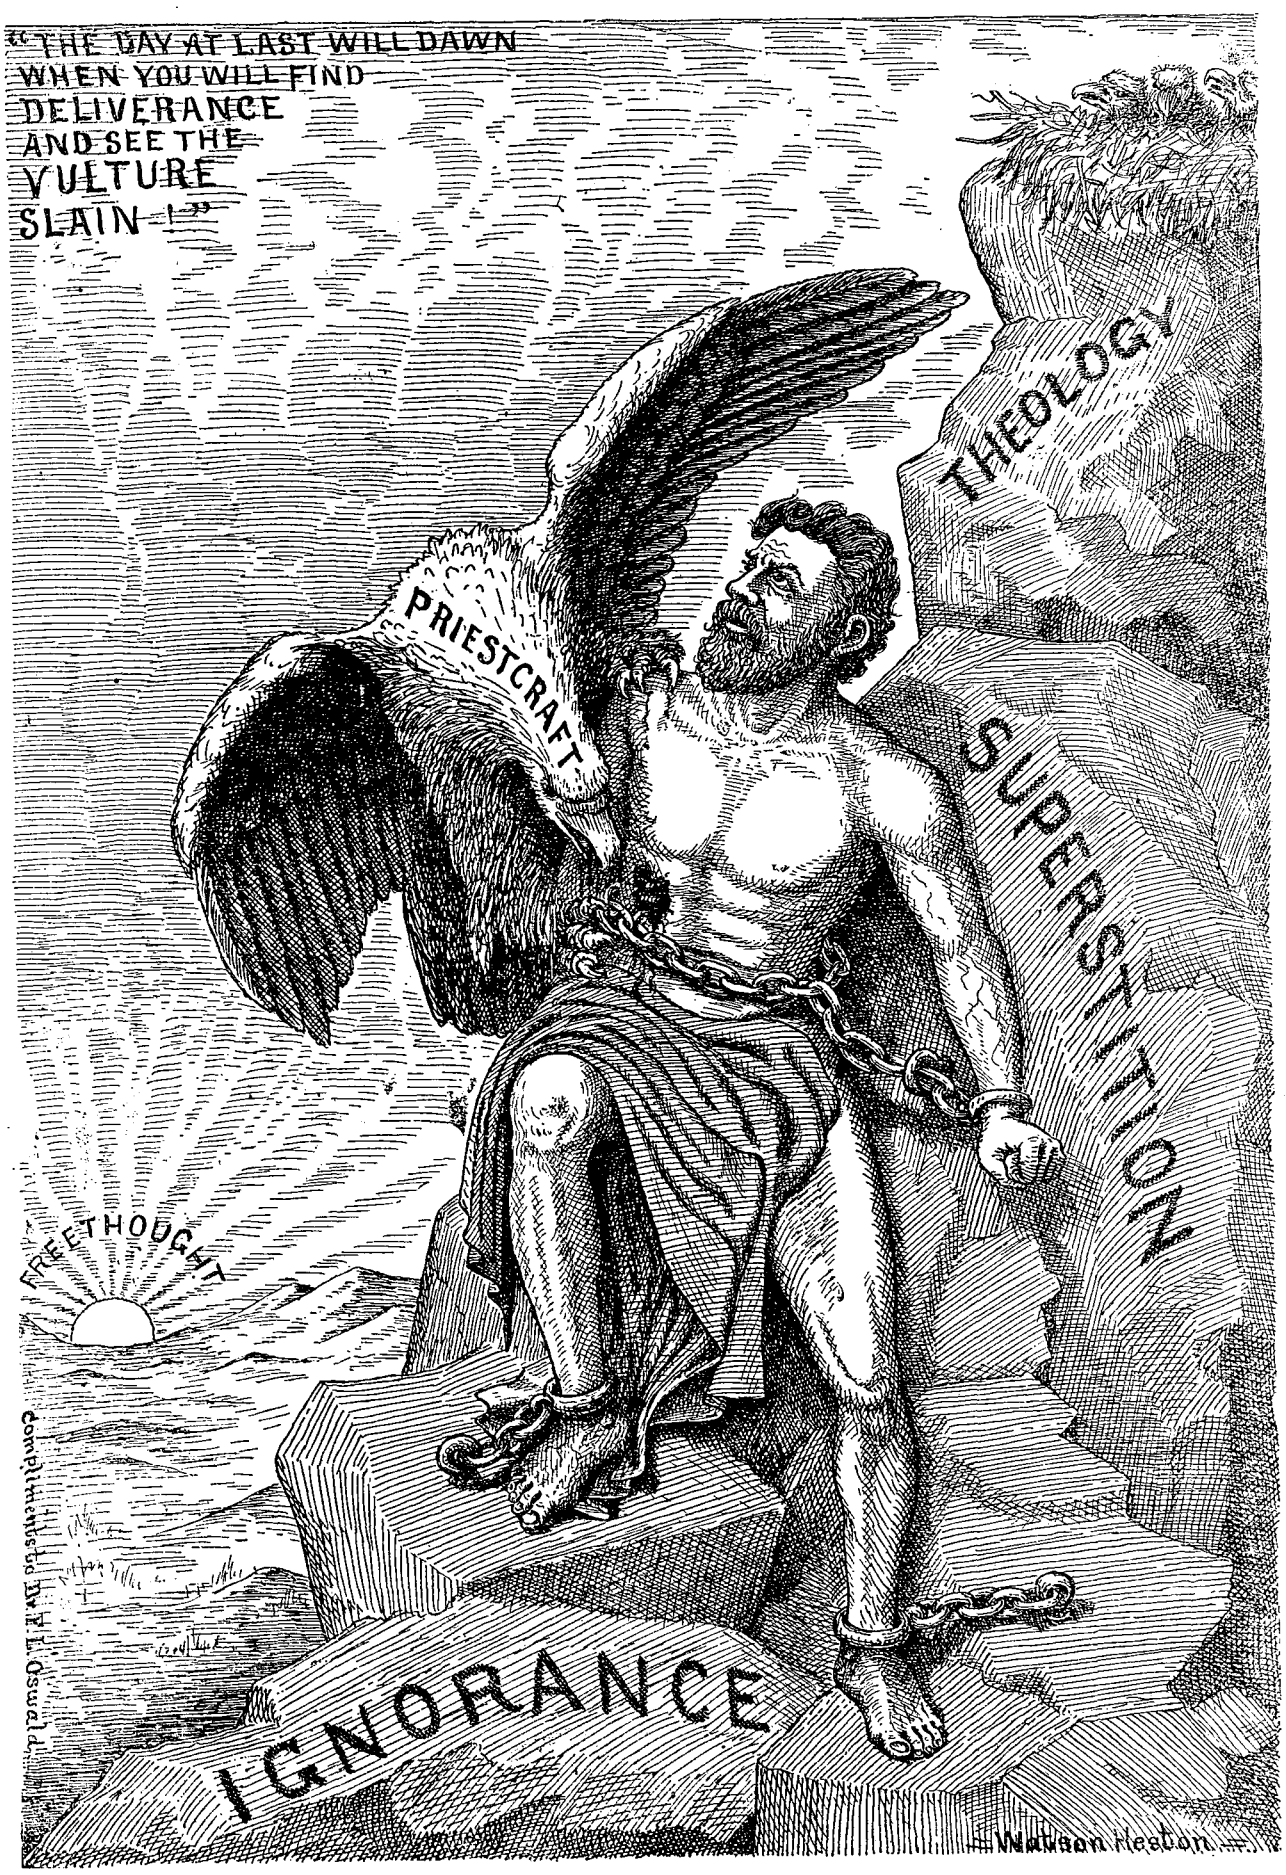
Notes and Clippings.

WALTER CAMPBELL, a paroled prisoner of the Ohio state prison, returned to the prison the other morning, broke open a desk, and stole $75. The parole system is in a measure an experiment. Later on it will no doubt be modified so that when a prisoner is out on parole some precaution will be taken against his breaking into the prison again.



IN the criminal court of Susquehanna county, at Montrose, Pa., on the 18th ult., the case of Paul Hill agt. Olive Brown and her husband, Philander Brown, Spiritualists, was concluded. The Browns represented that they were in communication with the spirit world, that Jesus Christ was in need of money, and that Hill must furnish some to be forwarded; also that Hill's first wife, now in the spirit land, needed money for new clothing, etc. Hill from time to time furnished money, which was placed in a Bible in the presence of the trio. During the night the money would vanish, and Hill believed that it went to the spirit land. In all he supplied $3,000. While on the witness-stand Hill told of the manner in which the spirits instructed him and his second wife to do various things, and of hearing the spirits singing, "I am so glad that Jesus loves me." They also heard railway trains running in heaven and saw mills turning out lumber with which to build the heavenly city. Mrs. Hill often conferred with St. Peter and St. Paul, and with Mr. Hill's first wife. After a long deliberation the jury found the prisoners guilty.

HELEN H. GARDENER, says the American Spectator, is doing much good in writing stories and stating facts well calculated to make men and women think. In a recent paper she calls attention to the fact that Kemmler's father and mother were butchers by trade, while the same was also true of the parents of Jesse Pomeroy, the youthful Boston murderer, who from infancy took such fiendish delight in torturing and killing animals. How little heed is paid to the law of heredity and the atmosphere in which a child livs while his taste and habits of thought are taking expression. It is a long way from barbarism to true civilization. When mankind grows great enough to be tender, considerate, and just, we shall hav less murders by individuals and none by the state.

BISHOP MCQUAID, bishop of the Rochester diocese of the Catholic church, has gone extensivly into the manufacture of wine at Conesus Lake. He has erected a wine cellar with walls seventy-two feet high, inclosing six floors and the vaults, and with a capacity of fifty thousand gallons. This season the bishop will press fifteen thousand gallons.

SAYS "Bill Arp" in the Louisville Home and Farm: "And this reminds me of what I hav just read in the Andover Review for November. It is the organ of New England orthodoxy. It is now lamenting the decay of religious interest among the farming population of the North. Dr. Dunning says that there are ninety-five towns in Maine where no religious services are held, and there are more country villages in Illinois without the gospel than in any other state in the Union. Just think of that! The great state of Illinois, that has two counties that make more grain than all Georgia. This great state that stands fifth in the scale of education, and fortieth in the grade of Christian religion."

THE Sun has news from a correspondent in St. Petersburg that the czar is about to promulgate a decree providing for the abolition of the corporal punishment of women who are living in banishment in Siberia. All the world has heard of the terrors of the knout, the use of which is to be prohibited hereafter by the Russian autocrat. The news from St. Petersburg will be of especial interest to the members of the American society which is procuring signatures to a petition to the czar for clemency to Siberian exiles.

THE DAWN OF DELIVERANCE.

CANON TAYLOR of the Church of England has shown by incontrovertible statistics that with all the effort and expense laid out on Christian missions, the increase in Christian converts is only a trifling part of the mere natural increase of the heathen. Meantime the spread of belief in the new doctrin of a second probation must tend to chill the enthusiasm essential as a stimulus to missionary enterprise. In Christian countries and even among the orthodox, Universalism is replacing the old belief in the terrors of hell. The sensitiv modern philanthropy recoils from the teaching that anybody is to be doomed to everlasting suffering. It cannot bear to look on a dog in pain; and the goodness and loving-kindness of God seem to it so totally inconsistent with the torments of hell that it refuses to believe their infliction possible. A spirit of humanity has been generated as a substitute for the old religion of law and penalty, eternal rewards and eternal punishments. An implacable God seems to it a hideous monster. The creation of men predestinated to hell from before the beginning of time outrages its sense of justice as diabolic sport with helpless mortals. This sentiment, once denounced as the expression of Infidelity and impiety, is now prevalent among Congregationalists, Episcopalians, and Presbyterians, and it affects, though to a less extent, the Baptists themselvs. It is undoubtedly bringing about a complete theological revolution, which must radically transform the motivs and methods of religious effort. Philanthropic exertion for the amelioration of the condition of humanity is totally different from religious enthusiasm for the salvation of souls and their rescue from the flames of hell. It destroys the animating force upon which Christianity has so long relied.

A GENTLE Materialist: Bigotry still survives even among certain professed Freethinkers. In a recent issue we published a review of "The Perfect Way," and our "vulgar imbecility" has brought us this choice epistle: "Sir: Don't dare to send me any more of your damned Spiritualistic vaporings, or by 'God' I'll do my level best to send you to jail for twelve months." The author of this note is one "Rex Reges," an occasional contributor to the Agnostic Journal. This amiable evangelist, a year or two back, pestered us with violently bitter attacks on Mr. G. J. Holyoake, though it is only fair to say that he subsequently apologized for his reckless charges.— Watts's Literary Guide.

A Review of the Church.

It is usual for church people to think there is absolutely only one side of the question in regard to the church and that is their side, and anyone holding differently from them, i.e., the opposit side of the question, must be a person of a very depraved mind; one not worthy of any consideration and not fit to be associated with; one who has no check on his passions; one who is always ready to giv unchecked rein to his desires and rush headlong into any excess that may present itself to him, not thinking that the person of whom they hold such gross considerations may be an educated and honorable person, who is honest and true in all respects, not because of any hope of reward in future life in another world, of which he, nor anyone, knows nothing, but because it is right and for the good of society. It is, perhaps, not so much to be wondered at that church people hold such opinions, when one considers that the church was adopted as a state institution many years ago by one of the greatest empires of the then known world, and anyone holding opinions adverse to the church was deprived of the rights of citizenship and perhaps of property or even life. And such laws and regulations were held until quite recently, reaching even into our own country and nearly, if not quite, into our own times. This intolerance of the church people is because of the lack of knowledge, which is and has been withheld from them for interested purposes of those in power, and the priests and preachers, who may or may not know the history of the church and who may or may not be able to discriminate as to the truth in regard to it. Of those who know the history and the truth in the case, it can only be said, as the least, that they are not honorable men, and of the other class, who may be, and generally are, the most zealous, they are like the blind leaders of the blind, and in either case not fit to be leaders or teachers of the people. Also the people, with such teaching as the church givs, do not dare to hav any doubts of its teaching for fear of committing the unpardonable sin which once committed forever shuts them out of heaven, and then only hell and its tortures confronts them. With these circumstances in view, once having been one of the church people, I wish to show how the subject looks to me now after having investigated somewhat its basis as shown in history. It is impossible to review the church in history without investigating something in regard to the Bible—which many regard as the basis of the church, while the truth of the matter is, the church made the Bible. The idea is prevalent with many that the Old Testament has come down the steps of time from almost untold ages, that Moses wrote the opening books and the other books were written and added in the later years until the time of Christ. If Moses wrote any books, or if the Jews had any sacred writings, they were destroyed about 540 B.C., when Jerusalem was captured and the sacred temple burnt and the remnant of the Jewish nation taken in captivity to Babylon. But after seventy years of captivity they were allowed to return and rebuild Jerusalem, and then Ezra, the high priest, with his associate priests, wrote the traditions of the Jews, to which were added some history and some poetry, which was the nucleus of the Old Testament, but who are the writers of most of the books is unknown.

Since the times of Christ there has been what is called a new dispensation, and books hav been written to meet the changed circumstances, and from them has been formed the New Testament. Many books were written, but only those were chosen by the church which would serve its purpose as a basis upon which they could found their dogmas. It is not known who are the writers of most of the books of the New Testament, consequently they are anonymous, which is the case with the four principal books called the gospels; also the precise time when they, the gospels, were written, is not known. But as far back as they can be traced is to the time of Irenæus, who was the first to speak of them, and he wrote 180–200. Also the gospels did not bear the names they do now until in the sixth or seventh century, when the names they now bear were affixed for the purpose of giving more weight and influence to them.

It is not precisely known when the books forming the Bible were brought together. They were in the possession of the Roman Catholic church, which was founded early in the time of the new dispensation, and that church took action on the books in its various councils, but the canon of the Bible, as it now stands, was not fixed until the council of Trent in 1545.

The Bible was a book of the cloisters in the Catholic church for fifteen hundred years, and none but priests were allowed to read it; to any other who looked into it the penalty was death. The Bible was not brought out publicly until the time of Henry VIII. of England, and then in a quarrel between Henry VIII. and the pope about a woman, and the character of that woman not the best, for she was the mistress of Henry. Catherine of Aragon, the widow of the deceased brother of Henry, was the wife of Henry, and Henry wished for a dispensation from the pope that he might divorce Catherine, so he could marry his mistress Anne Boleyn; but the pope not granting it, Henry divorced Catherine without the permission of the pope, and, to be revenged on the pope, Henry gave the Bible to the public, and established the Church of England in place of the Catholic church which had, hitherto, been the state church of England. On the death of Henry VIII. his son Edward VI. succeeded to the throne and he, during his occupancy of the throne, declared his two sisters illegitimate (Mary, daughter of Catherine, and Elizabeth, daughter of Anne Boleyn, born before the divorce of Catherine was promulgated). On his death he settled the crown on Lady Jane Grey, but Mary, having more influence with the people and the army, had Lady Jane Grey and her husband, Lord Guilford Dudley, arrested for treason and executed. Then Mary tried to restore England to the Catholic church, and in doing so she executed numbers of those who were instrumental in divorcing her father from her mother and in establishing the Church of England, and in doing so she obtained the title of Bloody Mary. After about five years' occupancy of the throne Mary died and she was succeeded by Elizabeth, who again displaced the Catholic church in England, and reëstablished the Church of England, for her legitimacy before the world depended on the success of the church which her father had established, and which had legalized his divorce from Catherine.

The action of Henry VIII. in giving the Bible to the public necessitated the calling of the council of Trent, 1545, to decide what books the Bible should contain and thus decide the canon of the Bible. It is well known that in the councils the decisions were made by voting, so here we hav the spectacle of men declaring and deciding what is the word of God by votes, and the book of Luke stands as the word of God on one vote majority, while the book of Barnabas was decided not to be the word of God by three votes. When it is understood that the Bible has come through fifteen hundred years in the hands of one church, and all we hav of it and know of it, and its entire canonicity, comes from and depends on that one church, on the votes of its priests in council, the inspiration with which it has been clothed drops from it as a cloak from a skeleton, and it stands before us as a man-made book, the production of the church for the purpose of upholding it in its aggrandizement and power by befogging the minds of the people. Then why should we longer accept that book as the arbiter and rule of life which rests on authority that cannot make good its teachings? Such authority is no authority at all, and all the councils and all the votes in the world cannot clothe it with the infallibility that has been ascribed to it and has been claimed for it. On this book, the Bible, rests the whole Christian scheme of salvation—the God who created the earth and all that inhabits it, the Christ who died for the atonement of the sins of the people, the heaven which is to reward the faithful—and this book rests on one church, its councils and the votes of its priests, and that only a little more than three hundred years ago.

Oh, pitiful spectacle, such a foundation for such a grand scheme; and that foundation is crumbling away before the enlightenment of the people, and eventually the superstructure with its God, its Christ, and heaven will topple over and become lost in oblivion.

The council of Trent was the nineteenth ecumenical council of the Catholic church. Some of the preceding councils took action on the Bible, some accepting and others rejecting books of which it is composed, but the council of Trent is the one that took the final action on it and decided what books should be canonical, in 1545, three hundred and forty-five years ago.

The first ecumenical council of the Catholic church was held at Nice in 325, and is memorable as having elected divinity to Christ. We hav here the spectacle of the person who was claimed to be the son of God, and coequal with God, and was God himself, consequently divinity itself, brought to election to decide his divinity three hundred years after he was said to hav been dead. Christ is a character described in the gospels of the New Testament, and no other book givs any history of him, although, if there was such a person, he must hav been a notable character, and contemporaneous historians could not hav given a true history of the times without having something of him in their books, but as no contemporaneous historian has anything to say of Christ, and, as noted before in this article, the gospels, which tell of Christ, were not known until 180 to 200, which was one hundred and fifty years after the time when Christ was said to hav been crucified, and as the writers of those gospels are not known, as a consequence they stand as anonymous works, they hav no weight as authority in regard to any assertion made in them, consequently there is great doubt if any such person as Christ ever lived. It would seem the veriest mockery to elect divinity to a man three hundred years after he was dead. If such a person as Christ ever lived, it is evident that he did not know that he was divine, for if he and others knew that he was divine, why elect divinity to him long after his death?

Also at the council of Nice it was elected that "Three persons in godhead are declared a fundamental article of faith."

At the council of Laodicea in 364, the first day of the week, Sunday, was declared to be the day for worship, and those who held to the seventh day, Saturday, should be anathema.

The reason of changing the day of worship from the seventh day of the week to the first day of the week, as given, is that Christ, having been crucified on Friday, rose from the grave on the first day of the week, or Sunday.

The Roman emperor, Constantine, had previously issued an edict (321) ordering that the first day of the week, Sunday, should be the day of worship instead of the seventh day, Saturday, but it was not generally observed until the council of Laodicea took action on it. There is no scriptural reason given for the change of worship from one day to the other, but the Catholic church took arbitrary power upon itself and made the change.

It is probable that a plainer reason for the change of worship from Saturday to Sunday can be given in astro-theology, viz., the earliest worship was the worship of the planets, and the planet Saturn as the one then known that was farthest from the sun, and took the longest time to make the circuit of its revolution, is called the father of time, or the father of heaven, and as such Saturn is represented as an aged man with forelock, hour-glass, and scythe. The Arabic name of Saturn is Abram—Ab, father, and ram, elevation, that is, elevated father, or father of elevation. The Phœnician name of Saturn is Israel, by some nations called Azrel, or Esrael, the angel of death, because time mows down all. The planet Saturn was worshiped as "our father who art in heaven," and this worship was made or given on the seventh day, Saturn's day, or Saturday, the day on which the creator rested from his labors; but when the worship was changed from Saturn to the sun, the day of worship was changed from the seventh day of the week to the first day of the week, or Sunday. That the present worship is the worship of the sun, there is much testimony to prove, consequently it is appropriate that Sunday is the proper day of worship if one worship at all. The twelve signs of the zodiac represent the twelve gates of the heavenly city, in the midst of which is the great white throne on which sits the lamb—the sun. In every church in the land, and many times in each service, is the name of the sun invoked, though perhaps unwittingly. It is invoked under its title amen, which is generally supposed to mean so let it be; but it is only a transformation, made in the course of time, of the word Ammon, the ancient Ammonian title of the sun; the transformation or changes in pronunciation being: Ammon, Amon, Omen, Aumen, Amen, and under the last pronunciation it is used to end prayers, benedictions, etc., also as giving assent to the subject of discourse. So an ending of prayer which closes, "Through our Lord Jesus Christ, Amen," or Ammon, is really as follows, Through our Lord Jesus Christ, the sun, or everlasting fire. Rev. R. Taylor says: "Easter is never on any other day than Sunday, because it is the sun, and the sun alone, who is our Lord and savior."

Sir Bulwer-Lytton says: "Before the Christian era the Sunday was called the Lord's day, i.e., the day of the Lord, the sun."

I quote as follows from Dr. Wooley's discourse on the word God: "Nobody, nothing—not even the Bible, that most abused of books—teaches, or can teach, as I shall presently show, the existence of a man-shaped, immaterial God. If such a God does exist, where is he and who made him, for the term implies a maker? Show him to us, that we may see him and believe on him, and know him. You cannot do it, O Christian! neither will he show himself. Therefore he does not exist except in the believer's illogical brain. He is an unwarranted assumption of false theologians. I say false theologians, because the true meaning of the term theology was lost sight of and forgotten many centuries ago. Originally it doubtless had a known and determinate significancy assigned it, like astrology and geology, the former being a discourse about aster, or the star, the sun, and thence, by extension of meaning, a discourse about the stars and planets in general; the latter a discourse about ge, or the earth. But what does theology, or a discourse about theos, mean? Who can tell, who can answer this great question, upon which the weal or woe of uncounted millions of human beings depends? Self styled theologians, can you, can you tell us? If so, why hav you not told us long ago? Why keep the precious information all to yourself? Oh, but you answer, 'It is a discourse about God,' 'the science of God.' Ah, indeed! but who is God? I ask again, for the answer is unsatisfactory, being a mere shift, to avoid the show of ignorance. You answer again: God is named because of his goodness (Webster). Admitted. But still this is evasiv and does not help your case a bit. The question again comes up, Who is God? 'In Greek he was called Theos.' Evasiv again. Thus you seek to make Theos and God synonymous, which they are not. That the two hav been confounded I admit. The question then recurs once more, who, or what, was, or is, Theos? If not God, or good, you cannot answer? Very well. You are in darkness, then, and must be brought to see the light. Liddell and Scott, a very good authority, tell us in their Greek lexicon that theos is derived from theein, the infinitiv of the verb theo, 'I run.' As a noun, then, theos must signify a runner—The Runner, in fact, or the sun, as being the largest and most conspicuous of the seven heavenly orbs called planets, i.e., wanderers or runners, by the ancient astrologers. In fact, the authors above named tell us, under this word theos, that 'the first Gods were the sun, moon, etc.' Hence these authors as usual confound the word good with the word bad, making them synonymous, which is plainly not the case, since there may be a bad runner as well as a good runner—the summer sun follows the winter sun.

(CONCLUDED NEXT WEEK.)

Who Made God?

Who made God? and "Canst thou by searching find out God" (Job xi, 7)? are the questions answered in this essay.

The vowel sounds as now used in all spoken or written languages, were derived from and represent the primitiv, audible explosions, in the first simple elementary state of sounds, made by the breath forced outward through the glottis, in the various degrees of contraction and dilatation and of the force or vehemence of the current of the passing air.

When animals discovered that they had the power to use the trachea and rudimentary lingual organs to produce sound and that they could modify or vary this sound to some extent at pleasure, it became an important function or factor to aid them in expressing their conditions and feelings to one another.

Of course the evolution of the lingual organs, and the capacity to use them, was very slow and indefinit, and limited to the expression of the more prominent emotions or states of consciousness of the animal. The gentler, affectionate, or soothing sounds were made by less effort, indicating less disturbance of the nerves and violence of the feeling that produced them. While intense feeling resulting from pain, or the sudden sense of fear, or danger of prospectiv suffering or death being inflicted, would intensify the feelings, the reflex of which on the muscular fiber of the glottis would contract the aperture so that the rapid motion of the compressed air through it would produce a shrill and startling scream.

Animals using these different sounds among their own species soon learn in a certain though vague sense what they represent. The first sounds made by a gentle and less emphatic use of the vocal organs, are represented by the vowel letters o and u, with their modifications.

And we, civilized human beings, use these vowels now for the same purposes that our animal and anthropoid ancestors did, and for the same objects for which they are used by a number of our domestic animals. The horse, cow, and swine, kindly treated and carefully fed by their attendant, will at the accustomed periods call for their rations in tones or sounds which we express by o and u, indicating a state of joy, or hope they feel of immediately gratifying their wants and relieving their sense of hunger.

Animals that hav no voices hav no capacity to giv vocal expression to any sense or feeling they hav of gutt or good; consequently they must ever remain as a species without any knowledge of or disposition to worship any God. Human beings, preëminently endowed with powers of vocal utterance, hav used these exceptional gifts to giv expression to and to magnify a multiplicity of gutts, goods, or Gods; on this account they must ever stand at the head as God-worshipers.

The undeveloped savage has fewer gutts or gods than the civilized man who worships. The civilized man concentrates his minor gutts into one supreme good, God, whom he claims to exist in multitudinous forms of manifestation, assuming that all his good things of life originate from the one source, which he worships and calls God.

The development of the vocal organs and the varied uses we can make of these sounds in their modifications, and combinations with the consonants, are not special gifts or endowments, as the ancients supposed, given to distinguish man from the brute creation at the beginning of his existence; but they are the acquisitions, unavoidable and obligatory, from his environments. Many savages yet are in a rudimentary and transitional state in their vocal powers, yet those vowel sounds are used to represent their feelings; of course less definitly, but in the same way as they do with us.

Their good things are so extremely limited in number compared with ours, that the few words or sounds they utter are chiefly those which express their physical condition as affected by what we call good and evil.

Max Müller, in his "Origin and Analysis of Language," says: "The chief distinction between man and animals consists in men beginning millions of years ago to develop language, and in time becoming able to hand down to succeeding generations the accumulations of labor of countless generations in the sacred shrine of language. We hav not made our language ourselvs, we hav received it." Our languages hav been elaborated by the incessant labors of millions of millions of those who came before us. Whether those ancestors before us were hairy, whether they had tails, whether they walked on all fours, or whether they climbed trees, what does that matter to us?

We are beasts, and wild beasts. Take away language and man is lower than the dumb animals of the fields and forests.

Modern philologists say that savage man never attached enough importance to these vowel sounds, represented by u and o, to worship a divinity or the unseen power that bestowed upon them the organs and the ability to use them. They sought, desired, and cherished the gute, gode, chod, or good, but they never abbreviated the sound, and could not write or express it with a capital G; so with them it is not a symbol of their conceptions of a creator.

Civilized man with his fertil imagination, his boundless resources in the realms of the mysterious and his inventiv genius in the ideal, could alone transfer the origin of these gute or good things of life from the natural and earthly to the supernatural and invisible, and worship them with the name God.

Little do the pious worshipers know, in their flippant use of this term, of its origin and how they came to hav it in their vocabulary. If the glottis, in its function to protect the trachea and lungs from irritating foreign matter, had taken a different shape in the process of evolution, and had not been capable of emitting these vowel sounds as we now express them, we would hav been without them and consequently without a God.

As Max Müller says, millions of years elapsed with our ancestors merely uttering these sounds, to indicate the state of animal feelings. It was all they knew then. As language was millions of years growing, so also were the ideas and thoughts which language expresses.

When the time had arrived for the priestly order to appear, these vowel sounds which had long been but the expression of the emotions, furnished a happy idea to the priesthood, in virtue of their divine office, to make of them a gude or good divinity, a God, and add it to the list of their objects of worship—one that would be popular with all classes that enjoyed good and wished to see it promoted in society.

So they hav given us a God, a name and an object that excites our reverence, our gratitude, and trust so far that science, light, and logic are not able to dislodge it from our affections. To attempt such a task, would be to forfeit our right to inherit the kingdom over which God presides.

In process of time, as the lingual organs developed, by the aid of the consonants men found out they were able from these original vowels to express themselvs in diversified forms, in various shades of thought and feeling, and built up a language, the roots of which can be traced to these vowels.

We hav a class of English words containing these primitiv sounds which from their meanings suggest their derivativ ancestry; all expressing in some sense or form what belongs to a list of good things—i.e., love, joy, hope, comfort, home, order, honor, unity, duty, purity, just.

These words, and many more, are formed by embracing as their root these good, or godly, sounds, indicating the idea and sense of comfort meant by the utterer.

In carrying this basic theory of language further, we will find that three or four of the most prominent vocal tones now in use, answered for primeval man, and these can be classified to come under a specific vowel. As o and u indicate joy, comfort, good, so a, e, and i represent anguish and evil. When men and domestic animals, from pain, or fright, or a sense of danger, become excited, the reaction on the system will generally intensify muscular contraction, to which the glottis will respond, with the impulse and effort to shriek, or scream, in tones to startle the listener, to flee from the danger, or to come to the rescue. Something bad or evil is at hand, and the sounds of the vowels a and e are uttered in the shrill tones of alarm.

So we find a class of words in which these vowels are used, the meanings of which are opposit to many of those containing o and u, and which express an opposit state of the mind and feelings, representing as they do the evil or bad things we encounter in the world.

Pain, anguish, danger, agony, awful, madness, sad, damn, satan, demon, bad, baleful, evil, distress, grief, misery, mean, meager, all these and many more words may be included in one general term, as expressing evil. These priestly orders, then, in attempting to expound their theories of metaphysics, hav ample pretext here for making a divinity, an invisible agency, to preside over and inflict evil, and personify it as the do-evil, now contracted to devil.

A late writer on ancient religions says: "Plato conceived of the Highest as the Good; and either from the prevalence of Platonism, or from some more ancient source, whence Platonism itself came, the word God is probably derived. In the Saxon, Swedish, and Danish languages, good is written god; in Dutch, goed; German, gut, pronounced goot; in Persian, chod. In Saxon and Dutch, the name for deity is God; in Swedish and Danish, Gud; in German, Gott; in Persian, Choda, or Goda. It seems likely that the title of God and the devil (d'evil) applied to the great contending powers supposed to sway the universe, originated in the old Persian ideas concerning Ormuzd, the prince of the Good, and Arimanes, of Evil."

In the genesis of life, after the brain was developed so as to retain impressions and recur to past events, it would soon follow as a result that in motions of the larynx, tongue, lips, and teeth during utterance of sounds, a variety of tones and modulations could be produced at will. At the point of these abrupt changes in the voice, a sudden break in the sounds enabled the speaker to make and use what we call the consonants, and so diversify his utterances as to express a varied and wider range of his thought and feelings. Out of these early, crude efforts of primitiv man, language in all its perfection has grown, and lifted him to the pre-eminence he now occupies in nature as a moral and intellectual being. It was by using the consonants g and d with o he made god.

From being able at first to express his emotions and feelings, his capacity to impart his thoughts and reasonings followed. The phenomena of nature excited him to inquiry and research to account for the cosmos, to trace its existence to a cause. In these feeble speculations, not finding in matter itself what could be an adequate force according to his conception, in directing his vision upward he was impressed with the existence of an unexplored and impenetrable realm where he intuitivly located the power that created and controls the universe.

This, his faith in the God he has made, and his hope in the future of a home in the heavens above, near his creator forever, is the outcome of his selfishness, as the only exceptional creature for God's favors.

In the growth of language from a few simple sounds uttered in monosyllables, we hav a complex vernacular derived from many tongues, in which is lost, by changes of spelling and pronouncing, the original tones that served to divide these primitiv vowels into the two classes, expressing good and evil. The consequence is, words that served this purpose once, which retain the original meaning, can not be recognized by the vowels they contain or in their pronunciation as expressing either the good or evil feelings we experience.

The objection that the mass of words we use containing these vowels hav no reference to our good or evil feelings, is met by the artificial and complex changes that hav largely destroyed the original simple purposes that prompted the primitiv utterance of these sounds.

As Max Müller says, our language, this use of words, is a legacy from our ancestors in their struggles up through centuries from their anthropoid progenitors. All through that period these primitiv sounds of the species hav been preserved and hav become embalmed and treasured as the immortal emblems of human experience upward from zero to our present civilization.

In our impatient vehemence and sternness of denunciation and contempt for the legacy of these past ages, let us not forget our humble origin and deny that charity and forbearance are any longer virtues, and say that no mercy should be shown to the relics still lingering among us of what is esteemed an inheritance from those ancient divinities.

All systems of religion, metaphysical theories, and theological dogmas that ever racked the human brain, are the outgrowth or product of attempts at reasoning and speculation, prompted by the excitation of the nervous system. Pleasure and pain, or the good and evil, to which man was subjected in the infancy of the race, engaged his feeble mental faculties, and he endeavored to account for them by the aid of such light as existed in his limited horizon. From that early day to this, he has been wrestling with the problem to little purpose.

The gods or demons to which the ancients ascribed their authorship, are still popular with the church. The prayer of Zoroaster to the Persian Ormuzd, the author and source of good, was to be delivered from Arimanes and the Dev, who torture and punish with evil.

The Greeks had their thirty thousand demons good and evil, a separate demon for each vice or virtue, but Christians, accepting the Hebrew theology of one Jehovah as the basis of their faith, group all influences in the world which they esteem as the good into one category, and name the demon or divinity, the invisible power from whence they all come, the good or God, and what we feel and believe are of the evil class or group they ascribe to the instigation of the one evil power, which has different names but is best known as the devil. Our first religious literature was written in Greek, by authors developed among myths and demons, which accounts for the uncertainty of its teachings, and for the various interpretations given to it by the teachers or priests of the different sects.

The late revisers of the Bible, who are the very highest authority, and knowing God originated as here set forth, tell us in their Companion to the revised copy that the word of God should never hav been put in that volume; but the Hebrew Jehovah should hav been retained. Jehovah was not always good or Gott, therefore he was not entitled to that name. By this false translation the Saxon Gott, who was the author of good only and not of evil, was made the author of both good and evil, the same as Jehovah, as recorded in the text. This gross misrepresentation of Gott, in making it or him the author of evil, has given it or him a character that justly exposes him to all the criticisms, the gibes, and caricatures of the Infidel and scoffer. The revisers saw the mistake of translation, felt the predicament, but in their dilemma they dare not brave public opinion and venture to rectify it. Vox populi vox dei.

This word or sound which we symbolize with three letters, G-o-d, we see owes its existence to a remote and humble source. It has been pronounced with reverence, glorified and honored, till by its extensiv recognition and acceptance it has expanded into something beyond human comprehension, embracing the invisible worlds, and become a name for the ideal, the unknown first cause. What cannot man accomplish in the line of invention and discovery, by indulging his imagination, when he can make a God, a creator, out of a sound he produces, or his primeval ancestors produced, in giving vent to their feelings by explosions of air through the glottis—a method they adopted to communicate, in this vague way, with one another?

This purposely or stupidly misleading translation of the Bible, the chief literature of priests and people for centuries, not only in respect to the use that has been made of the word gott in substituting it for Jehovah, with a capital G, and making it responsible for the abominations and brutalities on record, and sanctifying them as of divine origin, has kept believers in a worse than mental and moral vassalage. It has helped to make and keep them ignorant, superstitious, savage, and vengeful. Many of the more enlightened clergy know this, but their craft has deified the record as a holy book and the word of God, till their deluded followers hav this infatuation so confidently established that they will not consent nor suffer it to be disparaged or corrected by any human judgment or finite authority.

As humble and unheralded as this God has come to us, many good people accept the word as a symbol of an infinit, eternal cause. Is it wise then to shock and repel with horror all such by open warfare on his existence, or by denying all right or authority for such a being?

The masses are honest in their faith. Is it not much the wiser and better way not to repudiate, deny, and scoff, but leave them with their cherished faith and explain to them its history, its origin, and source? Giv them the facts and unfold to them the processes by which we hav been deprived of the whole truth, and thereby hav been deceived and led astray in our conceptions of theology, religion, and duty. Convince them that our desire and aim is to enlighten them in what is right and true, to hold on to all that is good or God, and to purify ourselvs of all that is evil or false, in thought or deed, in faith and works.

"Is This Your Son, My Lord?"

In 1885 the Freethinkers of New York state held a notable convention in the staid and orthodox city of Albany.

Many things interesting and memorable happened at that convention, things which I cannot help regarding as important steps in the progress of a great evolution. Seward Mitchell was there, and distributed copies of his paper, the World's Reformer. Some blackguards connected with the Young Men's Christian Association, eager to display their zeal, and anxious to grasp at any pretext for making an outcry against the Freethinkers, caused Mitchell to be arrested on a charge of circulating obscene matter. The falsity of the charge was as manifest as the wickedness of the effort to scandalize the Freethinkers, and being readily exposed, Mitchell was honorably discharged, but the incident gave rise to a good deal of warm discussion among the Freethinkers concerning their rights and their policy in such matters.

At this convention I first met Helen Gardener, and coming thence on the boat to New York I enjoyed the charm of her conversation almost all the way. The discussion provoked by the Seward Mitchell incident was taken up by us, and many golden thoughts came from her that day by which I knew she was as earnest in the hope of a better humanity as Seward Mitchell himself. She then promised me that she would write a book in which she would say things that we agreed needed to be said. I looked for the fulfillment of that promis for many a long expectant day, for I knew that she was amply capable and fully equipped to do just what she promised, and I knew of no one else to do the needed work. Then came "Men, Women, and Gods." No! That was not the book I expected. Powerful as it was, and welcome as it was, it was not the book she had promised me, and I was disappointed. Then the world was startled with "Sex and Brain," and women were taught that they might not, after all, be so inferior as Paul said. But this was not the promised book. Then, "A Thoughtless Yes." Not yet the book she promised. I had begun to think that promis would never be redeemed, and I had already begun to deplore the loss which the failure would entail, when, behold! "Is This Your Son, My Lord?" In this book I realized the ample fulfillment of a noble promis.

No novel "written for a purpose" was ever more bright, sprightly, and interesting. It is marvelously true to the life, showing on the part of its gifted author not only a wonderful knowledge of human nature but the photographic fidelity of a real artist in delineation. One great merit of the book is that the moral lessons it is intended to inculcate are conveyed without the appearance of dogmatizing. They come along naturally and spontaneously as incidents to the story and are stated in such a common-sense way that they make the strongest possible appeals to the sense of right. It is a tumultuous outburst of radical thought upon vital subjects, all the more irresistible because so long repressed, and its effects will be to sweep away many strongly intrenched fallacies. It is plain to me that during the years which hav passed since the Albany convention, the author's brain has been activly at work, and that in her book the condensed thought of these years is presented.

The story is one of common life, and with dramatic pathos it tells of the misery bred by our sham civilization. It shows the moral leper posing in our superficial society as a model of righteousness, and it shows the rottenness of the pedestal on which he poses. It is a powerful protest against the degradation of women. It tells that the time has come when the true relation of the sexes shall be established. It is a frank, fearless, ringing plea for a higher civilization, a wider knowledge and better conditions of life. Above all, it teaches, in a way that no theologian has ever been able to teach, and in a sense that no ecclesiastic has ever been able to comprehend, that "the wages of sin is death."

The characters are types. They are familiar to us all. Mr. Mansfield, deacon, school trustee, selectman, etc., giving his son a Comstockian training, whereby his life is blighted, and dying before that training fructifies in his son's ruin. Preston, the son, possessing the possibilities of a noble life but swept on by the influences of his father's training until, after awakening to a keen sense of the wrong by which he has been defrauded of his manhood, he meets a tragic fate. Harvey Ball, an honest, outspoken searcher after truth, ready to follow wherever reason may lead. Fred Harmon, the typical college-bred youth whose rowdyism must conform to the most approved style—such a kind of young man as naturally develops into Judge Carpenters, making frantic efforts to appear respectable by the condemnation of Heywoods, and with neither brains nor common honesty enough to see that the price paid for such sham respectability, even though the payment be extorted from others, is grossly in excess of its value.

This book will unsettle the foundations of the church more than any book that has appeared for a long time, for it will compel honest thought upon vital subjects. That honest thought is what the church most dreads, and those subjects the church cannot afford to hav thought about. It is not the attacks upon orthodoxy which crop out at frequent intervals throughout the book that will hav this effect, but the fact that the author strikes directly at the root of a monstrous evil upon which the very existence of the church depends. Stubbornly blind to what the world might be if ruled by science and love instead of by ignorance and brutality, the only teaching of the church concerning the origin of life is that we are "born in sin and conceived in iniquity," which is tantamount to saying that our fathers were old Turks and our mothers should hav been ashamed of themselvs. Such teaching not merely ignores the boundless love that leads women to pass through the valley of the shadow in testimony of their devotion to men, but it stands as a direct insult to every human being, and it is high time that the fact were proclaimed as bravely as the author proclaims it by the publication of this book, that in so far as this teaching is true it is directly the fault of the church, and that humanity demands something different.

The inexorable fact of human life is that effect follows cause. The church has always tried to ignore this, and to keep back the knowledge of it, but the world is being awakened with a terrible awakening, and it will reproach the church with the bitter cry of Preston Mansfield over his father's grave—"Damn him! He has robbed me of myself!"

ED. W. CHAMBERLAIN.

Plenty of Christs.

From the Times.

The Indian is not alone in his expectation of an early appearance of a new messiah, as numerous instances are on record where, within the last two or three years, the more civilized and better-educated white men and black men of America hav professed to hav received revelations, and in some cases to be the Christ himself.

It was only in the summer of 1888 that one Patterson, of Tennessee, went around preaching that a wonderful thing was to happen; and when he thought the times were ripe he declared that the second advent of Christ had come, in the person of A. J. Brown, who had served as Patterson's assistant. These two fanatics secured a large following as they went forth preaching their new doctrin, promising to forgiv sins and heal all diseases. It was finally announced that Brown must go up into the mountains and fast for forty days and nights in order that he might be fittingly prepared for the mission intrusted to his hands. He suddenly disappeared, and nothing was seen of him for many days. When the prescribed period had passed, on a Sabbath morning in June, his followers went out toward the hills, and suddenly he appeared before them, clothed in white, and his hands uplifted. A great shout went up, and the people rushed toward him, falling upon their knees and kissing his feet. Many who were ill declared themselvs healed by his touch. So great was the fanaticism of these people that one girl declared she was ready to die to prove her faith, and the non-believers around the town of Soddy, where these things happened, became so fearful that human life would be sacrificed that they sent for the sheriff, at Chattanooga, and it required all his power to compel Patterson and Brown to leave the neighborhood, that quiet might be restored.

A year later, in 1889, occurred that remarkable series of impositions upon the credulity of the colored people, where one man after another proclaimed himself as the Christ, promised miracles, drew crowds of excited men and women from their labors, and created consternation in those portions of the South where their performances were carried on. In one case a man nearly white, who gave his name as Bell, went among the negroes who lived along the Savannah river and proclaimed himself as the returned Christ, crying out that those who hoped to be saved must giv up everything and follow him. Hundreds believed him, left the cotton fields, the sawmills, and the turpentine stills, and followed Bell, obeying his lightest word and ready to fall down at his feet in worship. So great was the disturbance that the authorities were led to arrest Bell, and when he was taken his followers would hav torn his captors to pieces and rescued him had he given the word. He told them to be patient, declaring that an angel would come to him and break his prison doors by night, and that he could not be harmed. As he had some money in his possession he was not held for vagrancy, and although thought not to be in his right mind was soon discharged from custody. He then continued his preaching, followed by even greater crowds than before; announced that the world would come to an end on August 16th; that all white men would then turn black and all black men white, and that he could supply all who wished to ascend on the last day with wings at $5 a pair.

When Bell was finally sent to his proper place —an insane asylum—Edward James, a colored justice of the peace in the same neighborhood, announced himself as the messiah and proceeded to put forward claims as extravagant as those of Bell. He repeated the declaration of Bell that the end of the world was coming August 16th, preached that money was no longer of any use in the world, and prevented the employers of labor in that section from obtaining needed help. James was finally arrested and sent to the state insane asylum at Milledgeville. Yet another negro appeared in Cherokee county with the same pretensions; another in Camden, and a woman in Brunswick attempted the performance of miracles. In each of these cases the excitement was short-lived, but fanatical ignorance was provided in sufficient portions to make trouble while it lasted.

A very marked example of imposition upon the one side and blind credulity upon the other, the basis being a claim of the visible Christhood in the flesh, is furnished in the career of George J. Schweinfurth at Rockford, Ill. In the cases above cited the claimants were obscure and ignorant men, while the dupes were of the lowliest among the freedmen, who were guided only by their emotions and had no help from culture and education either in themselvs or in the community around them. Vastly different was the Rockford delusion, springing up in the most intelligent section of the West, at the behest of the wife of a Congregational minister, who preached that in her own person were the attributes of the risen Lord. It is some sixteen years since Mrs. Dora Beekman advanced this claim, and her followers were at first few in number, but they were strong in faith, and they located their church at Byron, near Rockford, and went zealously to work. Mr. Beekman, not believing in the new doctrin, was torn by conflicting doctrins until finally he found relief in insanity and an asylum.

Among the converts finally came Schweinfurth, a young Methodist minister of pleasing address and appearance and of some mental power. He was soon installed as bishop and sent forth upon mission labor. After a time, as in the case of Ann Lee, the founder of Shakerism, Mrs. Beekman's claim of immortal life was disproved by her death, and the shrewd bishop stepped into the breach, declaring that the divine spirit had passed from their former leader to himself. The claim was allowed, and to-day he is worshiped by hundreds, not merely as the Christ returned to the flesh, but as the maker and ruler of the earth as well.

These claims, made in the open light of the nineteenth century and allowed by people who hav the means of finding the truth by a little investigation, show that men are about what they always hav been, and furnish an excuse for the wonderful spiritual impostures of the past. The various performances of the faith curists might also be cited as illustration of the same point.

The impositions and vagaries above mentioned hav been the performances of a class, and to enumerate all the religious fanaticisms and delusions of individuals recorded in America even in the last two years would demand an unreasonable expansion of space. One noted instance was that of Mrs. Pauline King, the colored woman of Oakridge Park, Ill., who advertised that, as she had fasted forty days, she would publicly turn water into wine as had been done at the marriage feast at Cana of Galilee. When the people had gathered on the appointed day she had a jar filled with water from a neighboring well; led in a hymn and prayer, and then tested the contents of the jar and found nothing but water; and her leadership was gone, even though her faith remained.

A brother and sister named Boland at High Prairie, Kan., became so excited at a religious revival that they went home and built a fire on the floor of their house, danced around it, and would hav been burnt to death had not the neighbors come to the rescue. John Kuhni, a quiet laborer in a Wisconsin cheese factory, could not convert his room-mate, and so he killed him, because he would be better dead than alive; cut out his heart to see if it was black, and buried it separately from the rest of the body, that it might not cause the whole body to go to hell. The people of a certain portion of North Carolina were greatly stirred up early this year by the preaching of a number of Baptist ministers that the world would come to an end before the close of the year. In Alabama certain churches of the Shermanite denomination had the end set for a certain day in February, and when it arrived they met at various places of worship and spent the forenoon in singing and praying, and only went home when sunset showed them that some one had made a serious miscalculation in the date.

Early in 1888 one Silas Wilcox made his appearance in western Missouri, preaching but one doctrin —the care of the sick. Of course, he soon gathered a little band around him, the members of which took unto themselvs the name Samaritans. As his influence extended his creed expanded, and he finally declared that the drinking of blood would heal all manner of diseases, because the Bible declared that the blood was the life. In many cases children were found who had been bled that the elders might be restored, and the strong arm of the law had to be evoked before the practice was suppressed. Before the Rev. Stephen Nolan of Kentucky died, in January last, he declared that he had had three bodily visitations from Christ. In Indiana, in April, Clyde Long, a boy of seventeen, declared that he was Christ, and must be crucified. He erected a cross and begged to be nailed upon it, and when refused, took a knife and cut himself in a fearful manner.

Another instance was that remarkable exodus from Oakland, Cal., last April, when Mrs. Woodworth prophesied that many cities would be buried by earthquakes and tidal waves on the 14th, and many persons became so impressed that they packed their goods into wagons and fled to the hills, where they sat down to wait for the destruction that never came. Patrick Gorman set out to starve himself in a Connecticut jail because, he said, God had ordered him so to do, and for many days kept it resolutely up. William Thompson, of Kansas, attended Adventist meetings in El Dorado to such purpose that he went home and attempted to put his family out of the world a little before the end that he believed was near, but was overpowered and kept under restraint until the excitement wore away. James Baily was arrested in Alabama only three months ago for obtaining money from the colored people upon the pretense that he was high priest of the queen of heaven and could cure any ill by a touch. Mrs. Sullivan, of Springfield, O., became exceedingly devout, sat up at night and read her Bible, talked and thought of nothing but religion, and finally constructed an altar in her house, upon which she prepared to sacrifice her six-months-old babe. She stripped it naked, placed it upon the altar, and reached for a knife, when the opportune entrance of other persons saved its life.

In October the newspapers told the fearful story of that religion-crazed son and daughter in Michigan who determined that their bedridden mother needed to be baptized, and poured water over her until she died. Mrs. Woodworth, who was responsible for the Oakland exodus, moved her tent to St. Louis and for weeks kept up a scene of religious frenzy, scores falling unconscious each evening, seeing visions, receiving communications from the dead, and being cured of physical evils.

None of these events—and scores of like character might be added—bears testimony against true and reasonable religion, but they plainly show what human belief can be led to, and the harm that can be done by unscrupulous or misguided men and women. The recent Indian craze is only a portion of that mysterious wave that has swept over the human emotions from the beginning of time—the Indian showing that he is neither stronger nor weaker than his brother of other hues.

Responsibility for the Indian Craze.

From the Tribune.

To what extent the Indians are accountable for the superstition that is now raging so fiercely among them is a problem. One of the recent reforms inaugurated by the Indian bureau in its effort to teach the red people self-government according to our ideas, is a police court composed of Indian judges. Its inferior officers are also Indians. Its processes are served by Indian clerks and its decrees enforced by Indian policemen. These officials are selected by the white man in control of the agency, who possesses an appellate and a general supervisory function. At a recent session of one of these courts, held at Standing Rock, the principal Sioux agency, some sixty miles south of Bismarck, N. D., the precise character of the superstition was revealed in the testimony of Wal-tit-a-win, who claims to be the mother of the Indian messiah. She said that her son was a divine being; that he was now on the earth preparing for its regeneration; that the Indians were his chosen people, and that the whole western continent was to be given over to them; the white man was to be driven from the land, and simultaneously the Indians who now sleep were to be resurrected and forever confirmed in the happy and peaceful possession of their ancient dominions.

It is not to be denied that this belief has taken a firm hold upon thousands of the bravest and most dangerous Indians, men to whom the evidence of their own senses will be no argument against the advisability of warlike enterprises in support of the messiah's mission. The situation is ominous. It portends an Indian war upon a scale far surpassing such outbreaks as in past years hav been caused by ordinary discontent. It needs to be handled with the utmost delicacy—and all the more because of the analogy which can be drawn between the Christian religion and the prophecies of Wal-tit-a-win. We must remember that these prophecies are only a combination of the teachings of our own missionaries with an ancient Indian belief concerning the coming of a Great Spirit, in whose wake will tread the vast army of the Indian dead. The return of the ghosts is an Indian superstition much older than the American government. It was undoubtedly derived from intercourse with the whites. The entirety of this new religion is of Saxon origin. But the Indians hav lost sight of that, and in the ages that hav gone since they first knew of the white usurper they hav come to believe in this notion and that of an Indian New Jerusalem as a peculiar faith of their own.

The nature and extent of our embarrassment in any effort we may make to undeceive the Indians are well shown in a conversation recently reported between Gall and a white visitor. Gall, if not the ablest, is by far the most powerful personage of the Sioux tribes. Around him is all the glamour of a romantic career, the impressivness of a noble physique, the strength of a great orator, and the renown of a brave and successful warrior. He is in every way a man of distinction and ability, and without possessing anything in the nature of supreme authority, for the Sioux are the most communistic of Indians, he has still a vast influence among his people. Fortunately for us, since his return from the Canadian exile into which the Custer massacre carried him, he has been friendly to the American government. He has traveled extensivly throughout the United States, visiting all our great cities, and becoming acquainted with our numerical strength and our immeasurable resources. It is in the highest degree significant, therefore, when this Indian thoughtfully observes that he sees no more improbability in the story of Wal-tit-a-win than in the religion the white man asks him to believe. "I listen," he says. "I sit and listen and wonder. When they say the buffalo will come back and the dead will breathe again, I wonder and doubt. But then I think of the strange things the white man believes in his religion, and that makes me wonder more. For if I say my people are crazy now, I must say that the white man has always been crazy, too. I hav seen and felt many things that before I would not hav thought could be."

THE normal effect of a certain class of realizations [those of eternal torment] upon the character would be to produce an absolute indifference to the sufferings of those who were external to the church, and consequently to remove that reluctance to inflict pain which is one of the chief preservativs of society. —Lecky.

CHAPTER VI.

THE DOCTRIN OF THE ATONEMENT.

What meaning was attached to the doctrin of the atonement when first propagated is extremely doubtful at this late date of the world's history. The Socinians, however, maintained that Jesus did not suffer to make satisfaction for the sins of men; that he died rather to demonstrate his divine mission—which was, to teach the doctrin of a resurrection to a future immortal life, the truth of which he desired to show by his own death and resurrection. Certain it is that there has been great disagreement among the various sects as to what Jesus meant to teach in reference to his alleged "atonement." If he meant that by his death he would obliterate the sins of mankind, some of his utterances are extremely misleading. Further, if this interpretation is to be put upon the words of Jesus, some of the leading sentiments of the Old Testament are altogether out of harmony with such teaching.

The Old Testament proclaimed that the "Lord God was merciful and gracious, long-suffering and abundant in goodness and truth, keeping mercy for thousands, forgiving iniquity and transgression and sin."

But if the church doctrins respecting the atonement were true, how could God be said to be forgiving if he required the death of the innocent as an atonement for the sins of the guilty?

The Jews certainly had no idea of such a doctrin. They expected a triumphant messiah, not a suffering one.

Jesus himself said many things which were opposed to the idea that God would require the death of the innocent. In the Lord's prayer he bade his followers to forgiv others as they expected to be forgiven; also when Jesus was asked how often a man should forgiv his brother, he replied by saying, Not seven times but seventy times seven (Luke xvii, 4). That there are other statements in the Old and New Testament that contradict these, I know full well, but that only shows that the Bible is not an infallible guide either in sentiment or doctrin. History demonstrates most clearly that the doctrin of the atonement has undergone numerous transitions and that after many changes it finally developed into what is now known as the accepted doctrin of the church, and indeed of all the Christian sects, except the Unitarians. Let us, however, calmly examin this doctrin in the shining light of reason and common sense, and judge it at the bar of justice and humanity. Viewed in this light, what shall we find? We shall find the idea presented of a God who makes a man so imperfect that his very first actions are sinful; a God who is so revengeful that nothing can appease his wrath but the merciless sacrifice of human life. For four thousand years this God nursed his wrath; then we are assured that he mercifully decided to sacrifice a part of himself in order to appease the vengeful spirit of the other part.

In the second place, the Rationalist objects that if Jesus were God he could not die—that the eternal could neither begin nor end; and, therefore, that either Jesus was not God, or his alleged death was a mockery. And thirdly, that upon no principles of justice could the death of the innocent be allowed, —and it would not effect its object if it were.

In what sense could the death of the innocent blot out the sins of the guilty? The past cannot be revoked. A deed once done cannot be undone; and the death of the innocent, therefore, would only add another crime to those already committed.

In one of Mr. Henry Arthur Jones's plays, "The Silver King," this author makes his hero appeal to God to "put back the dial of time and giv him back his yesterday." Even an omnipotent deity could not do this. Existence cannot be and not be at the same time. And once an event happens in the universe nothing on earth or in heaven can undo it. Dr. Martineau makes some excellent comments upon the immorality and the injustice of this doctrin. He says (Studies from Christianity, page 97), "Now, I would note, in passing, that this announcement to Adam of an eternal punishment impending over his first sin is simply a fiction, for the warning to him is stated thus: 'In the day that thou eatest thereof, thou shalt surely die,' from which our progenitor must hav been ingenious as a theologian to extract the idea of endless life in hell. But to say no more of this, what notion of veracity hav we here? When a sentence is proclaimed against crime, is it indifferent to judicial truth upon whom it falls? Personally addressed to the guilty, may it descend without a lie upon the guiltless? Provided there is suffering is it no matter where? Is this the sense in which God is no respecter of persons? Oh, what deplorable reflection of human artifice is this, that heaven is too veracious to abandon its proclamation of menace against transgressors, yet is content to vent it on goodness the most perfect! No darker deed can be imagined than is thus ascribed to the source of all perfection under the insulted names of truth and holiness. What reliance can we hav on the faithfulness of such a being? If it be consistent with his nature to punish by substitution, what security is there that he will not reward vicariously? All must be loose and unsettled, the sentiments of reverence confused, the perceptions of conscience indistinct, where the terms expressiv of those great moral qualities which render God himself most venerable are thus sported with and profaned."

Further, this learned author affirms that "The same extraordinary departure from all intelligible meaning of words is apparent, when the charge of vindictivness against the doctrin of sacrifice is repelled as a slander. If the rigorous refusal of pardon till the whole penalty has been inflicted (when indeed it is no pardon at all) be not vindictiv, we may ask to be furnished with some better definition." The church, having adopted the doctrin of the atonement in all its inconsistency, cannot possibly escape the consequences attendant upon its adoption. The more logical-minded representativs of the church hav long seen that the doctrin of the "fall" and that of the atonement stand or fall together; and though a large number of the more liberal-minded among the clergy sometimes vaguely suggest that the alleged fall is "probably mythical," they do not go the length of admitting that the doctrin of atonement is "probably mythical" also. The teaching of evolution in reference to these doctrins is very plain. It goes to the root of them. It shows, first of all, that man is not a fallen being, but a rising one; that the history of the human race is one of constant struggle toward higher and better things, and that man to-day is better than he ever has been in the past. It demonstrates also that man can never sin against God; that if God were allpowerful he could prevent man from doing anything that was calculated to offend him; man being incapable of injuring God, he can never sin against him. And if he has never sinned against deity he does not need some one to atone for him. Consequently both doctrins—the doctrin of original sin and its necessary corollary, the doctrin of the atonement—are alike false, and are but an evidence of past ignorance and superstition which it requires only an age of knowledge and science to remove forever.

ARTHUR B. MOSS.

Clergymen Who Liv to Fleece the People Under Their Charge.

From the New York World.

On the streets of every city, every town, and in every village, from one end of Russia to another, the foreign traveler passes men whose habit is sufficiently distinct from those in other countries to attract attention. The habit in question consists of a long cloth gown that reaches to the ankles, a soft felt billy cock hat, and heavy top boots. The gown usually is black, but is sometimes blue, and is girdled snugly about the waist. Whether you meet one of these odd figures on the most fashionable street in St. Petersburg or in a remote village of a distant province, the dress, figure, and deportment are identically the same.

These gentlemen are the pops, or "white clergy," of holy Russia. The long gown and severely simple attire are supposed to be in imitation of the savior when on earth, though not more than one pop in a hundred knows it, and the likeness is increased by wearing long hair. The eye of the World correspondent has probably rested with more or less searching scrutiny on a hundred of these orthodox Russian priests during the horseback ride from Moscow to the Crimea, and the result is that I hav decided to spell them without an e.

By the Russians they are called both "pops" and "popes." Having so far failed to discover in the face of a single one of them an expression of benevolence or a glimmer of the light of that righteousness of soul that we are accustomed to associate with the title of pope, it is in no wanton spirit of irreverence that I choose to call them "pops." Nor is there the slightest fear of exciting resentment in the minds of any Russian outside the clergy, by so denominating these pastors.

From the standpoint of an outsider the Russian pop cuts a comical, not to say contemptible, figure on the world's stage. Viewing him from a plane beyond his sphere of influence, you feel like laughing him off the boards, but install yourself among the people who are forced to hav dealings with him, and he changes from a comical to a serious character, whose deserts would be hootings and carrots rather than merriment. But because the pop is born into his position and inherits his characteristics from many generations of sires and grandsires, every one of whom was as incongruous and out of place in the garb of Christ as he, it behooves us not to be too uncharitable in our judgment.

The Russian priest occupies a unique and unenviable position in the society of his own country as well as among the spiritual representativs of the earth. The Romish priest and the Protestant pastor, who take the initiativ in works of charity and keep a sharp eye on the morals of their parishioners, would find in the heart and the deeds of the Russian pop no chord of sympathy. The pop rarely preaches sermons, and he takes no part in charitable works nor bothers himself about the moral welfare of the people. His interest in the benefice to which he has been assigned on ordination begins and ends with the amount of money he is able to squeeze out of his parishioners. As he neither pretends nor is expected to make any pretense to a life of morality, his methods of adding to his income are often strangely at variance with our ideas of what pertains to the office and functions of a priest.

In some districts the pops receive small salaries from the government and in others grants of land, off which, with the addition of baptismal, marriage, burial, and other fees, they are required to make their living. Short of stealing and robbery with violence, the more unscrupulous of the clergy resort to any method of extortion and money-getting. Their most notorious methods are to act in their parishes as agents for the sale of certain brands of vodka, and by their own example and all manner of insinuating measures promote its consumption among the peasants.

The imperial government looks with indulgent eye on the drunkenness of its subjects, and resents temperance agitation with almost as much jealousy as political, the reason being that the greater part of its revenue comes from the tax on liquor. The priests, who in other countries are ever foremost in checking the growth of intemperance, in Russia promote it by every means short of pouring vodka down the people's throats. With a view to commissions on its sale, the pops excuse its consumption by the too willing moujik on the most specious pretenses. He will even quote scripture to them to prove that there is no harm in getting drunk, his favorit quotation being: "Not that which goeth into the mouth of a man defileth him; but that which cometh out."

The size of the pop's income depends as much on the ignorance, superstition, and credulity of his parishioners, coupled with his own shrewdness, as on the size and population of the parish. His legitimate fees among the peasantry are three roubles for officiating at a funeral, one rouble at christenings, and one rouble for a private morning mass. At weddings he receives anything up to ten roubles, and at betrothals a bottle of red wine. In addition to these, however, he manages in one way or another to lay the moujiks under contribution to the extent of cultivating his land.

A pop deems it no disgrace to get drunk, nor does he by loose living lose caste in the estimation of his parishioners so long as his looseness affects nobody's pocket but his own. In fact, in Russia as elsewhere, and among pops no less than among other people, the man of convivial habits is apt to be at the bottom a generous soul.

As a class the pops are cordially hated and despised by the Russian people. The peasantry regards them not as spiritual fathers, but as corrupt agents of the church, just as the police and the hordes of officials who prey upon them are corrupt agents of the government. One set are disreputable tools of the church, the others of the czar. Both church and czar they reverence, but they expect nothing but extortion and corrupt practices from the minions of either. Among the peasants the worst-hated minions of the civil government are the uriadniks, a horde of nearly six thousand rural police, who, in 1878, were let loose among them, with almost unbridled powers of petty persecution. The uriadnik has become a by-word among the people, and on a par with him, in the estimation of the moujiks, is what is known among them as the "merchant pop."

For a drunken, dissolute clergyman the moujiks hav no special aversion, because in their eyes drunkenness, even in a priest, is no sin, and, as before stated, they trouble themselvs little about what does not affect their own pockets. It is because the practices of the "merchant pop" do affect their pockets that they hold him in special abhorrence above others of the cloth.

The "merchant pop" is a priest who is forever scheming to extort money from his parishioners. His ways of reaching their pockets are multifarious, and his ingenuity is exercised in preying on the credulity, the fanaticism, and the superstition of the wooden-headed moujik. The "merchant pop" not only acts as agent for the sale of vodka, for the greater consumption of which he multiplies the holidays and merry-makings in his district, but he also concerns himself in the sale of icons, or holy images, and by granting bogus certificates of communion.

Every orthodox Russian is required by law to provide himself with a certificate, showing that he has partaken of the holy communion within the year. To backslide from the church is a penal offense for which thousands of Russians hav been transported to Siberia, and a subject of the czar known to hav been born in the orthodox faith, found by the police without a eucharistical certificate from his priest, would find himself in trouble. Under the surface dissent is rife; and it is in districts where dissatisfaction with the senseless rituals of the established church abounds that the commercial pop flourishes and grows rich the easiest. For the heretics who come to him, roubles in hand, he makes out bogus certificates of communion, and those who think to escape notice he ferrets out and levies upon.

The commercial pop bargains and chaffers over the fees for baptisms, weddings, and burials, and every religious service required of him by his people is a financial speculation. For roubles he will officially condone all offenses, and grant absolution for all manner of evil-doing. Without pay he will neither pray for rain to revive the crops nor burn candles before the icon of St. Nicholas, the moujiks' favorit saint. Much as they despise him, the moujiks believe him to be the medium through which the blessings or the curses of the church and the saints affect them and their interests, and of this belief the commercial pop takes every advantage to transfer from their lean pockets to his own their hard-earned kopecks. Perhaps it was studying at close range the ungodly transactions of the commercial pop that brought Count Tolstoi to the conclusion that the primary duty of every minister of the gospel is to earn his own living as a husbandman.

To the foreigner who has been accustomed to regard the wearers of the cloth with something akin to the same reverence that he feels for the church, the Russian pop and the place he occupies in the minds of the people is something of an enigma. In the Russian mind the pop seems to hav no connection with the church beyond a financial interest in its forms and ceremonies. The government has appointed him official purveyor of baptismal forms, marriage rites, holy water, and masses, for which he receives fees, and by means of which he makes capital out of the superstition and ignorance of the peasantry.

The church they reverence; but the pop, who stands between it and the people and acts the middleman in dispensing or withholding its blessings, is the butt of the national satire and figures largely in popular songs and stories as a charlatan and a despicable fellow generally. The Russian who has committed some grievous sin, and is prepared to go to any ruinous length in regaining the favor of the saints, approaches the pop on the subject of special masses for the purpose in much the same spirit as he would approach a rascally dealer in spavined and broken-winded horses. He broaches the subject cautiously and in a roundabout manner, lest by appearing too eager he betray to the pop the fact that his services are urgently required; a piece of indiscretion which he knows only too well would result in an immediate inflation of that gentleman's fees.

On his part the pop, by means of long practice and a hereditary insight into the workings of the Russian conscience, has acquired such an expertness in detecting the very things that these would-be cheapeners of the holy functions try to conceal that he invariably gets the better of the bargain. It is this prostitution of the holy office to a bargaining and haggling over roubles and kopecks that is the secret of the pop's unenviable position. All business in Russia is transacted on a low moral basis. Every Russian merchant cheats and overreaches, as a matter of course, nor do customers expect anything better of them. The moujik feels no resentment against the man who tries to overreach him in a bargain for a red shirt; because if he fails in his bargaining with one merchant he goes to another. But with the dealer in masses and sacraments he is deprived of this freedom by the government, which has practically given the pop of his parish a monopoly. If the mass merchant refuses to chant and burn candles for him, save at exorbitant rates, which he very often does, the extortionate rates hav to be paid.

Russians will tell you that cases are common in the villages of pops refusing to bury the dead and administer the sacrament to the dying until the prices they demanded were forthcoming. Thus it has come to be a common saying among the people that "the pop takes money both from the living and the dead." From what the World correspondent has seen and experienced among the Russians, however, I am far from taking a one-sided view of the matter between pops and people. Take the pops as they are, without any pretense to a higher degree of commercial morality than their parishioners, and it is a fair battle of wits between them. If the pops overreach the people in charging for their services, there is, on the other hand, not a communicant among their flock who would not, if he could, bamboozle the pop into praying for him and administering the sacrament to him for nothing. There are no people in the world so intent on getting something from some one else for nothing as the subjects of the czar.

In addition to being hated and despised by the people the two orders of clergy in Russia—the black clergy or monks, and the white clergy or pops—hate and despise one another. The pops hate the monks because it is from their ranks that all the higher dignitaries of the church are chosen, and because the monastic orders attract nearly all the death-bed bequests of the wealthy, which they think might otherwise come their own way. This abhorrence is repaid with interest by the monks, who affect to despise the pops as being the "small rogues of the church," and responsible for the scant esteem in which both orders are held by the people.

One day, during the ride from Moscow to the Crimea, we met a pop on the road. A party of moujik tramps who were ahead of us met him first, and after they had passed him they, without any visible notice, wheeled round and walked straight across to the opposit side of the road. In explanation of this my companion informed me that it is considered bad luck to meet a pop on the road, and, by crossing his trail at right angles, thereby forming a cross behind him, the moujiks hoped to avert any calamity that would otherwise overtake them as a consequence of having met him.

Many of the pops are men of fair education, but others are wofully ignorant, particularly of the scriptures. Sacha told me of a village pop who knew only one passage of scripture, and this he used to repeat over and over again as a regular order of service. The congregation used to respond with the same. The passage was: "And Christ went down to Jerusalem."

One day the pop was thrown into consternation by hearing that a nobleman who owned an estate in the district was coming from St. Petersburg and would attend mass next Sunday. It would never do to betray to the nobleman the fact that he knew but one passage of scripture. He consulted a brother pop in the adjoining parish. This gentleman did not know any scripture at all, but advised him as the easiest plan to substitute Bethlehem for Jerusalem for the occasion of the nobleman's visit.

This was an easy thing for a man of education like the pop, but when it came to the responses the thick-headed moujiks forgot their pastor's instructions about Bethlehem and bawled out the word they had from long usage grown accustomed to. The pop was furious. Forgetting the presence of the nobleman he shouted out:

"You wooden heads, it isn't Jerusalem to-day; I told you it was to be Bethlehem!"

Priests of this class are known to the Russians as "one-mass pops." THOMAS STEVENS.

What Was the Physical Cause of the Death of Jesus Christ?

From the Medical Record.

This question, the discussion of which has lately been revived in the British Medical Journal (!), and participated in in various other quarters, would seem to hav been a puzzle both to the faculties of theology and medical science ever since biblical criticism has had a voice. And yet, if handled with frankness, it would not seem difficult of solution.

In the first place, it seems to be admitted on all hands that Jesus did not die from the immediate and natural, or ordinary, effect of his suspension on the cross. This method of punishment was very common among the Romans, Jews, and other nations of antiquity, and it is abundantly substantiated as a fact, in addition to its consistency with the established laws of human endurance, that the subject of it, when of ordinary health and strength, would survive his torture for from two to four or even five days. But Jesus was suspended but about as many hours, or not above six at the most. Accordingly it was that when at the ninth hour, or 6 o'clock PM, Pilate was asked for his body, "he marveled if he were already dead" (Mark xv, 44).

Nevertheless it has been the part, as it has been indeed the necessity, of orthodoxy to hold that when taken down from the cross by Joseph of Arimathea and laid away in the sepulcher (or recess in the rocky hillside), he was as veritably dead as the soldiers who were sent to break the legs of the crucified supposed him to be; and many ingenious explanations hav been devised and argued to account for what, to those who stood by, must hav been so strange and unexpected.

Without undertaking the task of setting forth and controverting these, and bearing in mind that the death of Jesus is nowhere represented by the evangelists or elsewhere as miraculous or other than natural, let us examin the gospel narrativ with an unprejudiced eye and see what honest inferences may be drawn therefrom.

And let us bear in mind, too, that the accounts there found are not only all that we hav from which to make deductions, but that they are, at least excepting their miraculous or supernatural features, of unquestionable credibility in all essential particulars, differences of detail even lending support to the main story; the capture, the trial, the crucifixion, the interment, and the reappearance of Jesus among the living, are facts as assured to my mind as the taking of Jerusalem by Titus. No sufficient reason can be imagined for the invention of any of them, save only the resurrection, and that that really occurred so unexpectedly to all the disciples, the immediate and rapid spread of Christianity thereafter is alone sufficient evidence, since it is impossible to account for it in any other way. It was the "immortality [believed to be] brought to light through the gospel" that alone gave that gospel its enduring and conquering vitality, and is still both its chief support and the great stumbling-block of unbelievers.

What is spoken of by all the evangelists as the "giving up the ghost" by Jesus—it is uncertain how long before he was taken down from the cross—was undoubtedly partial or entire syncope from exhaustion, aided perhaps by the desolation that he felt when he found, or thought he found, himself forsaken by his God (Mark xv, 34); or it might be even that he affected a condition of insensibility in order to escape such further cruelties as the supplying his thirst with vinegar.

However this may be, we can well believe that when the soldiers came to finish the barbarous work, by breaking the legs of the victims, they found him in a condition which men even less ignorant, stupid, and careless than they most likely were, would easily and naturally take for actual death. For Jesus, it must be remembered, was already worn nigh to exhaustion with fasting and anxiety, to say nothing of his undoubted highly sensitiv organization.

Here we come, in the gospel according to John (xix, 32–37, and xx, 27), to a plain solution of the whole great mystery. Soldiers were sent by Pilate, at the request of the Jews, to break the legs of Jesus and the two thieves, in order that the ensuing "day of Preparation" might not be desecrated by their still hanging from the cross, and that they might be effectually disabled from escaping death. They practiced this horrible feat of cruelty on the companions in misery of Jesus, but when they came to him they found, or supposed that they found, him to be already dead, and accordingly neglected to complete what anatomists know must hav been a somewhat difficult job.

"But one of the soldiers with a spear pierced his side, and forthwith came thereout blood and water." Now, there is but one part of the human anatomy, it need not to be argued, where the thrust of a spear would naturally be followed by such a phenomenon as this, and that is in the region of the urinary bladder.

Moreover, while a wound like that would not immediately destroy life, and might even easily permit the sufferer to go or be conveyed about, and show himself from time to time for a few days, it would not, nevertheless, in view of the poor surgery of those times, and of the uncertain care, or even neglect, that a refugee would inevitably suffer, fail before any long time to prove mortal.

This, then, is the true story of the reappearance or resurrection of Jesus after his supposed death on the cross. Removed to the cool tomb by the tender hands of his friends, and placed in a horizontal position, he recovered, probably after some hours, from his state of syncope or collapse, and easily made his way to some selected refuge, leaving behind him the garniture of the grave which Mary, but not Simon Peter, took for angels clad in white raiment. Then he lingered out his few remaining days, securely concealed from his enemies, but revealed to we know not how many (in the disagreements of the evangelists) of his most trusted followers.

Oswego, N. Y. C. C. P. CLARK, M.D.

THE use of science is to enable us during our passage through life, on the one hand, to escape hurtful collision with the forces of nature which surround us; and, on the other hand, to gain their aid. As we may see from savage life, man, dependent upon his own personal powers, is a miserable creature. Every step he has risen from that low estate to the level of Newton, Spencer, Darwin, Watt, or Faraday, he owes to the aid of the forces of nature. For that aid and addition to his powers he is indebted to his knowledge and faith—knowledge of the unvarying order of facts, and faith in its persistence. For long ages this knowledge and faith were exercised, so to speak, unconsciously. It is only in very recent times that man has become conscious of the fact that the universe is a cosmos—that in his knowledge of this universal order, and in his faith in its eternal stability, lie the only means of his advance from lower to higher on the road of evolution. This knowledge and this faith is what we call science.—John Wilson, M.A.

I HEAR it was charged against me that I sought to destroy institutions,
But really I am neither for nor against institutions, (What indeed hav I in common with them? or what with the destruction of them?)
Only I will establish in the Mannahatta and in every city of these states inland and seaboard,
And in the fields and woods, and above every keel little or large that dents the water,
Without edifices or rules or trustees or any argument,
The institution of the dear love of comrades.

The Evil of Religion.

Religion unaccompanied with intelligence to know that it is not true is a bad thing to possess.

This is made too plain to dispute by the religious foolishness of the Indians on the Northwestern reservations. They hav got religion, do not know any better than to believe it literally, and consequently are in the deepest trouble.

When a man like Schweinfurth sets himself up as a "messiah" among civilized people they laugh at him and go about their business undisturbed by his claims. Nineteen hundred years ago the world was ignorant enough to believe that sort of thing. It knows better now.

Messiahs hav been coming and going for several thousand years. Only a few are left, and they are worshiped chiefly because their advents and takings off occurred so long ago. Some people believe an old lie who are quick to detect a modern one. Most of these messiahs hav made trouble in the world.

The people who are the greatest sufferers at present from the messiahship craze are the Indians of this country, who hav learned just enough Christianity to be bothered by it. They are pre-millennialists so far as their understanding goes. An officer of the United States army, a body of men now activly employed in discrediting religion, tells the story of the origin of the difficulty. The story of the officer is as follows: "Last spring an Indian called and said he would like to speak to the commanding general. The messenger introduced him to me, and I turned him over to another officer for that purpose. But in a few moments he was turned over to me again. I took him in the room, and he gave a history of himself. He said his name was Johnson Sides; that he was known as the Peacemaker among all Indians and the whites of Nevada, where he lived.

"To substantiate his statement he showed me a medal which he carried around his neck, on which was a legend to the effect that the medal was presented to him by some Christian society for his efforts toward doing good to his fellow-men, whether white or red. He could talk very good English; was dressed like an ordinary laborer, but had the Indian's way of wearing his hair. He told me he read or knew the Bible; that he was desirous of making peace with everyone, and that was why he was named Peacemaker. He said that Indians had come from afar to see him, and he pulled out a pipe, such as are made by the Northern Indians, which was recognized as having come from either Montana or Dakota.

"Johnson Sides said that it came from Dakota; that the kind of clay of which it was made could not be found in Nevada, and that the stem was of a peculiar wood not found in Nevada or California. He mentioned the names of the Indians who had visited him and the tribes they belonged to, and also gave the time they had called.

"I firmly believe that this is the good-natured Indian who has caused all this trouble; that he has taught the members of his tribe the story of Christ or the messiah, and the time when he will once more visit this earth, as it has been taught him by the Christian people interested in his welfare. He has told these visiting Indians of the paradise in store for all people when the son shall once more visit this earth, and the Indian's paradise is whatever his imagination may lead him to believe, the same as a white man."

Another story is told by an Arrapahoe Indian, a veritable Saul of Tarsus. While hunting alone near the Shoshone mountains he became lost, and for a long time wandered about aimlessly. Finally a strange feeling came over him and he involuntarily began to follow a certain star, which moved before him and led him many miles out into the mountains. Just at daybreak the star became stationary over a beautiful mountain valley, and he sank to rest on a couch of moss. While he rested a strange vision appeared before him. He saw a great spirit dance, and the participants were dead Arraphoe warriors led by the dead chiefs of the past. In the distance were dances by the departed of all other tribes, and the hills and mountains all about were alive with buffalo, deer, and other game. Suddenly he was awakened by a strange voice, which asked whether Sitting Bull would like to see all the dead braves return to earth again and hav the buffalo and deer abound on the plains. Replying in the affirmativ Sitting Bull arose and saw before him a strange being dressed in a blanket of pure white, and with flowing hair and beard of the same color, while about his head shone a strange light. The strange being said that he was the same Christ who was upon the earth nineteen hundred years ago to save the white men, and that he would soon return to save the red men. They must prepare for his coming, for he would bring with him all of the dead Indians, and the land would again be alive with buffalo and other game. The whites who had so long persecuted and robbed the Indians would be driven out of the land across the sea, never to return again. All day the messiah conversed with Sitting Bull, revealing to him many things, also showing him the scars of nails in his hands and feet and the wound in his side. When night came on the messiah disappeared, and Sitting Bull was led from the mountains by the bright star of the previous night.

Having warped this teaching to fit their understanding—that is, made a theology of it, as has often been done by others—the Indians began their ghost dance, face to the sun, to await the coming of their messiah, imitating to a degree the actions of the Millerites who, some fifty years ago, held the advent of their messiah to be close at hand. And as all religious fanatics are dangerous to other people, Uncle Sam has had to prepare to protect the lives of the people likely to be assaulted by the devotees of the new theology.

One of the teachers of this theology is Sitting Bull, a gentleman who on several occasions has caused trouble. He is now a full-fledged theologian, and though not a graduate of Andover is as competent to make mischief as any of the products of that institution. That he works just like other medicin-men and priests, and that his people are the average dupes, is evident from these two paragraphs from a letter from the scene of trouble: "Sitting Bull has told his people to pay no attention to the orders of the agent or of the president, and that he would bewitch the ammunition of the soldiers so that the guns would not kill. The very elements seem to hav united with him to deceive the people. He told them when he returned from the agency that he would make it rain, and yesterday it rained all the morning. Of course, we all knew it could not rain long at this season of the year; and he said to them: 'Now I will lift up this white cloth and rain will cease.' Soon it did stop; and he is shrewd enough to use such means to impress the people. He is thoroughly and hopelessly bad, and I hope the government will remove him for good from the reservation.

"Since writing the above I hav been up to Sitting Bull's, and the dance is in full blast. It is a most terrible thing—the old sun dance with a new name. They dance facing the sun as long as possible, and fall down, moan, groan, and whoop, and foam at the mouth like mad dogs, singing a slow chant, 'ah-tay-he-e-lo' being all the words used. They do not yet cut the bodies, but that will soon be added. The men all dress in war dress and paint and feathers; and the women also take part and paint and wear feathers, which is a new feature. Sitting Bull stayed in a sacred tent, and everyone entering the dance for the first time went into the tent to be made 'wakan' and be painted with blue crescents on the forehead, cheeks, and chin, and a cross on the nose and between the eyes."

One need not ransack his memory very far to recall prototypes innumerable of Sitting Bull and his victims. They are all over the world, in all ages, and some exist to-day. Instead, therefore, of instructing ignorant Indians in theology the government should send all the missionaries East and go to work and civilize the red men. And if those inhabitants of this "Christian country" who imagin they are already civilized will closely study this religious phase, digging deep into its significance, it may help to rid them of a theology which has undoubtedly led the Indians into this foolishness. These Indians had an infinitly more sensible religion before they ever heard of Christianity.

The Power of the Priests.

A good sample of the manner in which Roman Catholics are ruled by their priests was given in Little Falls, N. Y., two Sundays ago. The trouble between the priest and his parishioners arose over the conduct of a fair held by the church. The managing committee claimed the right to alone issue passes, and when the priest issued passes they refused to honor them and wrote their pastor that he was "an intolerable nuisance."

The priest remained silent until he got into his pulpit, and then he took his innings. Holding up the letter in which he was told to mind his own business, the priest read the names of the signers. They were, he said, rebellious Catholics, and ignored the authority of the church. He had been insulted by them, he said, and he proposed to make them make amends. Then he went on:

"The first name on this paper is that of Daniel F. Herleby. If he has a glimmer of sense his name would never be found attached to such a paper as this; but what can you expect from a selfish old bachelor, whose whole life has been spent in breaking girls' hearts? If he were not past all shame he would blush for what he has done. Here we see the name of Mr. Curry, who is a supervisor of the town of Manheim. He hasn't sense enough to get a clean shave. Probably he never took a bath in his life. And Mr. Eagan. Think of this man. Everybody knows his head never fitted him, but why should he advertise himself as a monstrosity?"

The priest went through the list, and each man was called such names as "monkey," "ass," fool." When he had finished his abuse of the individuals, he said, speaking with extreme earnestness and laying special stress on the last words, "Now, if everyone doesn't come to me during the week and beg my pardon and forgivness I will call down next Sunday morning the curses of heaven and hell upon each one who fails to do it."

Within two hours after the service all but six of the vituperated men had rushed to the parochial residence and apologized! And the obdurate half dozen will follow the example or be excommunicated, which to a devout Catholic is spiritual and temporal damnation, for a boycott goes with the anathema.

"The only reformation of which the Roman Catholic church, or any orthodox church, is capable, is destruction."

How Do They Like It?

Postmaster-General Wanamaker probably felt the need of making some explanation of his remarkable exclusion from the mails of Tolstoi's remarkable Christian book, and this is the way he does it in his annual report of the doings of his department:

"It does not matter whether or not a given publication presented for mailing appears, by complaint or otherwise, to a postmaster to be 'obscene, lewd, or lascivious.' If it does appear to be 'indecent,' he is obliged, in order not to become a law-breaker, to refer the questionable point to the proper department official. It does not matter when the referee considers the question whether the given publication is merely 'obscene, lewd, or lascivious.' If it is simply indecent, he must exclude it or break the law. A translation of a questionable book was, as a matter of fact, presented some months since at the post-office in a Western city for transmission in the mails. It was held and referred to this department. The assistant attorney-general, finding it indecent under any definition of the word, issued an order excluding it. To exclude the book was the simple duty of the department. For myself I never discuss the policy or wisdom of breaking the law, and the officials of the post-office department do not."

It seems from this that Comstock has at last got the word "indecent" into his law. Therefore, people will now beware! Things which can be described as follows are unmailable. Anything

Unbecoming.
Indecorous.
Indelicate.
Unseemly.
Immodest.
An offense against delicacy.
Offensiv to modesty.
Lacking in modesty or good manners.
In a manner to offend modesty and delicacy.

The thing lacking in this inquisition, however, is a proclamation letting the people know whose modesty, delicacy, idea of good manners, and so forth, it is that must be shocked by printed matter in order to make that matter unmailable. Is it always the assistant attorney-general, or is it sometimes the postmaster-general himself?

How do the people of the country like the notion that because some reading matter required by them appears unseemly to a postmaster it shall be excluded from the mails until a nincompoop at Washington can pass upon it?

Rome Reviving.

Visitors to Rome are surprised at the new growth of the city and the advancement generally in endeavor and progress and hope. New buildings are rising throughout the city, for purposes both of business and of residence. There has been an astonishing increase in the value of land within the walls, and territory outside the walls is receiving attention and improvement unknown since the time of Augustus Cæsar. A great bridge over the Tiber, called the Garibaldi bridge, after the famous liberator of Italy and hater of priests, draws admiration. A hospital of splendid proportions is being constructed. The Regulation Plan office is kept unrestingly occupied with proposed improvements of every kind. Fine architectural taste is exhibited, and the edifices are no less remarkable for their classical and elaborate adornment than for their durable massivness. Admirable specimens of the sculptor's art adorn the facades, and the personages represented are not as of old the fabulous saints and impossible chimeras of Catholicism, but are the great men of modern Italy and pagan Rome—scientists, poets, artists, and other helpers of man and beautifiers of the world.

There is in addition a great increase of interest shown by the people in the great works of art in the museums and other buildings, and the artistic spirit is undeniably reviving. The remains and monuments of former ages, of all kinds, that are to be seen in different parts of the city, are receiving increasing attention, and serve as aids in the historical inquiries to which Italians are awakening. Literary interest and activity manifest a corresponding quickening.

The distressed pope complains that one of the towering buildings erected looks over into his grounds for daily exercise, so that espionage from it has compelled him to forego his daily walks. We wish to use this as an illustration of the forces at work that are causing all the other changes named above. It is similarly because edifices of knowledge hav newly risen, from which the populace look with superiority down upon clerical doings, that they are beginning to scorn their prayer-books and initiate production of their own literature. It is because Freethinkers hav at last provided the people with a vantage-ground of historical information as to the glory of pagan Rome and the ruinous operation of papacy on that city, from which they may perceive their true situation and interests, that they are turning their attention to records of the past and its better rules and beliefs. It is because they hav been led to hights of thought whence supernatural hopes are seen in their littleness and the true hopes of the race—utilitarian, scientific, and artistic—are seen in their truth and beauty, that they are forsaking Christianity's stagnant impotence and advancing in all the paths of Rational development and glory. Luck to the Romans of the new era!

The Breckinridge Bill.

The Sabbath Union fanatics will make strong efforts to hav the "Breckinridge Sunday Rest Bill" passed at this session of Congress. The bill is now in the hands of a sub-committee of the House of Representativs committee on the District of Columbia, and the attempt will be made to take it from them and pass it. The bill is as follows:

"A bill to prevent persons from being forced to labor on Sunday. Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That it shall be unlawful for any person or corporation in the District of Columbia, to perform any secular labor or business, or cause the same to be performed by any person in their employment on Sunday, except works of necessity or mercy; nor shall it be lawful for any person or corporation to receive pay for labor or services performed or rendered in violation of this act.

"Any person or corporation, or employee of any person or corporation in the District of Columbia, who shall violate the provisions of this act, shall, upon conviction thereof, be punished by a fine of not more than one hundred dollars for every such offense: Provided, however, That the provisions of this act shall not be construed to apply to any person or persons who conscientiously believe in and observe any other day of the week than Sunday as a day of rest."

We hope that every reader of THE TRUTH SEEKER will at once write to the two Senators from his state and the Representativ from his district protesting against the enactment of any Sunday laws. The God-in-the-Constitution party and the Sabbath Union are asking all their supporters to write in favor of the bill, because, says Mr. Crafts, the best petitions of all are individual letters from the people as stockholders in the corporation known as the Nation and the State to their directors, the legislators, who seldom dare to refuse any just wish that is expressed with sufficient earnestness by a majority of their constituents; but there is no reason why the opponents of the bill should not avail themselvs of this epistolary influence. Therefore, write a letter to your Congressman and your Senators, and write it now. The commissioners of the District, and the president, and Wanamaker, and a lot more of our Presbyterian government, favor the bill, and it will require hard work to defeat it. Therefore write out your protest against Congress establishing the Christian religion by recognizing its holy day and send it to Washington.

Editorial Notes.

DR. LYMAN ABBOTT is credited with saying: "We run up the Puritan flag, and emblazon on it the motto of a modern and modified Puritanism! A state Christian but not ecclesiastical; with faith but no creed; reverence but no ritual; a recognized religion but no established church." A writer in the Advent Review and Herald says of this: "The less such flags are run up the better. For the state to be Christian, or profess to be, to hav faith, reverence, and a recognized religion, is nothing short of its being ecclesiastical, having a creed, a ritual, and an established church; for ecclesiastical means simply, 'pertaining to the church;' the definition of the faith is the creed; the manner in which reverence is to be manifested is the ritual; and the religion recognized by the state is the established church."

THERE is a first-class chance somewhere between New York and Omaha, Neb., for Holy John Wanamaker to introduce some reforms in his postal service. Several copies of the "Freethinker's Pictorial Text-Book" were recently sent by mail to John A. Jost, of the latter city, and upon their arrival one of them was found to hav been opened, and on the front fly-leaf, in large penciled letters, was written a remark of a nature which under the Comstock statutes made the book unmailable. It was so indecent that we cannot indicate its nature. Under the postal regulations third-class matter may be examined to see that no laws are broken by the mailing, but we never knew that postal clerks were permitted to defile printed matter with language used only by the vilest toughs. Holy John might well neglect his Sunday-school for a day to investigate the character of some of his government employees.

MR. R. M. KING, the Adventist who has been in jail at Troy, Tenn., for several weeks because he plowed on Sunday, doesn't seem to be regarded by his Christian jailers as a very bad man, for in a letter to an elder of his denomination Mr. King says: "I hav got along splendidly so far. The jailer and his wife hav been as kind to me as they could be, and seem to place a great deal of confidence in me, as they let me hav the keys to go in and out of jail when I please, and giv me a nice room to sleep in all to myself." When this is read by the Christians who want the "Sabbath" kept they will probably get out a round robin to the jailer, demanding that Mr. King be placed in a dungeon and fed on bread and water. Further along in his letter the prisoner for conscience's sake indulges in these reflections: "I do not know how long I shall hav to stay here. I guess I will get out before long. It seems strange to me that I hav to lie in jail for working on Sunday, when I can look out from here on Sunday and see people at work close enough by to halloo at, and nothing said about it. Last Sunday they hauled wood here to a brick kiln, four or five men working all day. But, of course, they were not Adventists."

THE Kentucky constitutional convention—a very procrastinating body of legislators—has agreed upon a new Bill of Rights to be submitted with the new constitution. It refers to an unknown person whom it designates as Almighty God, but Kentuckians are not obliged to believe in him in order to get office, for the instrument further provides that "the civil rights, privileges, or capacities of no person shall be taken away, or in anywise diminished or enlarged, on account of his belief or disbelief of any religious tenet, dogma, or teaching whatsoever, and no human authority shall in any case control or interfere with the rights of conscience." Whether the new constitution will exempt church property from taxation is not decided. If it shall, the legislature can at any time tax it without a new constitution being necessary, the bill providing on the subject of taxation that "no property shall be exempt from taxation except as provided in this constitution, and every grant of a franchise, privilege, or exemption shall remain subject to revocation, alteration, or amendment." Another provision in the document is that "all power is inherent in the people," which seems to make the reference to Almighty God as the giver of civil, religious, and political liberty an empty compliment.

RETURNING from the American Secular Union Congress Mr. L. K. Washburn stopped to lecture at Alliance, O. There he learned of an attempt to preserve the "Sabbath" holy by persecuting a Freethinker. Mr. P. L. Dattlebaum, in common with other dealers, has kept his cigar store open on Sundays for years. He carries, in connection with cigars and tobacco, a line of gents' furnishing goods. His Sunday trade, however, has been mostly of cigars. One Sunday in October he sold a linen collar, and was notified the next morning by the police authorities to close his place of business on the following Sabbath. He did so, but noticed that every other cigar-dealer kept open store the same as usual. Not thinking all were treated alike, Mr. Dattlebaum opened his doors when the next Sunday came around and was arrested on Monday morning. He was again arrested in two weeks for the same offense. He appealed his case, and we shall await with interest the decision of the higher court. What makes this case look like persecution is that not another person has been ordered to close his cigar store or has been arrested for selling his goods on Sunday. Mr. Dattlebaum is an outspoken Freethinker, and thinks that religious prejudice has prompted the action against him. But imagin the authorities of a city or town giving a license to sell tobacco, cigars, etc., on Sunday, and prosecuting a man for selling a linen collar on that day, exclaims Mr. Washburn. It seems that cleanliness is not next to godliness in the opinion of some people. We are at a loss to understand how a Christian can strain at a linen collar and swallow a plug of tobacco or a cigar on his Sabbath day. It would seem as though a man with a clean collar would make a better appearance on and do greater honor to the Sabbath, than a man with a cigar in his mouth, but evidently the Christian conscience is more wounded by the sale of clean linen on the Sabbath than by the sale of a filthy weed. The Investigator hopes that Mr. Dattlebaum will win his case, to which we say amen.

THE Rev. Russell H. Conwell, of Philadelphia, based a recent sermon on the words of the prophet, Micah v, 1, 6: "Gather thyself in troop, O daughter of troops; thus shall he deliver us from the Assyrian." The speaker closed by saying: "Once, nearly all schools in the Christian lands were religious schools where the redeemer's name was reverenced and Bible principles prominently taught. The church ruled over the most important realms, and religion and education were almost synonymous in many communities. But now, given over to the world, with Christ positivly shut out of it by law, the public schools multiply the enemies of the church every year. Oh, what a disgraceful day was that for the church of Christ when they capitulated to Satan and took the Bible out of the schools. This awful defeat can only be retrieved by a united demand for the restoration of the scriptures or by the establishment of a mighty system of private Christian schools. Once, the Christian church held under its predominating influence the reins of government. By its teachings and associations, the fearless words of its preachers, and the education of the young, the legislator felt the strong hand upon him and tried to make laws to accord with the teachings of the Bible. Now the church has so far destroyed its own power in political affairs by extreme doctrins of the separation of church and state that the last Congress is said to hav greeted a religious petition with sneers and laughter, and the visit of the great Baptist National Convention to the House of Representativs two years ago, was made the occasion for ribald speeches and low jokes in their presence on the floor of Congress. All Christian men should attend the primary meetings and invariably vote and be open in the expression of religious convictions in connection with political matters. The legislatures and the church must be allies. To secure that, Christians must gather into troops. The churches of all sects must attempt to act together in all matters upon which they are in theory agreed. The earth is the Lord's, and let us claim all the amusements, all the business, all the legislation, for the benefit of his human family, and allow no power of evil to use them against our master." The Rev. Russell H. Conwell seems to be something of an extremist both in his statements of what has occurred to the church and what she ought to do and hav. It is a fact to be regretted that the Bible has not yet been taken out of the schools, and another that the church and state are not nearly so wide apart as he alleges.

Letters from Friends.

EUREKA, CAL., Oct. 15, 1890.

MR. EDITOR: Picture book arrived in good order. I am more than pleased with it. It is so much better than I bad expected. Be sure I shall advertise it well.

Yours in the cause, MAROUS PETERSEN.

JAMESTOWN, N. Y., Nov. 17, 1890.

MR. EDITOR: On account of a statement read in this city yesterday, by a Rev. Mr. Ellis, to the effect that Christianity is on the increase and Freethought on the decline, I write to ask you if you are in possession of any statistics, or any other reliable information, showing the increase or decrease of church membership, or general church attendance, relativly to the population. If you hav any, hav you any objection to publishing them? They would be very useful to Freethinkers. THOMAS HINDLE.

[We hav no statistics on this matter. Has anyone?—ED. T. S.]

DORCHESTER, NEB., Nov. 23, 1890.

MR. EDITOR: Inclosed find $2 for the "Pictorial Text-Book." I hav been a reader of THE TRUTH SEEKER for several years, and I would not do without it for ten times the price. We hav a priest-ridden town with some five hundred inhabitants and three churches, but their jealousy of each other givs a Freethinker a chance to breathe. There seems to be a weakness of the Holy Ghost's power here at present. The Methodists hav been having a revival the past two weeks and only a few of the faithful attend, and they are so weak they cannot get up a shout, although the pastor is an old-style groaner and preacher. The devil, as usual, seems to be ahead. There are a number here of Liberal mind, but only three or four that dare to speak out. As for myself, the sands of life are nearly run, and I expect to be able to get enough to eat and speak my mind, for I expect to take a long sleep soon and must do what I can in the little time I hav. Long life to Heston. I hope he has regained his health, and may THE TRUTH SEEKER become so popular that you never will hav to think of giving up the pictures. I am,

Yours for truth and justice for all, JESSIE JOHNSON.

RENO, ILL., Nov. 20, 1890.

MR. EDITOR: I am a stranger to your columns, but shall never get acquainted by keeping still, so, truth seekers, Freethinkers, and all conservativ men, shake! I want to ask your contributors to deal gently with the erring ones, for I hav just succeeded in freeing my reasoning faculties from the power of habit and prejudice, woven into the threads of my life from earliest infancy up to manhood, and I tell you it is a desperate undertaking. Through the kindness of a friend, Brother Peter Plog, I was enabled a year ago to read your paper, which he loaned me. Also Paine's "Age of Reason," which first staggered me seriously, and knocked my faith into smithereens. Your comments, Peck's pickings, and Ingersoll's erudite writings hav completely changed the views of a lifetime. But it was hard to giv them up. Yet I thought if "God" became angry at me for doing so, he could not be a just God, because he is responsible for my existence, for my every attribute, and if he is all-wise, he would know I was a hypocrit if I now pretended otherwise. Besides, the old fellow must improve his temper or a great many must roast anyway, so if I hav to roast, it will be as an honest, free man. H. L. HACHETTE.

CLIFTON, KAN., Nov. 9, 1890.

MR. EDITOR: I hav taken your paper for many years, and expect to continue while here in life. I commenced taking it soon after D. M. Bennett moved it from Illinois to New York city. I circulated a petition for Bennett, and obtained between one and two hundred names for his release, when I lived in Oregon, Wis., also for Heywood and obtained over one hundred names. Of late I got one hundred and twelve names for Harman, editor of Lucifer, and my daughter, Ella, one hundred and one on a petition for release from prison. I hav been working with the Farmers' Alliance for a change in finance, money, transportation, and all the bad class laws that hav cursed our country for the last twenty-five years. The election returns from Kansas will show you whether the farmers are becoming educated or not. Agitation and exchange of thought mean education, and education means individualization, and the two combined mean organization. I was opposed some to secret societies until this movement, but I find it is the only way to hold farmers together, for as a general thing they are so isolated they cannot understand each other, and their prejudices hold them apart until organized in a secret order. I speak from experience, for I hav been a member of the open Farmers' Alliance for about four years, and some of the time president and one of the directors, and all we could do for the betterment of the farmer was in shipping grain as a joint stock organization at points on the railroads where the elevator men or grain buyers had pooled.

I shall be seventy-one years old this month, and am working for the benefit of the laboring classes, to enlighten and educate the masses that they may vote intelligently and better their condition financial, moral, and intellectual.

Yours for universal emancipation, JOHN C. HANAN.

Nov. 20, 1890.

MR. EDITOR: It has been said that if our universe was reduced to the size of a finger ring, every part being changed, but every proportion remaining intact, we should not be aware of the change, because the permanency of all that is depends wholly and forever upon proportion alone—structure, action, life. We can conceive that such a change may, or may not, be going on continually, abstracting or adding to the size, weight, energy, and other qualities of the things that we know and may in a sense call ours, and if this abstraction or addition did affect proportion slightly it might be so slightly as not to affect practically the well-being of any form of life, so that there would neither be aggrandizement nor robbery brought about by such process to any individual of the said universe. The universe itself would lose material, but that energy which could take the material in such a way must already own what it takes and what it takes from. We see then that in the transaction each has his own, the doer and the done by; and perfect justice reigns; and we could not justly complain if our universe were reduced until it occupied a space which to our present sense would seem insignificant, or likewise if it were increased. The energy which would giv and take material in this sense could not be called the giver and taker as we apply that term to God (although it would be the act of God), because, leaving the structure proportionally intact, from whom does he giv or take? who suffers gain or loss? who knows of the transaction? Not man nor any creature. However, if what we call our universe was as a whole a cognizant being aware of other similar or dissimilar beings, it would be aware of loss or gain, but if the other beings suffered (if the term may be used) proportional loss or gain, the transaction would still remain unknown. If of this material so taken God formed one or a myriad other universes like or unlike ours, these when they became aware must call God the giver, and if so, likewise this universe as a whole must call God the giver and cannot call him the taker away on account of any downfall of structure within itself, that being the result of the permanent action of the structure as a whole. If it be taken away wholly it has but changed its habitation, and if it be utterly destroyed what remains to say it has suffered loss? So every structure as a whole must regard its maker as the giver, not being in existence to perceive him as the taker. N. SALTONSTALL.

HALSTEAD, KAN., Nov. 25, 1890.

MR. EDITOR: "When I was a child I spake as a child, I thought as a child, but when I became a man I put away childish things" (St. Paul). The great apostle evidently deems some things adapted to childhood that would not be appropriate to mature years, and in this many not so wise as he will coincide. It is the purpose of this writing to consider some of the things that are peculiarly childish and should be put away when we reach maturity. First is an unreasoning terror, a fear of ghosts, "bugaboos" and "bugamans," etc. Even a shadow may frighten a child into convulsions. This seems sad even when the affliction is limited to childhood's earliest years, but when the years hav passed that should bring wisdom and maturity without giving the ability to put away childish things, the last condition is far worse than the first. Unhappily this inability to put away childish things seems to cling to many people through all the years allotted to this life, even down to old age. They are frightened not merely at shadows, but at the bare mention of a word the full meaning of which they do not comprehend. I lately heard a man boasting in public of the numbers he had frightened out of the use of their reason by ringing the changes on one little word, "Eternity!" and they were not babies but full-grown men and women. One in particular was a ripe railroad conductor weighing two hundred pounds avoirdupois—was a big man in every sense of the word excepting the childish terror. The dreadful word has no doubt quite an extensiv meaning, but as every son and daughter of Adam has about an equal chance of learning exactly what it does mean, it seems foolish, to say the least, to allow one man's interpretation of the word to worry us or cause a ripple on the placid surface of our lives. If with Paul we hav put away childish things, no word, however terrible, could cause us to tremble or swerve one hair's breadth from the line of truth that should be the guide of our lives. No fear of punishment or hope of reward furnishes the motiv power. No promis of golden harp or crown is needed to induce the true man to deal justly and love mercy. The duties of the day, the ever-present, eternal now, round out and fill the life of a well-developed, full-grown man or woman who has put away childish things. "Here and now is duty done," speaks in every heart throb, in every beat of the pendulum of time, to every rational mind, to every tender heart that loves truth and humanity more than dreams and traditions, and cares more to improve opportunities for doing and getting good than to study how he will spend a far-off, impossible eternity. ELBA, O., Nov. 18, 1890.

MR. EDITOR: Mrs. M. A. Freeman delivered lectures at Lower Salem, O., November 4th and 5th, and one here the 6th. As a Liberal lecturer Mrs. Freeman has few equals, and we were all well pleased with her. The lectures were a success in every respect. At Elba the hall was full of people and it was difficult for all to get in, which was more than we expected.

Secular principles are rapidly growing in public favor in this community. Only a few years ago there was no one to be found here who would or could successfully defend Secular philosophy, while now the orthodox people cannot be induced to publicly or privately discuss the questions at issue with an opponent. They seem to be aware that their barbarous doctrins will not bear discussion and investigation, and wisely leave the whole matter to their paid attorney, and he is discreet enough to take Talmage's advice. It is very strange that people of any intelligence will refuse to listen to or tolerate any criticism of their religious belief, as some of our Christians do.

The churches of our community contain a few respectable people of average intelligence, but the great majority of such do not belong to the churches, do not believe their doctrins, and are practically Secularists in most respects; yet many of them are moral cowards and hav not the courage to antagonize orthodox creeds. I admire a person who zealously upholds and defends his religious, political, or any other principles, so long as he treats an opponent courteously and fairly and grants to others the same rights he claims for himself. But he who bas not the courage to oppose and expose what he believes to be an erroneous idea is not a person in whom to place the fullest confidence.

In this day and age of the world there can be no excuse for not having decided opinions upon religious questions. If you believe in church doctrins and are not a member of a church your moral sense is certainly not very acute, and if you believe Christian doctrins are false is it not your plain duty to endeavor to destroy them? We hav people right among us who hav no more faith nor belief in Christianity than I hav, yet they do not seem to understand that to teach false doctrins is necessarily injurious.

The churches here hav little power to abridge our rightful liberties, and many unbelievers do not understand the dangers of church supremacy. They do not consider that the liberty of thought and action they enjoy has been won from the church by the labor of others, and that bigotry only needs an opportunity to be oppressiv. Christian societies are aiming to make our government Christian in all its functions, and if they succeed in this, all that will not subscribe to their creeds will speedily be disfranchised. The Puritans who came to this country to escape persecution and to persecute all who did not agree with them, established a model Christian government, and it is the boast of church dignitaries that they will be successful in establishing a similar one again. Because we, in this place, are not persecuted, some of us assume that the former spirit of the church is dead and that it will never resume its intolerant attitude. The history of churches does not warrant this assumption, and it behooves us to destroy doctrins that teach total depravity. If we are not regenerated we are logically considered by Christians as the worst enemies of the state and society, and worthy of any punishment they may inflict. Christianity teaches that an unbeliever has no rights a Christian is bound to respect, and to this we object. We believe we hav an equal right with the Christian to life, liberty, and the pursuit of happiness, and we demand these privileges.

HANNIBAL, MO., Nov. 19, 1890.

MR. EDITOR: Your correspondent, C. L. James, is off the track in assuming that I am not in sympathy with the Secular Union. I hav been a worker for Secular principles from my youth, as the records of the old Liberal League show; and while I do not indorse the policy of the Secular Union I still work for the Nine Demands, in harmony with all advocates of Secular government. Mr. James is down on the Brotherhood of Agnostic Moralists, as he calls it. He seems not to be aware that the term Agnostic was dropped from the name of our order nearly three years ago, because there are so many people who, like him, are laboring under a false impression as to the meaning of the word. But he is down on the Moralists, anyhow, because they do not believe in ghosts, and do exclude Anarchists, polygamists, and free lovers. Does he mean to say that a Liberal has no right to oppose these evils because some Liberals sanction them? If I am denied the right to oppose whatever I believe to be false and pernicious, "I'd rather be a dog and bay the moon."

Notwithstanding the opposition of the above-named classes, the Brotherhood of Moralists has spread rapidly over the United States, and is attracting the attention of some of the most earnest and intelligent Liberals of the Old World.

Mr. James labors hard to make it appear that the Brotherhood of Moralists is a bigoted sect; but such is not the case, for the very first section of our Bond of Union (which is part of the constitution) declares "we hold it to be self-evident that enlightened human reason untrammeled by prejudice is the highest tribunal known to man, and that every rational being has an inalienable right to investigate and decide for himself all questions pertaining to his present or future welfare." We fully concede the right of others to differ from us, and would not coerce them if we could. Any member of our order has the right to go hunting for virgin mothers, and Holy Ghosts, and other kinds of ghosts; and if he finds any, and is seized with a desire to get onto a "higher plane," we are always ready, cheerfully and without the slightest unkind feeling, to giv him or her an honorable discharge and a hearty good wish. The objects of our order are to promote good government and rational morality, and to eradicate superstition. Of course we want no members who cannot work for these objects. Thus far we are exclusiv, because no organization can be constructiv without being exclusiv to this extent; but, so far as I know, our members are all genuin Liberals. Our constitution makes provision for such changes and amendments as may, from time to time, be deemed advisable. There is nothing cast-iron or sectarian about it, and no "et ceteras" in it.

I hope all of your readers will send to the secretary of the propaganda committee, F. H. Rau, Hannibal, Mo., for a free copy of the constitution, and "investigate and decide for themselvs." A. R. AYRES.

TYNGSBORO, MASS., Nov. 22, 1890.

MR. EDITOR: I wish to hav the following cracks at my critics.

1. One of my Kansas critical friends guesses that there are but few J. P. Guilds. I know of but one, and he is happily able to preserve his individuality and make war on both religious superstition and alcoholic intemperance.

2. Those who hav been indulged by the long-suffering Editor in permitting their scurrilous language to appear in his otherwise fair paper, should not intimate that he exceeds impartiality when he prints respectable letters written in the interest of decency and soberness.

3. That one man's liberty ends where another man's right commences, is a statement like the axiom in arithmetic that one-half a cheese equals the other half. The question remains, Where does the other man's right commence? Is it where the first man's liberty leaves off? What if they do not agree as to the terminus of each other's liberties and rights? What if their respectiv claims and possessions overlap? What if one or both persons are careless of the other's rights and liberties? Then it is the business of law to decide and enforce its decision in the matter.

4. My Anarchistic brother thinks my answer to his queries funny enough to make a horse laugh. He thereby shows that he has at least the humor of a horse. If he had horse-sense as regards his own questions, he would know that justice and peace hav no show much farther than as those who own anything are able to hold it down, either alone or by aid of their allies. He need not hav said that he is neither Jesus Christ nor Thomas Paine, for the teaching of the first was to "turn the other cheek also," which he would hardly be willing to do, and the second was the instigator and encourager of the American Revolution.

5. If anybody pretends to suppose that I do not know the difference between a horse and an acre of land, it is plain he lies. What I do not know is the difference between two vacancies. If ownership is vitiated by vacation in one case, why not also in the other? It may be questioned if land be more justly subject to ownership than water or air, as all three are essential to life; but if rightfully ownable at all, it may be held for prospectiv as well as present use, like the plow that cultivates it; and the plow, the land, and the money that will buy them may alike be rented to others or taxed on account of public services to the owner.

6. Anarchy, as applied to a peaceful state of society, is a misnomer. Anarchy, as defined by usage, means resistance to rule. One who is willing to obey, without being forced, a command which he dislikes, is not an Anarchist, but a submissionist. When everyone knows what is right and best for each and all and none refuse to bear their part in the public welfare, it will be time enough for the miscalled theoretical Anarchy to get in its practical work.

7. Will my appreciativ Brother B., down in Texas, please send me his name and address? Also, I shall be glad to get a note from whoever of my readers, liking my notions, will take time to write to me. J. P. GUILD.

NEOLA, IA., NOV. 22, 1890.

MR. EDITOR: I should like to make a few remarks in reply to B., of Fort Worth, Texas, on Prohibition. He says the assertion of the beer advocates that Prohibition in Iowa and Kansas is a failure, is all false. I should like to ask Mr. B. how he knows it is false. I judge from the tone of his letter that he has heard some minister say it was and concludes it is so. But I can testify to the contrary. I liv in Iowa, in a town of nine hundred inhabitants, and it is free whisky—five saloons running regularly just as openly as they do in Nebraska, and no revenue whatever from it; drunkenness more frequent than I ever saw in Nebraska during the twenty-three years there, all because of the Liberal element that exists here. All true Liberals are inclined to let everybody do as they please as long as they do not interfere with the rights of others. Wherever you find Prohibition enforced you will find the Sunday laws enforced the same. It is the result of a strong Christian element disposed to enforce everyone to conform to their ideas of conduct and morality. According to censuses of 1880 and 1890 the population of Iowa has fallen off some thousands—I do not remember just how much—and there can be no other reason for it except Prohibition. Kansas has fallen off in all except a few of the large cities. Nearly every town in the country has about one-third vacant houses, while in Nebraska you will see nothing of the kind at all. She has increased in population since the Prohibition law went into effect in Kansas and Iowa as she never did before, while Kansas was increasing in population, before she passed Prohibition, faster than any other state in the Union, and Prohibition is the only reason why she should not hav continued to increase. I hav been in nearly all the Western states and territories, and I can truthfully say there is no finer land in the United States, take the whole state together. And no one will ever know the amount of money that has been spent in Iowa to try to enforce Prohibition, but it is utterly impossible; and in most places, like Neola, the people that feel the most interest in the welfare of the state hav concluded it best to not try to enforce it.

Why do you not try to prohibit the manufacture of firearms to kill each other with and commit suicide with? How a man can claim to be Liberal and favor Prohibition, is what beats me. I consider the two as foreign to each other as black and white. I will forever oppose any measure that will deny any man the free and unlimited right to make and sell anything that is in demand. For the restrictions put upon the use of liquor hav, in my opinion, been the main source of more manias for liquor than all other causes combined, and the only true way to do away with the evil effects of liquor is to make it just as free as vinegar. Let any man make it or any man sell it that wants to, and any man drink it that wants to. Then we shall hav good, pure liquor, and then men will stop to consider what is for their own interest. You cannot make men moral by law. If the Christian churches had been satisfied with teaching their beliefs and not tried to force their views upon the people, they would never hav met with the opposition they hav. Now their measures hav set neighbors and friends at variance with one another, and instilled in the minds of their believers that God would uphold them and even assist them in seeking satisfaction for their imaginary wrongs. Look at the Indian uprising at the present time up in Dakota. Who is responsible for this? It is my candid opinion that if the government had never allowed a missionary or Christian school to be started among these Indians this messiah craze would never hav occurred. I do not think so little of my views that I am ashamed to sign my name in full.

Yours ever for freedom, D. W. WHITNEY.

DENVER, COL., NOV. 20, 1890.

MR. EDITOR: One W. Fritts, amateur astronomer, and Freethinker, and free expresser of his thoughts, when passing my office kindly handed me for perusal a copy of THE TRUTH SEEKER, which held me spell-bound for over an hour. Among other things, I noticed P. V. W se's experience while walking on his father's farm in Grant county, Wis., who saw two persons driving a herd of cattle. He recognized the cattle and the two young men as being Wm. Oldham and Thomas McQueen. I distinctly heard, he says, a voice speak to me and declare that McQueen was the guiltier of the two, and was the one that induced William to take a part in the stealing of the cattle, but by the act would escape conviction. William sold the cattle to a butcher in Potosi, and received part payment therefor. On the trial McQueen was acquitted on the ground that he did not receive any money from the butcher for them. How do you account for this? By what means was the visual organ so enlarged that the phenomena could be distinctly seen, just as clearly as if the material body of the person stood by the roadside and the words were spoken by him—no prearrangement, says the narrator. I did not believe in anything supernatural (superhuman is a better word; all things are natural, all the way to deity). How do you account for it?

Well, let us see. In the first place, P. V. Wise has latent powers of clairvoyance (clear seeing), also latent powers of clairaudience (clear hearing). He can be psychologized into either state by the invisible, and when in a clairvoyant state look backward through the laws of psychological retrospect, and look forward through the laws of sympathy inside and foretell future events, when the things foretold lie within the channel of some plain immutable laws of connection. The most singular part of the affair is where he saw Mr. Wise at the very moment the deed was being transacted, as was afterward proven on the trial in court. This is also possible; past, present, and future are eternally the same. The scientific facts are, neither Mr. Wise nor anyone else sees or hears anything with material eyes and ears. Light, which is force, photographs a minute inverted image on the bottom of the eye, on the retina, which acting on the brain produces consciousness of an object. All that is known to us is mental conception. The reality of which our conception is composed is force. The invisible spirit can photograph the images referred to by Mr. Wise on his brain as plain as he ever saw objects with his so-called material eyes, and far less delusiv, as it is of the soul and not the body. Sound reaches the auditory nerve of the ear through sympathetic vibrations imparted to the ether atmosphere of space. Behind the eye is the perceiver; behind the ear is the spirit or intelligence which recognizes the sound. And all through the fading and feeble organs. There are other substances, and there would be no conceptions of life if not for the spirit that pervades them.

Science has rendered null two of the five senses, to wit, seeing and feeling, but she has kindly substituted two more—intuition and common sense. An intuition is not an impression. Intuition is an attribute of the soul, while an impression is an impress made upon our mind through the effluence of some other mind that may be at that moment in our sphere of life. We should be guided by intuition and reason, and not by blind impulses.

Mr. Wise asks, Can words be pronounced in an ordinary conversational tone without a material person of body and organs? I answer yes. The atmosphere holds in solution everything you can name or mention in the world, hence it contains the necessary elements to materialize a thorax and other organs of sound. You know the glottis and the epiglottis are of very simple construction, and the spirit chemist can make semblances of them under certain conditions and by this artificial glottis cause the spirit voice.

Remember that all the mightiest forces of nature are invisible, but not supernatural. Raise the eyelids of the mind and look up toward realities, and learn to be wise by nature as well as by name. With a little effort you can develop your clairvoyant powers.

A spirit purporting to be Bennett controled my hand to write an article for THE TRUTH SEEKER two or three years ago, but I neglected sending it because it was not verified satisfactorily. I tried to invoke him to-day, but do not succeed. DR. T. GILE.

NEWAGGO, MICH., NOV. 16, 1890.

MR. EDITOR: Will you tell me through the columns of your most excellent paper the difference in the creeds of the Roman Catholics and Episcopals? I was talking with a good sister, a member of the last-named church, and told her that my ideas were that they were mugwump Catholics. She disputed it, and said she had no love for the Catholics. I told her I could convince her. But alas, I know nothing of their creed, and write to you for information. Please answer at your earliest convenience and oblige a reader of your invaluable paper. MRS. D. L. COLE.

[If Mrs. Lake will procure her Episcopalian friend's Book of Common Prayer, she will find therein the Articles of Religion of the Episcopal church in this country, also the Apostle's Creed. The Episcopalians also believe in the Nicene Creed, as follows:

We believe in one God, the Father Almighty, maker of all things, both visible and invisible; and in one Lord, Jesus Christ, the Son of God, begotten of the Father, and Light of Light, very God of very God, begotten, not made, being of one substance with the Father, by whom all things were made; who for us men and for our salvation, came down and was made flesh, made man, suffered and rose again on the third day, went up into the heavens, and is to come again to judge the quick and the dead. I believe in the Holy Ghost, the Lord and Giver of Life, who proceeded from the Father and the Son, who with the Father and Son are worshiped and glorified, who spoke by the prophets. And I believe one Catholic and Apostolic church. I acknowledge one baptism for the remission of sins. And I look for the resurrection of the dead, and the life of the world to come.

This creed has undergone several changes since it was first published, but this, we believe, is the popular form. The Catholics also add the Athanasian to the Apostle's and Nicene Creeds, and the substance of their doctrins is thus given by Prof. Philip Schaff:

The doctrins of the Roman Catholic church are laid down in the ecumenical creeds, the acts of nineteen or twenty ecumenical councils, the bulls of the popes, and especially the Tridentine and Vatican standards. The principal authorities are the canons and decrees of the council of Trent (1563), the Profession of the Tridentine Faith, commonly called the Creed of Pius IV. (1564), the Roman Catechism (1566), the decree of the Immaculate Conception (1854), and the Vatican decrees on the Catholic faith and the infallibility of the pope (1870). The best summary of the leading articles of the Roman faith is contained in the Creed of Pope Pius IV., which is binding upon all priests and public teachers, and which must be confessed by all converts. It consists of the Nicene Creed and the following eleven articles:

1. I,——, with a firm faith believe and profess all and every one of the things contained in that creed which the holy Roman church makes use of:

I believe in one God, the Father Almighty, etc. [Here follows the Nicene Creed.]

2. I most steadfastly admit and embrace apostolic and ecclesiastic traditions, and all other observances and constitutions of the same church.

3. I also admit the holy scriptures, according to that sense which our holy mother church has held and does hold, to which it belongs to judge of the true sense and interpretation of the scriptures; neither will I ever take and interpret them otherwise than according to the unanimous consent of the Fathers.

4. I also profess that there are truly and properly seven sacraments of the new law, instituted by Jesus Christ our Lord, and necessary for the salvation of mankind, though not all for every one, to wit: baptism, confirmation, the eucharist, penance, extreme unction, holy orders, and matrimony; and that they confer grace; and that of these, baptism, confirmation, and ordination cannot be reiterated without sacrilege. I also receive and admit the received and approved ceremonies of the Catholic church, used in the solemn administration of the aforesaid sacraments.

5. I embrace and receive all and every one of the things which hav been defined and declared in the holy council of Trent concerning original sin and justification.

6. I profess, likewise, that in the mass there is offered to God a true, proper, and propitiatory sacrifice for the living and the dead; and that in the most holy sacrament of the eucharist there is truly, really, and substantially, the body and blood, together with the soul and divinity, of our Lord Jesus Christ; and that there is made a change of the whole essence of the bread into the body, and of the whole essence of the wine into the blood; which change the Catholic church calls transubstantiation.

7. I also confess that under either kind alone Christ is received whole and entire, and a true sacrament.

8. I firmly hold that there is a purgatory, and that the souls therein detained are helped by the suffrages of the faithful. Likewise, that the saints reigning with Christ are to be honored and invoked, and that they offer up prayers to God for us, and that their relics are to be had in veneration.

9. I most firmly assert that the images of Christ, and of the perpetual Virgin the Mother of God, and also of other saints, ought to be had and retained, and that due honor and veneration are to be given them. I also affirm that the power of indulgences was left by Christ in the church, and that the use of them is most wholesome to Christian people.

10. I acknowledge the holy Catholic Apostolic Roman church for the mother and mistress of all churches; and I promis and swear true obedience to the bishop of Rome, successor to St. Peter, Prince of the Apostles, and Vicar of Jesus Christ.

11. I likewise undoubtingly receive and profess all other things delivered, defined, and declared by the Sacred Canons and General Councils, and particularly by the holy Council of Trent; and I condemn, reject, and anathematize all things contrary thereto, and all heresies which the church has condemned, rejected, and anathematized.

12 I do, at this present, freely profess and truly hold this true Catholic faith, without which no one can be saved; and I promis most constantly to retain and confess the same entire and inviolate, with God's assistance, to the end of my life. And I will take care, as far as in me lies, that it shall be held, taught, and preached by my subjects, or by those the care of whom shall appertain to me in my office. This I, ——, promis, vow, and swear, so help me God, and these holy gospels of God.

To complete the doctrinal system two more articles of faith must be added, which hav been defined in these words: (1) That "the blessed Virgin Mary, by a singular grace and privilege of Almighty God, in view of the merits of Christ Jesus the Savior of mankind, has been preserved free from all stain of original sin" (in other words, that Mary was absolutely sinless, and hence in no need of redemption); and (2) that "the Roman pontiff, when he speaks ex cathedra—that is, in discharge of the office of pastor and doctor of all Christians, by virtue of his supreme apostolic authority, he defines a doctrin regarding faith or morals—is possessed of that infallibility with which the divine Redeemer willed that his church should be endowed, and that therefore such definitions of the Roman pontiff are irreformable of themselvs, and not from the consent of the church."

Children's Corner.

Edited by MISS SUSAN H. WIXON, Fall River, Mass., to whom all Communications for this Corner should be sent.

"Between the dark and the daylight,
When the night is beginning to lower,
Comes a pause in the day's occupations
That is known as the Children's Hour."

Cinque, the Hero of Armistad.

[An excellent painting of Cinque, the subject of this poem, hangs in Mr. Robert Purvis's sitting-room above his writing desk, at his home, 1621 Mount Vernon street, Philadelphia. The story is well known to many of the old-time Abolitionists. Spain, in violation of her treaty with other countries for the suppression of the slave trade, contracted clandestinly to supply her island of Cuba with slaves from the African coast. As the Cubans worked their slaves about eighteen hours each day, they only lived on an average seven years; so the price was high and the demand great. In 1840, about fifty years ago, Cinque was, with about thirty-four other negro men and three women, in all thirty eight, landed at Havana and sold as slaves to two planters, Montez and Don Pedro, and while attempting to convey them in irons in the small boat called the Armistad, which they jointly owned, to their plantations on the island of Principe, the slaves mutinied, killing and dispersing captain and crew of three or four men, and took possession of the vessel, and Cinque, as commander, compelled Montez, one of the would-be masters, to agree to navigate the vessel back to African shores; but he deceived them and brought the vessel to our shores at New London, Conn., where they were landed under the guns of our marine, imprisoned, and after much diplomacy between Spain and this country, were tried in United States courts, and by the aid of the president, John Quincy Adams, who pleaded their case, acquitted and set at liberty.]

Under Afric's burning sky,
From the womb of savage mother
Didst thou spring with freedom's cry,
Swarthy hero, valiant brother.

In that far-off land of Mendi,
With thy warriors by thy side,
I am with thee, truly send I
Martial greeting on that ride.

If not king, then kingly scion,
Best of blood the veins must fill;
Eye of fire and heart of lion,
Spartan courage, steadfast will.

True Napoleon, who betrayed thee?
Was it one thy heart had loved?
Or in jungle, who waylaid thee,
Ere thy valor had been proved?

Turned thee over to a master,
Sold thee for a tithe of gold;
Even then thy blood ran faster,
Freely into Freedom's mold.

Spanish gold and Cuban greed,
Try your hand, and if you can,
To a seven-year slave life lead
Armistad's brave hero man.

Blood shall flow and freedom flourish,
Truth and right firm foothold gain;
God shall triumph, wrong shall perish,
Joy be born of grief and pain.

Come, my lordly Cuban master,
Who to God ne'er bent a knee,
You shall now than lightning faster
Change to slave, while he is free.

Ah, the fetters forged for him,
Woe, that you should wear;
Lost to heaven, on earth you win
Hell's deep, dark despair.

Eagle eye now watches near thee,
Not in Satan's name;
But in Freedom's. Montez, hear me,
Wilt thou wed thy life to shame?

O my country, oft and long
Defending slavery's stain;
I send thee wildest strains of song,
Thanks once in Freedom's name.

Rest, soul, aglow with freedom's fire,
In Freedom's cause you wrought:
Go on, from deeds so high, still higher—
Outrun my own poor thought.

Out of the watches of the night
Shall come the music of the day;
Out of the darkness come the light,
Break forth a dazzling ray.

When shall a true word spoken rest?
When brave blow cease for Freedom given?
Not till their ringing chimes be pressed
On every ear in court of heaven.

A Thanksgiving Gem.

It was on Thanksgiving day—they found her a poor, homeless, friendless little waif, numbed and senseless, by the doorsteps.

And it was bright, cheery little Mrs. Chester that brought her in the warm sitting-room and took the friendless orphan to her heart and home. A long illness followed the child's recovery, brought on, the doctor said, by cold and exposure. Mrs. Chester discovered the name of her protégée to be Edith Dale.

Edith was very fond of Mr. and Mrs. Chester, and passionately attached to Mrs. Chester's little baby girl, Gracie.

Edith was so cheerful, so comforting, so helpful in so many ways, that the grateful lady called Edith her "little Thanksgiving gem."

But the good people little knew what "an angel unawares" they had in their household, or how deep and pure the child's love was for them and little Gracie.

One day Mr. and Mrs. Chester went for a drive, and it happened to be on a Thanksgiving day—just one year since she found Edith.

They returned at nightfall, and as they neared Mr. Chester's broad acres Mrs. Chester noticed how red the sky looked in the direction of their home. And she fancied she could hear shouts, as if the people were strangely excited.

"There is a fire, and not far from our house! Drive faster, Will!" she exclaimed.

Never did a ride seem longer to poor Mrs. Chester.

As they neared their home a sudden turn brought them in full view of their lovely house enveloped in flames.

Poor Mrs. Chester, at the thought of little Gracie, fell back in a dead faint.

When she recovered she was in a neighbor's house with her husband beside her. Her first thought was Gracie. She asked for her and Mr. Chester brought the little child in, crying.

"Why, what is the matter, Gracie?" she asked.

"Oh, mamma," sobbed the little child, "Edie is asleep, and I tan't wake her."

Mrs. Chester's eyes sought her husband's.

"Will," she murmured, brokenly.

"Come, dear," he said, taking little Gracie in his arms and beckoning for his wife to follow. Mrs. Chester turned white as death as she obediently followed him down-stairs to the parlor.

Into the still, darkened parlor they went.

"She died to save our little Gracie," said Mr. Chester as he paused reverently on the threshold.

In a lovely casket lined with pure white lilies they looked their last on their "little Thanksgiving gem." IDA A. BALLOU.

The Devil's Marriage.

According to a tradition, which I believe must be taken with a little grain of salt, the devil happened to contract matrimony once.

His empire is very large, and though there is no deficiency there of beautiful and amiable young ladies, who could make enjoyable partners to his satanic majesty, none of them were to his taste.

Convinced that he would not meet there a bride, he resolved to apply to our planet. Behold, now, actually following the ancient proverb of the Holy Queer, "Seek and ye shall find," Satan met his companion amongst the daughters of men. The fortunate who gave her hand to the prince of the infernal regions was called Miss Impiety.

For many years the couple lived in complete happiness. One day, stimulated by an inordinate desire to return to his nativ country, Satan decided to abandon the earth and return to his fatherland. As a loving father, he did not wish to leave without locating his daughters (there were twelve) in the manner following:

Ambition, his eldest daughter, he gave away in marriage to a rich nobleman.

Avarice, to a usurer.

Brutality, to a fanatic.

Envy, to a coachman.

Hypocrisy, to priests and parsons of all denominations.

Madness, to a soldier.

Poverty was the wife of a schoolmaster.

Waste was matched to a young man who fell heir to a large fortune.

Vanity and Vengeance he left to the fair sex, because he could not get husbands for them.

Up to to-day, none of the daughters of Satan hav abandoned their husbands.

[The above is a very ingenious little story, but some of our readers will be likely to take exceptions to "Vanity and Vengeance" being left to the "fair sex" alone. The unfair sex would seem to possess a monopoly of those ungracious factors.—ED. C. C.]

Correspondence.

WOODLAND, WIS., Oct. 29, 1890.

DEAR MISS WIXON: This is my second letter to the Corner, but I hope I shall soon be able to correspond with grown folks. There does not seem to be so many children writing to the Corner as there used to be, but I hope the Liberal will succeed, and hope, when I get grown, that I can get up and speak as the great Liberal men and women of the United States do. We only hav three months of school in the year, and then we hav to walk over a mile up one hill and the other, and school being in June, July, and August, we sometimes hav two weeks' vacation.

I am glad the pictures were continued. I hav not been to any Liberal meeting since last winter. Mrs. Krekel spoke at the Woodland school-house; I was present; she was as good a speaker as ever graced Woodland. I received a letter from the assistant secretary of the Oregon Secular Union saying that they were going to meet in Portland, Ore., the 11th, 12th, and 13th, and would like to hav the Liberals of our neighborhood attend. There were many of the Liberals of Woodland going to attend, but they could not get ready before the last day, when we went. But the speaking had closed; there was only a ball on the 13th, and so we did not hear the speaking, and, not caring for the ball, we went to the Mechanics' Fair. But I hope I soon shall be able to go to a meeting again. We must keep the Liberal ball rolling. I will stop, or my letter will go to the waste-basket; and wishing the Liberals success, I remain,

Yours for liberty and truth,
ANNIE BALLHORN.

[May Annie realize her desire to become a public speaker, which she can do by study, reflection, and practice. It would be a good idea to form a neighborhood club for the purpose of learning the art of public speaking. Try it.—ED. C. C.]

VERSAILLES, IND., Nov. 3, 1890.

DEAR MISS WIXON: Not having written for so long a time, I thought perhaps you all would begin to think that I had deserted the Corner and become converted to the Christian faith. That is not it. I hav been reading, and will always continue to read, the valuable paper, each week with increasing interest, and am striving (as I think is every true Liberal's duty) to spread the gospel of Freethought. If each and all of my Liberal friends would endeavor to convince at least one of their church-going friends of the inconsistency of their religion and their Bible, we should hav many more persons to enter the ranks of Liberalism. Besides, we should feel that we had done something in our lifetime for the important cause.

Of course, there are many with whom it is utterly useless to reason, in consequence of their total ignorance upon any subject, but those who do admit of a mild and kind explanation are the ones upon whom our labors will not be lost.

I hav been reading "Men, Women, and Gods," and hav liked it so well that I concluded not to be so selfish as to retain it for my own special benefit, but to giv it to my friends, for the purpose of discovering that woman is the slave of religion—in fact, that she is and always was the unconscious tool of the Bible, which for that one particular reason should be abhorred by her as the greatest encroachment on her right and privileges.

I will try and write an essay for the "Science Column" before long, as I am greatly interested in that part.

I should like very much to correspond with a reader of THE TRUTH SEEKER who writes the Pitman system of phonography. It would be a great aid to us, and especially to myself. Please let me know soon.

Well, I will close this letter now, lest it will become too long.

I send you love from us all.

Your friend, ANNIE H. STOOKINGER.

CARACAS, VENEZUELA, S. A.,
Oct. 28, 1890.

DEAR FRIEND: Leaving New York September 10th on the steamship Caracas, I arrived after a very pleasant voyage of seven days at the island of Curacao, one of the Dutch West Indian possessions.

There were fourteen passengers on board, for the greater part Venezuelans, and their sociability and refinement were a source of pleasure during the whole voyage.

The officers also are a jolly set, and without exception fine samples of the American gentleman.

From Curacao I proceeded to Maracaibo, and from there to Porto Cabello and Valencia. On arriving here in Caracas, I found that in the six months that I hav been absent little or nothing has occurred to disturb the inhabitants.

This, to you, may seem quite commonplace, but in these countries there is, as a rule, so much tyranny that revolutions are more the rule than the exception.

Venezuela, however, has been remarkably fortunate in the choice of her last two presidents, with the natural result that there is peace and contentment throughout the entire republic.

From here I will proceed to Ciudad Bolivar on the Orinoco, passing through Barcelona, Carupano, Cumana, and Trinidad.

The other day they felt an earthquake shock here in Caracas, and although the laws of the country prohibit religious processions in public, the priests paraded around the plaza praying for a suspension in the earthquake line. Their prayers must hav been heard, for there was only one shock.

Caracas, as I said in my last, lies in a delightful valley, and is blessed with a fine climate. Its society is of the best, its ladies are extraordinarily pretty, and I do not exaggerate in saying that its men hav retained all the noble attributes of their Spanish ancestors to the exclusion of nearly all their bad ones.

To-day is a national fete day. The streets are crowded with soldiers and other classes, all anxious to make a display of their enthusiastic patriotism without a single row Considering the revolutionary tendency of the people, and the despotic government which preceded that of Rajas P., this is a remarkable proof of the influence for good which can be exerted by a well-meaning and capable man of sense over a people who do not acknowledge fear as part of their curriculum.

The Guiana question is still uppermost in the minds of the Venezuelans, and I am hopeful that the day is not far distant when England will of necessity be obliged to yield to the earnest and patriotic endeavors of Bolivar's countrymen.

The English hav shamefully ignored the principles of the Monroe doctrin, and if we allow them to proceed as hitherto, we shall some day hav cause to repent our neglect of a sacred duty.

With hope of sending more from Trinidad, I remain,

Yours in friendship, G. S. NEWTON.

An Honest Offer.

In another column will be found the advertisment of the great firm of J. D. Larkin & Co., of Buffalo. This firm is quoted in the commercial agencies as being worth $100,000. They hav been in business a great many years, and their Sweet Home soap and toilet articles are well known throughout the United States. Much pleasure is taken in calling the attention of the public to this firm's advertisment. The firm shows its reliability in the fact that it is willing to let anybody hav its goods on thirty days' trial.—Advertisment.

OUR MAMMOTH CHRISTMAS BOX

Our object in getting up this Mammoth "Christmas" Box is to introduce to the American people our "Sweet Home" Family Soap and fine Toilet Articles. They are the purest, best, and most satisfactory whether made in this country or England; every one who uses them once become our permanent customer. We propose a new departure in the soap trade and will sell direct from our factory to the consumer, spending the money usually allowed for expenses of traveling men, wholesale and retail dealers' profits, in handsome and valuable presents to those who order at once.

Our goods are made for the select family trade, and will not be sold to dealers, and to induce people to give them a trial, we accompany each case with all of the useful and valuable presents named.

THIS BOY LAUGHS

because the Great "Christmas" Box has arrived and it will make 100,000 boys, girls, men and women, old and young, happy; because it contains the greatest lot of Christmas Presents ever seen for the money. Beautiful things! Something for everyone in the family, father—mother—all of the boys and girls—the baby—and hired girl. Such fun opening the box you never heard of. It is a great surprise to all who get it. It contains so many of the very things everyone wishes to receive. Nowhere can such liberality be found.

We do not ask you to remit in advance, nor run any risks, nor take any chances. We merely ask permission to ship to you a box of these goods, and if after 30 days' trial you are fully convinced that the soap is all we claim, and the extras all we advertise, you can then pay the bill. But if you are not satisfied in every way, no charge will be made for what you have used. How can we do more?

To Get the Box simply write your name and address on a postal card and mail to us and we will ship you the goods on 30 day's trial, and you are under no obligations to keep the box if it does not in every way meet your expectations. We know the great value of our articles, and are willing to put them to the severest kind of a test, hence will send you the box on 30 day's trial and if not satisfactory will remove it.

Some people prefer to send cash with order—we do not ask it, but if readers of this paper remit in advance we will place in the box in addition to all the other extras a valuable present for the lady of the house. Articles that are near and dear to the heart of every woman, and that she will be proud of for years to come.

Where boxes are paid for in advance, we ship same day order is received. All other orders are filled in their regular turn.

Persons remitting in advance can have their money refunded without argument or comment if the box does not prove all they expect. Price of box complete $6.00.

The above OFFER only holds good until January 1st. SEND IN YOUR ORDERS AT ONCE.

FOR HER DAILY BREAD.
A NINETEENTH CENTURY NOVEL.
Preface by R. G. INGERSOLL.
For Her Daily Bread is the story of two young girls and a younger brother who were left parentless, with little money, fair education, and much courage, to make their way through the world by going to Chicago. The author is also the heroin. The narrativ is, in the main, a history of a working girl's life and experience in the city of Chicago among bluff business men, kind hearted folks, and disreputable hypocrits. It is just such a story of human life as we should expect Colonel Ingersoll to be interested in; and whatever he admires and appreciates is sure to be worth the attention of the rest of the world. Price 25 cents.

TRY-SQUARE:
OR,
The Church of Practical Religion.
BY REPORTER.
This is the history of an attempt to found a church without superstition, and its success. Uncle Job Sawyer, the pastor, having established his pulpit, uses it to discuss all the vital questions of human concern, religious, political, and otherwise. The book is written in well-chosen language, and easily understood. There is just sufficient narrativ about it to interest the reader and hold his attention while the truth is being brought to his mind.

News of the Week.

THE pope has been forced to acquiesce in the separation of church and state, including civil marriage, made by Brazil; but he makes his recognition of that nation conditional on a promis that the religious associations shall not be suppressed and that the salaries to the minor clergy be continued several years.

THE annual convention of the national Farmers' Alliance, at Ocala, Fla., opening on the 2d, was an important gathering.

THE subscriptions to the scheme of General Booth of the Salvation Army for reclaiming "Darkest England," come to £38,000.

A LIBERAL member of the congress of Mexico recently denounced the archbishop of that country, and introduced a bill to expel from Mexican soil all priests not natives by birth.

ON the 29th ult., on a train to Annapolis, a young man unwittingly sat down on the hat of Rev. Mr. Brown, and the preacher blacked his eyes and broke his nose, to the indignation of all passengers.

A PROTESTANT clergyman in Vienna, feeling himself called upon to stem the public esteem of Professor Koch, reminded his congregation that whatever Koch might still discover and invent, and whatever methods of death he might do away with, he never could drive death out of the world, and that religion had lost none of its importance by the advance of science.

REV. C. C. HEMBEE, near Guthrie, Oklahoma, for disreputable conduct had his pulpit transferred to Rev. J. Anghey, but confronted the latter, when he came to claim it, with a revolver. Sheriff Lyttle disarmed and arrested him.

CARDINAL GIBBONS has brought suit for libel against a Roman Catholic author, H. A. Ringrose, for dedicating his book, "The Poor Man's Priest," which is the life and indorsement of Dr. McGlynn, to the cardinal without his consent.

AT the conference of the National Liberal Federation in London a platform was adopted in favor of free education, reform in land laws, disestablishment and disendowment of the Church of Scotland, local option, formation of district and parish councils, and mending or ending of the House of Lords.

CATHOLICS purpose having a Catholic exhibit at the World's Fair, showing works of their members in practical and fine arts, literature, etc. They will show "the way in which the church preserved letters and arts" in the few accidental cases in which that institution did so, but will not present the numberless instances in which it destroyed them.

APROPOS of Ward McAllister's book, "Society as I Hav Found It," Dr. McGlynn lectured last Sunday night on "Society as I Hav Found It," saying that "society" as McAllister describes it can exist only by dishonest accumulation of wealth, by bribery and legislativ corruption. In one century, he said, America has nearly reached the condition which Rome after many centuries arrived at before her fall.

PROFESSOR KOCH'S lymph seems to be more effectiv in external diseases, like lupus, etc., than in consumption. Piteous appeals for it come from this country and all others, outstripping all possibility of gratifying. Physicians from all nations are arriving at Berlin to investigate. A limited quantity of the lymph has been forwarded to American hospitals. The German government has placed at Koch's disposal funds to enable him to continue his inquiries and produce the lymph. It is intended soon to place the manufacture of the lymph in the hands of the government, and security will be felt by all people when they can obtain it under the seal of Germany, instead of from divers money-making manufacturers and counterfeiters. English physicians are displeased at Koch's intention to keep the formula secret a long time, and say their College of Physicians will hav nothing to do with a remedy the composition of which is a secret. But Koch says it is one of the most powerful agents discovered, and cannot be applied too cautiously, for if it were placed without reserve in the hands of all practitioners it would kill more than consumption.

Gems of Thought.

THERE will shortly be no more priests, I say their work is done,
Death is without emergencies here, but life is perpetual emergencies here.
—Walt Whitman.

THE aim of life should be to assist in the subjection of the laws of nature to man's use, and to improve the moral, intellectual, and social condition of man. Instead of endeavoring to convert men to a belief in theories which will make them happy in a hereafter, of which we know nothing and which men through the ages hav conceived of differently, according to their own temperaments, we should aid the progress, which history shows has slowly but surely been going on, of making man the master of this world.—Adams.

VERY few indeed ever trouble themselvs about whether there is any truth in the Bible story, or any reason in the Christian faith, being quite satisfied to jog along in the old faith of their fathers. The Christian religion, they declare, was good enough for their ancestors, and therefore ought to be good enough for them, little considering the awkward admission involved in the statement. They quite lose sight of the fact that it was a pure matter of chance that they were born in Christian England instead of in Mohammedan Turkey. According to their argument, they are guilty of great wickedness in contributing toward the expense of sending out missionaries to try to convert foreigners from the faith of their fathers. It must be as right for a Turk to embrace the religion of Mohammed, for a Hindoo to embrace Brahmanism, a Chinese Fohism or Confucianism, a Parsee Zoroastrianism, a Thibetan Buddhism, and an African fetichism, as for a European to embrace Christianism.—Dr. Hardwicke.

YOU never can honor your father by going around swearing to his mistakes. You never can honor your mother by saying that ignorance is blessed because she did not know everything. I want to honor my parents by finding out more than they did.—Ingersoll.

THE true Christian not only feels no need of culture, because this is a worldly principle and opposed to feeling; he has also no need of (natural) love. God supplies to him the want of culture, and in like manner God supplies to him the want of love, of a wife, of a family.—Feuerbach.

MISCHIEVOUS is the following teaching: "Take no thought for your life, what ye shall eat or what ye shall drink: nor yet for your body what ye shall put on. Behold the fowls of the air," etc. (Matt. vi, 25). The poor man who takes no thought for the morrow in modern times soon finds himself an inmate either of the workhouse or of the jail.—Arthur B. Moss.

URIAH IS SLAIN.

And it came to pass, when Joab observed the city, that he assigned Uriah unto a place where he knew that valiant men were. And the men of the city went out and fought with Joab: and there fell some of the people of the servants of David; and Uriah the Hittite died also.—2 Sam. xi, 16, 17.

To the World's Columbian Exposition Commission:

Learning that there is an organized movement among the more conservative church people—manipulated by a "Sabbath" organization—to induce your honorable body to close on Sundays the World's Fair, to be held in 1893 in Chicago, the undersigned respectfully put in this counter petition, and ask that the Fair may be open to the public on each Sunday of its continuance. We ask this for the following reasons:

1. That the American principle of separation of church and state may be maintained.

2. That public morality may be subserved by providing a substitute for the immoral places to which men may resort when no moral amusements are available.

3. As a matter of justice also to the people of Chicago who have given of their means to make the Fair possible, tens of thousands of whom can visit the Fair only on a general holiday; and as a matter of justice also to the visitors to the Fair, whose time or means may be limited, and who certainly are entitled to great consideration at your hands.

4. For the public good. The opening of the Fair on Sunday will be for the benefit not only of Chicago, but of the whole country. The rights of no one are infringed, the happiness of no one disturbed. Those who wish to attend can do so; those who do not can otherwise spend the day. This is a solely humanitarian question, a question of human relations and human welfare, and, therefore, the only standard by which you can decide is that of the public welfare.

5. It will benefit the Fair, attracting a much larger attendance, interesting more people in it, and increasing its receipts.

6. To the objection that Sunday opening of the Fair will destroy the day as a rest-day, we affirm that the tendency would be exactly the opposite. The more beautiful you make Sunday, the more attractive, the more noble and varied in its pleasures and instructions, the more difficult it will be to change its character, the less danger there is that employers will ever have the power to transfer it from its present position to the days of toil. With choice of Sunday occupation restricted to attending church or visiting a saloon, the average workingman would choose to keep on laboring.

7. Finally: Opening the World's Fair on Sunday will harm no one but the keepers of immoral places, while it will benefit the Fair itself, the people of Chicago, and the visitors to the Fair, thereby conducing to municipal prosperity, individual education, public morality, and the development and good of the whole country.

THE marquis of Queensbury, of prize-ring fame, approves "General" Booth's scheme for Darkest London, and givs him $500. He describes himself as a "reverent Agnostic."

THE Catholic Union and Times says: "It looks as if the Methodists were going to hav a woman bishop. We congratulate Miss Frances Willard. She has downed St. Paul. May her episcopal cackle be loud and long."

THE ballot in regard to closing the World's Fair on Sunday, which was carried on in the Chicago Evening Post for about six weeks, closed November 18th, with the result standing thus: For opening on Sunday, 10,316; against opening on Sunday, 5,192.

THE Canadian Baptist of Nov. 6, 1890, says: "The appropriation of public moneys to sectarian uses by state legislatures is exciting much and increasing discussion in the United States. Thoughtful and far-seeing citizens in the different states are coming to see more and more clearly that such use of the public funds is wrong in principle and pernicious in practice."

THIS is from the Denison Sunday Gazetteer: "Sam Jones, the leather-lunged exponent of slang and vulgarity, otherwise known as the 'great evangelist,' is converting Texans by hundreds and raking in the dollars by thousands. The collection at Palestine, Tex., last Sunday, amounted to $2,200. We hav been assured that men preach the gospel for love, and that the Holy Spirit is the medium through which conversions are made, and men only the instruments to create an awakening, but we confess our ignorance in view of the statements publicly made that 'Sam Jones converted five hundred souls,' and 'a collection of $2,200 was raised for Sam Jones at the close of the meeting.' 'What fools we mortals be!'"

THE ancient and ghostly ceremony of the religious brotherhood known as "Of the Souls in Purgatory," in the republic of Marino, was performed for the last time last month. The brotherhood, dressed in black, with masks and torches, carry a skeleton stretched on a white sheet on a bier about the town, winding up with a sort of Danse Macabre. The bishops and the civil authorities, with, it is said, the sanction of the pope, hav ordered that the dance shall never be held again.

THE Farmers' Alliance, in session at Ocala, Fla., unanimously passed this resolution: "We, the national Farmers' Alliance of America, believing that obedience and veneration for the laws of God are the conserving and saving force of human government, do hereby respectfully request that the directors of the great national fair, to be held in 1892, do not desecrate the American Sabbath by keeping open the gates to the same on the Lord's day." The Alliance might hav spoken with more wisdom."

TOWARD the close of the late meeting of the World's Columbian Commission at Chicago the Sunday question came up briefly, the secretary reporting the receipt of numerous communications, and was disposed of by the adoption of the following resolution offered by General St. Clair: "Resolved, That the communication of the secretary be received and filed, and the secretary is hereby directed to reply to the communications therein referred to, and such like communications as he may hereafter receive, stating that they will be considered at some future meeting of the commission after the Chicago directory has submitted its rules and regulations governing the rate of entrance," etc.

A DISPATCH to the World asks: "What will Wanamaker say when he learns that the sacred precincts of Rochester's new post-office building hav been invaded by a lottery concern? The building has been in course of erection for nearly eight years and has just received the finishing touches. The ladies having in charge the annnal donation for the city hospital, the greatest charity of the city, secured it for a grand bazar and supper. Among the attractions is a flower room, where for from ten to twenty-five cents, bouquets are sold containing prizes ranging from a trinket of no value to $1 in cash. The lottery is being liberally patronized. The churches are all interested, and none of the pastors hav as yet said anything against the lottery."

THE French minister of trade has just collected a lot of interesting opinions concerning the labor question from all classes of men in the French mercantil world. Question blanks to the number of 150,000 were sent out, and 35,000 were returned with all answers. All boards of trade throughout France protested against the interference of the state in the solution of labor problems. The industrial courts spoke for the nine-ten hour day; the trade societies for the eight-hour day. All French chambers of commerce declared that the introduction of the eight-hour day would result in the decrease of production. A somewhat unexpected result of the investigation was the discovery that an unusually large number of Swiss and German workingmen hav been crowding into French factories of late years.

THUS the Catholic Review on the late election in Massachusetts: "The Democrats of the country must not forget that the tidal wave which had put William E. Russell in the governor's chair of Massachusetts sent John W. Corcoran, candidate on the same ticket for lieutenant-governor, to the bottom of the sea. States may go Republican or Democratic by immense majorities, but the Catholic candidate is never elected where the Protestant can prevent it. The entire scheme of American constitutional government, so fair in securing every man his rights, is nullified whenever Protestants hav the power of nullifying it with regard to Catholics. And it is not to be doubted that there never would hav been any American Constitution had the Protestant colonies foreseen the success of Catholicity under its fair spirit. There is a necessity in this country for a Catholic organization which may neutralize this bad Protestant spirit on occasions. For instance, since it must hav been guessed that Corcoran would lose heavily in the election because of his Catholicity, every Catholic vote in the state should hav been placed to his credit. This is the rule for the Catholic voter in present conditions: when a Catholic candidate is on a ticket and his opponent is a non-Catholic, let the Catholic candidate hav the vote no matter what he represents. A strong medicin of this kind administered annually will tone the nervous system of the bigot and the politician."

Christianity Before the Court.

COMMON SENSE ON THE WOOLSACK.

From the earliest dawn of history man has persecuted his brother for a difference of opinion. Socrates was compelled to drain the cup of hemlock because he tried to supplant the old pagan gods and introduce more rational ideas of deity, and for corrupting the Athenian youth. The truth is, his offense was the promulgation of ideas which the people of his time were unable to appreciate. How much the world has lost by the untimely murder of Socrates cannot be determined at the present day.

The great work of Copernicus on "The Revolution of the Celestial Orbs" was not published for thirty years after it was written for fear of persecution. At that time the earth was believed to be the center of the solar system, and the pious noddies could not brook ideas in science which did not correspond with what the priests had told them. In other words, it was a crime to disseminate ideas, however important to the world, in advance of an ignorant priesthood and a more ignorant church.

In his old days Galileo was summoned before the Inquisition for promulgating the truths enunciated by Copernicus. And on bended knees, with his hand on the holy gospels, he was made to renounce the theory of the solar system. He was finally thrown into prison, without books, pen, or paper, and his last days rendered as miserable as intolerant fanaticism could make them. Bruno, for teaching philosophy and astronomy, was burnt at Rome less than three hundred years ago.

I do not mention these facts because I think they will be new to the student in history, but to call his attention to the lying claim of the church that she has always been the promoter of science and the friend of learning.

For a period of more than a thousand years, known as the Dark Ages, every independent thinker was tortured or condemned to death. The rack, the thumbscrew, the ripping-knife, the iron boot, and many other instruments of torture were invented to punish those whose brain had originated new thoughts and who had the manly courage to step aside from the old beaten track.

They seemed to go upon the supposition that if a new idea was promulgated, the plutonian regions would be uncapped and all the angels of destruction would be let loose and pandemonium would reign.

These intolerant and superstitious ideas plowed such deep furrows in the human brain that they hav been transmitted from generation to generation, and with a thousand forked curses, prompt men to acts of persecution and cruelty even at the present day.

We look upon the murder of Bruno and hundreds of others, and upon the tortures of rack and flame, with feelings of horror, and wonder that men should be so brutally treated because they had given birth to a new idea.

But we should examin ourselvs and see if we do not cherish the same spirit in our own breasts. If an idea be advanced in keeping with our own belief, how readily we accept it, and how kindly we feel toward the one who advances it. But how different the feeling when a truth is advanced contrary to our former belief.

Thus we too often make the force of the truth depend upon our former belief.

This partiality for our own opinions and belief has had a tendency to keep generation after generation in the same old mental ruts. Nearly every man who has come before the world with a new thought has been compelled to run the gauntlet.

Who shall say how much this unholy warfare against new and unwelcome truths has kept back the civilization of the world? An unwelcome truth! What a misnomer! Should any truth be unwelcome? Will the time ever come when truth shall triumph over prejudice? Will manhood ever assert itself, so that we shall hold our beliefs and prejudices under subjection to the truth? Has not the time yet come when the world can be trusted with new thoughts? If not, what man, or class of men, is to be the world's guardian? Who is to act as censor for the nineteenth century, and say this thought you may accept, that you must reject? Is some man to forbid me to scale the loftiest hights or to descend to the lowest depths, or range ocean, earth, and heaven in search of knowledge?

Is it a crime in anyone to try to make the acquaintance of those who stand in the front ranks of science, and ask them to giv him their best ideas, their newest thoughts, and their latest discoveries?

Is it wicked for me to write down the thoughts manufactured by the machinery of my brain or to receive the thoughts of another? I did not make the machine, neither can I control it. If the machinery of my brain does not turn out thoughts to suit the Christian, let him blame the maker.

For hundreds of years it has been the practice of the church to choke down every new thought which it considered unorthodox. And nearly every scientific thought has been so considered.

Christians hav ever claimed the right to express their thoughts, but hav persistently denied that right to others. Has this proved to be the best course for the world at large?

You, my Christian friends, doubtless know many things which I do not know, and for you to choke down my thoughts, and for others to choke down your thoughts, is to say that all are satisfied with what they already know and are willing to hold the world at a standstill. But with a free interchange of ideas each becomes master of all the others know, and the world moves forward.

In the realm of thought there should be no masters, no slaves. It is as wicked to strangle a new-born thought as to strangle a new-born babe. Has the curse of the world been too many thinkers? If so, would it not be a great blessing to hav men born without brains? The most valuable thoughts to the world hav come from those whom the world has most persecuted. The world will never start on the direct road to the highest civilization until it bids welcome to every new thought, and if it finds it worthy adopts it as the common property of all.

Now, my Christian friends, the thoughts which I shall present for consideration are, according to my belief and judgment, founded in truth. If they are not approved by your reason you are not bound to believe them, but I pray you not to reject them without a due exercise of your judgment.

The Mormon comes to you with a book and he says it is the word of God. The Mohammedan presents a book and claims it was written by the divine ruler in heaven. The Scandinavian has two books for which he claims divine authority. The Persian has a book which he knows was written by a man whose hand was guided by divine inspiration. And the Buddhist has some sacred writings which he believes far transcend anything which could be produced by mortal man. And yet the Brahman comes with a book written in ancient Sanscrit, which he believes to be heavenly, pure, written by the great Brahma. And so, if there is any reliance to be placed on history, there are more than twenty books which hav been, or are to-day, considered sacred.

Did God write all of these books, or did men write a part of them? If God did not write them all, which did he write? If men had an object in writing a part of them, might they not hav had an object in writing all of them? The Buddhist will tell you that all so-called sacred writings are spurious but his. The Persian will tell you the same in regard to his sacred book, and so of all the rest.

A careful examination of these books will satisfy any unprejudiced mind that not one of them contains anything above what man could produce. There is much in these books which is good and much which is bad, and nothing which is inspired. And as men hav always been writing books, both good and bad, and as we never knew God to write books of either description, we are driven to the reasonable conclusion that he never has had much experience either as a book publisher or book writer.

But the Christian comes forward with the claim that his inspired book is an exception to all the rest. He believes it to be the only perfect book ever written. But, my Christian friend, do you realize that the believers in each of the other so-called revealed wills of God entertain the same belief in regard to its sanctity? And do you realize that if you had been brought up among the Mohammedans you would hav the same reverence for the Koran that you now hav for the Bible—that the matter of religious belief depends entirely upon geographical lines? In one country you are a religious pig, in another a religious puppy, but never a religious man. For manhood depends upon no system of supernatural religion.

You call a man an Infidel, and hold him up to the reprobation of the world, who does not believe in the sanctity of your Bible. But did you ever realize how near you come to agreeing with him? You believe that these books are all man-made except the one you venerate.

He believes that God never had anything to do with any of them. There is only a difference of one book between you. And since there are some twenty of these so-called sacred volumes, and as you reject nineteen of them, you must be nineteen-twentieths of an Infidel.

Again. Did it ever occur to your mind, my Christian friend, that the Infidel has the same right to differ from you that you hav to differ from him?

Would you like to be punished because you differ from another in opinion? But Christians hav been punishing those who differed from them in opinion through nearly all the Christian centuries.

You do not seem to be satisfied with the privilege of spending Sunday in the most agreeable manner to yourself, but you seem determined to make others spend their Sundays just as you do without any regard to their feelings or convenience.

If Christianity had infused a little manhood into you, instead of making you stone-blind, you would see the monstrous injustice of such requirement.

You no doubt think that all men should observe Sunday because you regard that day as holy time. And you pass laws to punish those who do not bow to your doctrin. You say that acts, which are right on Saturday, are wrong if performed on Sunday. Did it ever occur to you that a man cannot sin against time? That the question of right and wrong depends upon the nature of the act, and not upon the time when it is performed? Is it not the hight of folly to say that an act is proper if performed at 11 o'clock on Saturday night, but criminal if performed at 1 o'clock Sunday morning? Must a man keep his eye on the clock dial to know whether he is committing a crime or not?

Moreover, if you were living in a Mohammedan country would you like to be fined or imprisoned because you do not observe Friday when you hav no particular regard for that day? Will you do unto others what you would not like to hav done to you? Hav not the Jews and Mohammedans and Persians the same right to observe their holy days that you hav to observe yours? There is no day in the week which has not been kept as holy time by some sect of worshipers. What would be the consequence if all these different sects were living in one community, and each sect should impose fines or other penalties for the violation of their respectiv days? Would it not be far better to allow each sect to observe its own particular day in its own way, without being molested by the others?

And should not every man be allowed the full enjoyment of his opinion in regard to the observance or inobservance of any particular day, so long as he does not infringe the rights of others? What better right has a Christian to control a Jew, than a Jew has to control a Christian? And why should not an Infidel enjoy rights equal to all?

Some Christians claim that this is a Christian government, and that it should be run in the interest of Christianity. If any Christian will point his finger to any clause in the Constitution upon which such a claim can be based he will confer a great favor upon many very intelligent citizens. If there be any constitutional law in regard to the matter it is plainly on the other side. For it positivly declares that Congress shall pass no law establishing any system of religion.

The reason why I find fault with Christianity is because it will not mind its own business, and is not satisfied with the full enjoyment of its rights, but seeks to trample down the rights of others.

By what rule of right do Christians make Liberals pay taxes on their church property? Is not this clearly an usurpation?

Is it not wielding the strong arm of the law in favor of Christianity, and in violation of the fundamental law of the land?

If Christians were compelled to pay taxes on Mohammedan mosques, Buddhistic temples, and Chinese Joss-houses, I am inclined to think they would begin to appreciate the outrage of compelling Liberals to pay taxes on property owned by others, and protected at public expense, and in which they hav no interest.

If Christians want to build churches, they hav the right to do so, and every true Liberal will unflinchingly support them in the exercise of that right. Let them be never so costly, let their spires run heaven-high, no Liberal will find fault. But when they build churches and cathedrals for their own accommodation and amusement, and compel those to pay taxes on them who hav no interest in them, the usurpation and outrage are so glaring that all should be ashamed of it who hav a just appreciation of true manhood.

There is another just cause of complaint against Christians in this country, because it is the result of Christian legislation. I refer to the rule applied to witnesses in courts of justice in many states.

The oath of a drunkard or rum-seller, gambler, bully, or debauchee, Jew or Mohammedan, will be taken in this country without hesitation. If I hav been correctly informed, the courts will depart from the ordinary practice, and cut off a rooster's head in the courtroom and swear a Chinaman in the most approved manner.

But let an Atheist or Agnostic be brought before the court, no matter what his character for truth and veracity may be, and "presto, change!" He is not a competent witness. In many states in the Union one might be robbed, or even hav his dearest friends murdered, before his eyes, and his oath would not be allowed to bring a villain to justice.

If Atheists and Agnostics would lie and say they believe in a God, when they know nothing about it, their oath would be allowed. Thus a man must be a perjurer in his own heart to be believed by a Christian. Justice would require that every law which makes a distinction in favor of a Christian, on account of his religion, should be stricken from the statute-book. The competency of a witness should depend upon his veracity and not upon his religious belief. When a man is robbed of his rights, he is a slave. If I am to be reduced to a state of slavery, I would as soon be a slave to Mohammedans as Christians.

There is another question to which the attention of Christians should be called, and that is their determination to force religious teaching in the common schools. Christians manifest a disposition to hav others observe the Golden Rule, but they are not always particular about applying it to their own conduct.

Would the Christian like to send his children to schools where Mormonism or Mohammedanism is taught? Would a Jew like to hav the New Testament read and Christian prayer made in schools where he sends his children? Would Protestants like to send their children to Catholic schools, or would Catholics be satisfied with Protestant teaching? And would it not be an outrage on Liberals to be compelled to send their children to school where any system of supernatural religion is taught? Would any fair-minded man, who is willing to concede to others as much as he asks of them, be willing to impose upon other children what he would not like to hav imposed upon his own? No system of religion can be taught in our public schools without giving offense to some one. Justice to each is justice to all. Let the schools be kept free from religious taint. No other course can insure justice to all.

If it is true that Christianity inspires men with a love of justice and fills them with the loftiest sentiments and makes them merciful and forgiving, as is claimed, then Christians ought to be the most magnanimous people in the world. But they insist on many practices which ill comport with their claim to magnanimity. They insist upon prayers and religious exercises in the prisons, in the army and navy, and in the legislatures both state and national. In the first place, I do not believe that a prayer ever altered a circumstance or condition so much as the breadth of one hair.

Yet if a man wants to pray he must enjoy that privilege undisturbed. At the same time, he must not impose his prayers upon those who do not want to hear them. Much less should he force his prayers and religious ceremonies upon those who are not interested in them.

Would a Christian be very much pleased with a law which would compel him to pay a Mohammedan for entering our prisons and legislativ halls and praying five times a day? Christians are just as much interested in Mohammedan prayers as thousands of Liberals in this country are in theirs. If Christians would not like to hav Mohammedans pray for them, why should they try to force their prayers upon others who are not interested in them?

But the Christian says that he is guided by the Bible, which was written by the finger of God, and that God and he make a majority. Though Christians often fight among themselvs, each faction always believe that God is on their side, thus giving to each party a clear Christian majority. This Christian majority, or "God on our side," has brought the most terrible calamities upon the children of men. It has been the power behind the throne of every Christian tyrant. It is even now persecuting and banishing the Jews in and from Russia. This God majority spoke the Inquisition into being. For more than a thousand years all Europe was ruled by this majority, and what was the condition of the people? Not one out of a hundred could read or write his name. The common people lived in hovels, without floors, chimneys, or doors. Our domestic animals to-day are better housed than they. Their food consisted of black bread, a few vegetables, and such roots as they could dig. Their clothing was hides, skins, and oftentimes straw tied around them with thongs or bark from trees. The people were all enthusiastic Christians but not high livers.

Bible Lotteries.

Since newspapers containing any news respecting prizes drawn at lotteries, whether of the ungodly sort such as the Louisiana lottery, or of the godly kind such as the Catholic fair raffles, are "unmailable," why is not the Bible put under the same ban for the same reason?

The word lottery is derived from lot, which means "chance, hazard, fortune" (Webster).

It seems to hav been a common thing in the olden times to play the lottery business. It was sacred then, but it is profane now.

So they cast lots, and the lot fell upon Jonah (Jonah i, 7).

It seems that he drew a whale. But that was an unlucky throw of the dice for him, as upon the second "throw" he was thrown into the sea.

And Saul said, Cast lots between me and Jonathan, my son, and Jonathan was taken (1 Sam. xiv, 41).

And they gave forth their lots; and the lot fell upon Matthias (Acts i, 26).

And when they had crucified him, they parted his garments, casting lots upon them (Mark xv, 24).

If Catholic fair raffles come strictly under the law, then the ancient raffle for Jesus's clothes comes under the same law. Honor bright. Let Bible raffles be kept out of the mails.

Items of Foreign Freethought News.

The Federation of French Freethought Societies contains at the present time over one hundred auxiliary bodies, all in good standing and full of enthusiasm.—La Raison. This leaves us Americans away behind.

November, 1890, will always be remembered by the clergy of France, for in that month, for the first time since 1798, students for clerical offices were compelled by law to pay at least one of the duties of a French citizen, namely, to serve in the army as common soldiers.—Das Menschenthum.

Vienna, Austria, must be an earthly paradise for orthodox bigots. Last month a musician, a Freethinker, was sentenced to six days' imprisonment for not removing the cigar from his mouth when a religious procession passed by.—Der Freidenker. Evidently the authorities believed he would hav plenty of time to "smoke" in the hereafter.

November 4th the Society for the Diffusion of Moral Teachings Without Any Theological or Supernatural Infusion, held its first meeting. M. Jean-Paul Cée, the originator of the movement, and author of two works on "Morals," was elected president. The plan is excellent and deserves abundant success.—Circulaire du comité d'etudes morales.

The pope has got left again. His fierce encyclical letter against the Italian government did not serve its purpose. On the contrary, the people indorsed at the polls the government's attitude toward the pope, by electing several new anticlerical members. Prime Minister Crispi was elected in four different cities.—Freireligiöses-Sonntags-Blatt. That is the way to do the business.

The movement started by THE TRUTH SEEKER in giving from time to time biographical sketches of foreign Freethinkers of eminence, has been taken up by several of our European contemporaries. Fritänkaren in its last number has a portrait and biographical sketch of Dr. Phil. Knut Wicksell, and La Vérité presents to its readers an illustrated biographical sketch of G. W. Foote, president of the National Secular Society of England.

A few months ago the emperor and empress of Russia honored the Poganoff cloister with a visit, and remained there for lunch. Among the dishes served was soup. The emperor thought the soup tasted rather thin and made a remark about it to the prior. The latter perked up as much as etiquet permitted, and in a tone of pride and satisfaction over having done a good deed, said: "Yes, your majesty, father of all orthodox Russians, we hav for your sake committed a sin, I fear; the soup your majesty has been eating was made from the bones of holy Job, which are kept here." The imperial visitors did not call for a second plate.—Fritänkaren.

The day of the supernatural has not yet passed. In Tyrol, a province belonging to Austria, the holy mamma, Virgin Mary, has for two months daily appeared on the top of a spruce-tree in a forest to a twelve-years-old peasant girl, whom she instructed to inform all true believers of her most holy wishes. The news spread through all Austro-Hungary, and great crowds of pious fools came to hear what Mary had to say. A small altar illuminated with tallow candles was placed at the foot of the tree, and from it the girl announced the celestial news on Sundays to as many as three thousand people. It is unnecessary to state, I suppose, that the child suffering under hallucination is the only one that can see the heavenly visitor. Certainly there is need of Freethought in Austria.—Der Lichtfreund.

The trouble in Sweden is now somewhat lessened. Henry Berghell, the Freethought Brutus, has joined his friends the Socialists, and intends to start a Socialistic-Infidel movement. We are glad he has left. It is best for all parties. Freethought seldom pays its disciple and exponent hard cash, and especially not in the beginning. And Mr. Berghell, besides being (judging from his traveling expenses charged to the society) very extravagant, virtually did much harm to the cause by his unnecessarily offensiv attitude toward the Christians. A Freethought lecturer must before everything be a gentleman, and a Liberal. Meanwhile, Freethought is spreading, and has even entered Upsala University, where a wicked fellow when asked, "What is theology?" answered, "Unfounded suppositions systematically arranged."

Keep Religion Out of the Schools.

From the Independent.

We giv an account elsewhere of a conference held in this city, called by a Presbyterian synodical committee, to advocate the definit elementary teaching of religion and morals in our public schools. The control of the conference represented the views of those who believe that the Bible (Protestant version) should be read in public schools, and that children should there be taught elementary Christian morals, based on the doctrin of God and the awards of the future world. A very activ Presbyterian committee, devoted to this object, visited the various denominational meetings of the state, and secured delegates from many of them to attend their conference. Some failed or refused to respond; but an interesting meeting was held, in which most of the speakers were in full sympathy with the purpose of the organizers.

We do not believe in the purpose aimed at by this conference. We do not believe in putting either religion or sectarianism in the public schools. Their purpose is secular, as we hav shown very fully, and in a long series of articles by Dr. Spear which we published some years ago. We can trust the church to teach religion; we cannot trust the state.

It may be considered as practically settled, whatever this conference of belated and excellent gentlemen may say, that religion is not to be taught in the public schools; that it is not the purpose of the public schools to teach religion; that the public schools are in their primary intention purely secular, as much so as a shoe shop or a woolen factory. It is settled by the American people that religion is left to the family and to the church, left wholly and utterly and finally. We may talk otherwise, but it is mere academic talking. The question is already settled, and settled right. The American people will not trust the state to teach religion; that is a matter between the individual and his God. If there are certain children who are not taught religion in their homes, the state does not assume to teach them; it leaves that wisely to the church to bring what influence it can to bear upon those children. That is the safest way and the only truly effectiv way.

The question of teaching morals is quite another one. Now, morals and religion are two different things. Religion has to do with one's relation to God; morals hav to do with one's relation to his fellow-men. "Thou shalt love the Lord thy God with all thy heart" is religion; "Thou shalt love thy neighbor as thyself" is morals. Religion may depend upon morals, and much more morals may depend upon religion; but they are not inseparable.

Now, it is for the interest of the state to hav good morals. If it has no real relation to religion, it does hav a real relation to character; but morals must be kept distinct and separate from the religion. It is not any part of the duty of the state to teach religion under the pretense of teaching morals.

Should, then, morals be taught in the public schools? The proper province of the public school is to teach secular learning—reading and writing and arithmetic—and to make intelligent citizens. If it does more than this, if in addition to intellectual it also givs moral instruction, this is to be done not as a primary object, but incidentally. It is impossible to teach reading or writing or arithmetic well without giving some moral training. Attention and self-restraint and diligence are part of the disciplin of study, and they at least are taught to every good pupil. It is not that the teacher's object is first to secure these virtues, but the virtues come incidentally, but necessarily. We do not sufficiently appreciate the immense value which schools possess in the culture of the moral nature, by the habits of diligence and application which they inculcate. It is a fact which has been proved abundantly by statistics, and will be supported by inquiry, that an educated community is more moral than an uneducated one, that the percentage of morals falls as the percentage of illiteracy goes up. A boy who has learned to work in school is more likely to earn a living honestly when he grows up. He has learned to apply himself. He has learned obedience and self-control. He has learned to look forward and be provident, and to work with a view to what he expects to secure. While it is true that intelligent crimes can only be performed by intelligent people, it is also true that the bulk of crimes, those of violence and rapin and lust, are not intelligent crimes, and that non-intelligent people are more likely to be guilty of them, and statistics bear out this conclusion.

And this is only a small part of the moral instruction which cannot help being given incidentally, but constantly, in a good public school, which keeps good order, and has good, moral teachers, but which professes only to giv secular instruction.

IT may be that, in the course of time, some really pious souls, deceived by their enthusiasm, hav believed that they had received from an intimate communication with God that which they owed only to their inflamed imaginations. In such cases, there is need of the advice of an honest man, and especially of a good physician.—Voltaire.

Special Call for Guarantee Fund.

The Congress of the American Secular Union, recently held at Portsmouth, O., directed the officers to make, through the Liberal papers, a call upon our friends for the pledge of $5,000 to enlarge and carry forward the work of the society. This money is needed to sustain the business of the general office in Philadelphia, and to pay the salaries and traveling expenses of at least two field secretaries, who shall go out to organize auxiliary societies and otherwise labor to promote the cause.

That this is an important movement in the right direction, must be obvious to all. Never was a time when the work of our society was so much in demand; and our one need is the money to carry on that work. Will our friends respond to this call liberally and at once, that we may know what to depend upon?

The president, besides his gratuitous daily work in behalf of the society, offers to be one of twenty to contribute $100 each for this object. Will nineteen others respond to this proposition at once?

How many can pledge $50, $25, $10, $5, $1? Let every friend of the cause inform us as soon as possible what he or she is willing to pledge.

Let all Liberal societies, whether auxiliary or not, take up this matter promptly, and inform us what they are willing to do.

The pledges will be published in THE TRUTH SEEKER, Investigator, Freethought, and Secular Thought, each month. It is understood that the subscriptions may be paid during the coming year at the convenience of the subscribers, and, if desired, in instalments. All responses to this call should be addressed to the corresponding secretary.

We see no reason why the sum named should not be secured by pledges within thirty days.

"Freethought" and Free Thought.

The following letter from the American Sentinel explains itself:

PHILADELPHIA, Nov. 20, 1890.

Editors American Sentinel: Your issue of November 20th contains some criticisms upon my attitude at the Portsmouth congress of the American Secular Union—criticisms which, despite their kindly tone (for which I thank you) call for some reply upon my part.

You quote from my speech on "Methods of Extending Our Work," and charge me with committing our society officially to a sectarian stand in favor of Infidelity.

Allow me to say, before all, that I detest the word "Infidelity," in whichever of three meanings it be taken—i.e., (1) unfaithful, (2) without faith, (3) opposed to the prevailing faith of the community. The first meaning, no one who is at all acquainted with me will ever apply to me; the second, I deny emphatically, as I am a Liberal Unitarian, with a very well-defined belief; and the third, I maintain, cannot with justice be applied to any moderate non-Trinitarian Liberal, since those who really uphold orthodox Christianity are in the minority in this country. (See statistics in my speech.)

As for my "declaration of war on religion," I fail to find such in a single sentence of my speech. I did, however, recommend that children be taught to realize "the evil that priestcraft and religious superstition hav been from the days of savagery down." But what hav these things to do with the "two great commandments" of love to God and love to one's neighbor, which are the sum and substance of every true religion, pagan as well as Christian? You seem to object to my anxiety to prevent the young "from falling into that religious superstition which puts the cross higher than their moral duty as good citizens, and which teaches them to consider what the church sneeringly calls 'mere morality' as of little account in the sight of the deity whom they worship." Can it be that you would place church observances above your duty to the truth and to your fellow-men? Not so, gentlemen; the moral tone of the American Sentinel forbids even the suggestion of such a thing.

I did, however, recommend Freethought Sunday-schools for children, and Freethought lyceums for young people. But what does "Freethought" mean? Simply the right to freedom of thought—the right to seek truth wherever we can find it. Is that irreligious? So much the worse then for that sort of religion, I should say; and I think you would agree with me. In regard to the methods which I advocated, I was careful to advance them as my personal views, not as my official utterance, as you will see if you read my speech throughout; and in delivering these parts of my address I emphasized the personal pronoun. I took the liberty of advancing these more radical views of my own, because I knew that the majority of the delegates would expect me to outline work for the most ultra among us as well as for the most conservativ. Moreover, our people are different from yours. They are, many of them, impatient of working in harness; they can do their best as scouts, as guerrillas. That I, as secretary, should not take into consideration this class of our members, which comprises many of our most activ workers, would indeed hav been an official blunder. But, as for committing our society to any ism, even the ism of denouncing the church, which is the bulwark of the National Reformers, I hav never done so; nor, as far as I know, am I likely to do so while I remain secretary. Unofficially, I shall probably continue to protest against some dogmas which perhaps you and others believe in, as I do not intend to allow even our non-sectarian society to shut off my right of free speech. I trust, however, that I shall never be lacking in the parliamentary courtesy due to the opinions of those who differ with me. I trust that I shall always remain broad-minded enough to giv intellectual hospitality to every earnest seeker after truth, be he churchman or radical.

You are quite right in saying that the truth or falsity of the Christian religion has nothing to do with the question of separating church and state. Nevertheless, mankind has usually been swayed by likes and dislikes, rather than by simple justice. In the case of your own organization, while your paper firmly maintains its unsectarian stand, are not most of your people upheld in the struggles against persecution by a feeling of devotion to their Master? In our own organization, numbering among its membership so many Freethinkers, Atheists, and Individualists, can it be wondered that the impelling motiv of the majority should be one of hostility to a church which they blame for being a hindrance to progress? Moreover, as Mr. T. B. Wakeman said at our congress: "As long as our theological fellow-citizens will insist upon the infraction of secular government by forcing the Bible into our public schools, chaplains into public bodies, and the exemption of churches from taxation, certainly we are bound to inquire, what are their Bibles, their prayer, and their churches worth?" He also refers to the disadvantage under which we labor, in having to invite "those of extremely divergent views on every other topic except political secularization, to take part in our congresses held for that purpose," and he adds: "We must try to get over that difficulty by mutual intellectual and spiritual hospitality."

Although your organization and ours are working for the total separation of church and state from entirely different motivs, the object of our struggles is the same, and I trust that the day will come when we shall coöperate effectivly as allies, without any sacrifice by either of us of our impelling motivs.

We were glad to hav Prof. J. O. Corliss, of the National Religious Liberty Association, with us at the congress. His ringing speech hit the nail on the head, and pleased our people generally, even where they did not agree with him from a religious standpoint. I earnestly hope that your people will be represented at next year's congress also. Meanwhile, let us hold out a helping hand to one another in the good work wherever we can, even though we be not ready to become formal allies. And last, but not least, please remember that the officers of the American Secular Union, whatever their private or personal views, commit themselvs and the society officially to the promulgation of no ism whatever.

With best wishes for the success of the American Sentinel in its noble work, I am,

Yours very truly,
IDA C. CRADDOCK, Corr. Sec. A. S. U.

Victory of the Washington Secular Union.

In the case of Mr. Samuel Christopher, of Seattle, rearrested for keeping open a barber-shop, and shaving and cutting hair, on Sunday, and taken before the superior court, the Sunday fanatics retained the most able counsel they could procure. No expense was spared. Every effort was put forth to secure conviction. After argument on a demurrer entered by our counsel, Mr. Richard Winsor, the court decided that the demurrer was sustained; the superior court had no original jurisdiction in such cases, but they must be taken before a justice of the peace. The prisoner was discharged.

In the case of the clothing merchants, after long delays, the case of our member, Mr. Hershburgh, was made a test case before the jury in the justice's court. Col. Jas. H. Lewis and General Metcalf appeared for the defense. The jury promptly rendered a verdict of acquittal. All the prisoners were discharged.

Thus we gained victory for the Washington Secular Union, and complete defeat of the Sunday fanatics in their endeavor to enforce rigid Sunday observance by revival of territorial Sunday law that is in direct conflict with the state constitution, alike in letter and spirit.

As matters now stand, a police judge has decided that the word "trade" in the Sunday law statute does not apply to handicraft, mechanical labor, or ordinary lawful work or occupation, but to sale or barter of goods and merchandise. The superior court has decided it has no jurisdiction in such cases, but complaint must be made and proceedings had before a justice of the peace. In trials before a jury in the justice's court, here, as at Spokane Falls, the jury promptly acquit.

Thus our victory is complete and the fanatics are utterly routed. We should hav preferred that a case should hav been carried to the supreme court and decided, but we can well afford to rest content. Fanatics in some parts of the state may annoy by causing arrest for work or business done on Sunday, but all such arrests will inevitably result in prompt acquittal. Not many such persecutions will be attempted.

Thus justice will triumph. Those who think it wrong to keep places of business open on Sunday can carefully keep theirs closed. Those who think it wrong to buy and sell on Sunday can keep away from open stores. To the pretense that Christians are disturbed and cannot enjoy their religious worship on Sunday because some are quietly following business or amusement, we return that Jews, Seventh Day Adventists, and Seventh Day Baptists always worship on Saturday—the only true Sabbath of God, Christ, and the Bible—and this is the very busiest day of all the week, yet they find no difficulty in enjoying their worship.

The Washington Secular Union can now giv undivided attention to religious exercises in the public schools. There hav been many vexatious delays in getting a test case before the courts. No mandamus can be obtained until proof is furnished of the applicant for relief having made appeal to the school board and been refused. Our president, Mr. Richard Winsor, and I, hav attended school boards only to find no quorum, or a rush of business, so that we could not be heard. In this city, after several vain efforts, we thought we had secured a hearing, when some member's time expired, an election had to be held and a new board organized. We are hopeful of securing a hearing before the school board of this city on next Monday evening.

The annual congress of the Washington Secular Union, at which the election of officers for the ensuing year will be held, is appointed for Feb. 22, 1891, Washington's birthday, on account of January 29th being usually very disagreeable weather. All members will please take due notice and govern themselvs accordingly.

Sec. Washington Secular Union.

A Battle and a Victory at Montreal.

From Secular Thought.

The Montreal Pioneer Freethought Club, under the able and activ leadership of its president, Capt. Robert C. Adams, has had a great fight with the orthodox forces, and has gained a very decided victory. The melée arose out of the leasing by the Freethought Club of the Victoria Rifle Army Association's hall for a series of winter Sunday evening lectures. It is satisfactory to know that this lease was agreed to by the officers of the regiment, though they were fully aware of the opinions and intentions of the gentlemen at the head of the Freethought Club; but it shows how social convenances "rule the roast," and to what subterfuges liberal-minded men are reduced by present theological surroundings, when we find these gallant officers willing to put forward an excuse for their efforts to break the lease which, to say the least of it, is capable of being supplemented by a far more substantial and forcible one.

Colonel Henshaw of the Victorias, in giving his version of the affair tells us that "Gentlemen who occupy a high social position, Mr. H. R. Molson, Roswell Fisher Captain Adams, and others, went to Major Radiger and offered to lease the armory for Sunday lectures. As Major Radiger knew these gentlemen to be of the highest respectability individually, and without being conversant with their aims or objects (the italics are mine), he thought they would be good tenants, and the lease was drawn up. As soon as it was brought to my notice that the leasing of the armory for Freethought lectures was an unpopular move, and was likely to giv offense to many warm friends of the regiment, I at once set to work to cancel the lease if possible." The colonel's lawyer, however, told him that the lease could not be canceled without the consent of the Freethought Club; and as the latter insisted on its rights, the officers, although as they say, they could ill afford it, offered the club a sum equal to the rent it had agreed to pay ($400) in order to induce it to giv up the hall. This offer the club rejected. It was a matter of principle, not money-making.

The points to which I wish to draw attention in this explanation are: 1. That the colonel, in acknowledging the "individual respectability" of the Freethought gentlemen (a point it would be absurd of him to dispute), seems to imply that as a Freethought organization they were not respectable; and 2. That in order to excuse the officers for giving the lease, he professes to hav been unaware of the "aims and objects" of the Freethought Club. In regard to the second point, the letter of Captain Adams shows conclusivly (as on other grounds it might reasonably be concluded) that these objects were fully discussed before the lease was granted; and this carries us to a natural conclusion, in regard to the first point, that the officers were not only acquainted with the Freethought gentlemen and their opinions but knew and acknowledged the Freethought organization and objects to be respectable and unobjectionable also, even if they did not sympathize with them. What their real motivs were in acting as they hav done we may perhaps see further on; but in the mean time I will giv Captain Adams's letter to the Witness, which speaks for itself:

SIR: Your article on the question of the lease of the Victoria Rifles armory for Freethought lectures states that the lease was "inadvertently granted" and that "the officers did not know what the nature of the lectures would be." These statements are likely to convey the impression that the lease was obtained by subterfuge; and in justice to the Freethought Club I will ask you to allow me to state that the nature of the lectures was most fully explained to the official representativ of the Armory Association at the very commencement of the negotiations, and that two lectures were given before a lease was applied for. Full discussion of the principle of toleration took place, and we were assured then and since that the hall was available to any respectable body of people irrespectiv of their opinions. In all the subsequent discussion, the canceling of the lease was asked for merely on the ground of expediency, because some supporters, chiefly ladies, had refused to lend their aid to the bazar on account of this lease. The directors of the association are intelligent and Liberal gentlemen, who never would hav raised this question themselvs; and on behalf of the club I desire to say that we entertain kindly feelings toward them, and regret exceedingly that any action of ours should even indirectly cause the association any financial injury. We trust that this will not be the case; but that the bazar will prove a satisfactory success. To those who object to our use of the hall, we wish to say that its platform is open to any reputable minister or layman who desires to discuss the momentous questions of the day. Instead of sending anonymous letters and seeking to cancel business engagements, let these people hav the courage to oppose us openly and endeavor to prove to us that our opinions are false. ROBERT C. ADAMS,
President of the Montreal Pioneer Freethought Club.

Under the heading, "A Queer Dilemma," the editor of the Ottawa Evening Journal, on November 25th, gave an account of the affair which appears to contain the real facts:

The Freethought Club, which is composed of a limited number of apparently respectable people, appears to hav been allowed a peaceable lease of the Armory hall on Sunday evenings, until recently a project was set on foot for a grand bazar in aid of the battalion funds of the justly popular Vics. Preparations for the bazar were fully under way when, it is stated, some of the ladies who were taking a prominent part in them discovered that the armory was the scene weekly of the unhallowed orations of the Free thought Club. When this appalling fact was realized, these good ladies, we are informed, promptly intimated that unless the Sunday lease of the hall to the Freethinkers was canceled, they would withdraw their countenance from the bazar. Thus originated the trouble. As the defection under such circumstances of some of the ladies would hav surely caused a stampede of all connected with the bazar, the Vics were much alarmed. They approached the Freethought Club with the polite suggestion that the club should abandon its lease and get a Sunday hall elsewhere. The Freethought Club with equal politeness intimated its intention to stay where it was on Sundays. The Vics, we understand, finally offered a handsome consideration to the club ($400, it is said) to giv up the lease. But the Freethinkers, whose hair was being brushed up the wrong way in the press, probably felt that ten times that amount could not move them. So the matter stands, and what the ladies propose to do we hav not heard.

It will be seen that the ladies are the prime movers in the opposition to the Freethought Club; and that the orthodox sheep are led by a "belle," if not, like their four-footed namesakes, by a bell-wether.

The editor caustically continues:

The Freethinkers appear to be very inconsiderate. They are standing in the way of the success of a carefully planned, elaborate, gigantic nineteenth century scheme. We all know what these big bazars usually are. We hav all gambled at them; our dollars hav gone for "throws" for hand-painted monstrosities; we hav raffled for ghastly placques at ruinous expense; many of us hav smoked bad cigars at twenty-five cents apiece in alleged Turkish kiosks; others of us hav voted early and often, at the solicitation of sweet voices and sparkling eyes, at half a dollar a vote, for "the most popular citizen," generally somebody we cordially hate. Men who hav gone through these things, as delightful almost as the pleasures of Stanley in the African forests, must feel a special indignation at the idea of a mere gang of Freethinkers, who hav some crazy idea about going to their own kind of church on Sundays, standing in the way of the entire success of one of the biggest bazars ever projected in this country. We understand the Vics expect to make several thousand dollars at least out of their bazar. Imagin the colossal intimidation and ruthless extortion which such profit from a bazar of the usual character inculcates! The activ indignation of the good people who contemplate this intimidation and extortion, at the carelessness of the Vics in renting Sunday room to such people as Freethinkers, will, no doubt, meet the general approval of the thinking public

The "thinking public" may perhaps sympathize with the Vics in their possible loss of profits from their big money grab; but they can hardly refrain from condemning the bigotry of people who appear to be willing to "cut off their noses" to spite a society of honorable men whose only crime is that they are endeavoring to advocate views which seem to them necessary for the progress and well-being of society.

One of the funniest items in the whole business is that in which Colonel Henshaw tells us that "they certainly would not renew the lease, and they could giv the rent to the hospital or some charitable institution." If this does not "fetch" the orthodox ladies, they must be made of unusually stern stuff. But if, like Judas Iscariot's blood money, this Freethought rent is not respectable enough to mix with other current coin of the realm, why should the hospital or any other charitable institution be plagued with it? Why touch the filthy stuff at all? They cannot get out of letting the Freethinkers preach in the hall, but there is no necessity for defiling themselvs by taking money for it. I would suggest to them that they refuse to take the rent at all, and thus save themselvs from any further risk of contamination.

Helen H. Gardener on Our Courts of Justice.

Sunday, December 7th, the author of "Is This Your Son, My Lord?" delivered for the Brooklyn Philosophical Association a lecture on the subject, "A Day in Court." The large hall was filled to its utmost capacity with a very intelligent-looking audience, who with evident pleasure listened to Miss Gardener's narrativ. The lecture proved its author was in possession of powers of observation and reflection seldom found in the fair sex. But our readers are, or ought to be, acquainted with the lecturer's good qualities, which are so conspicuous in her "Men, Women, and Gods," and we will therefore turn our attention to the Sunday's lecture—which, by the way, some time ago appeared in one of our magazines, and hence makes an entering into all the particulars unnecessary.

The first point to which Miss Gardener directed the audience's attention was the lack of dignity in our court proceedings. Even when the question involved is one of life or death, there is nothing that indicates solemnity. The lawyers chaff, joke, poke one another in the ribs during the recess or when the jury is out, and, of course, the audience, most of whom either hav served their time or are youths from sixteen to eighteen years of age, naturally follow the example set by the lawyers.

The attorneys conducting the case seek all possible means to influence the jury's opinion. Misconstruction of sentences, twisting of words, etc., are excessivly used, and even by the attorney for the people. In fact, the question of guilt or no guilt is entirely a secondary matter; it is an intellectual contest, a matter of legal pride. The defendant is lost sight of in the attempt to satisfy personal vanity. It is not for this that the people elect a state attorney; he is there to see that legal justice is accorded. But does he? No. In the case in point he did his best to deprive the defendant of his life.

Among the twelve jury members, Miss Gardener stated, seven affirmed; yet this seemed not to attract any attention; a circumstance which, with the growing sentiment for abolition of capital punishment, seemed to indicate that a great moral and intellectual change had come over the country. And she thought that there possibly might be some connection between the increase in the number of men who refused to take the oath and the growing of altruistic sentiment.

With regard to the oath-taking, Miss Gardener said that only two prisoners kissed the Bible and both committed perjury. The others, none of whom could hav understood anything of the oath formula except the last sentence, lifted the Bible up to the neighborhood of their right ear. The way the oath was administered, very carelessly and hurriedly, was disgraceful, considering that both the person who administered the oath and those who took it at least professed a belief in the divine character of the Bible and the sacredness of the oath. In fact, the whole proceeding was a farce.

The lecturer likewise called attention to the off-hand way in which several police judges treated cases before them. There seemed to be a kind of mutual understanding, a chum-relationship, between judge and policeman, and the latter would frequently enter his complaint in an inaudible voice, thus leaving the prisoner entirely unacquainted with the charge against him, and of the nature of which he could judge only by the justice's "$10 or ten days," or whatever the sentence might be.

Miss Gardener received at the conclusion of the lecture well-merited applause. Several persons took the stand, and treated the audience to every conceivable subject except the ones discussed by the lecturer—spirits inside of man; ghosts, holy and otherwise, outside of man; temperance; hermeneutic philosophy, or an attempt at it at least; woman suffrage, brotherhood of man, and last but not least the fatherhood of God. It is surprising that people will get up on the platform of a Liberal club and advise us to seek refuge and comfort in the fatherhood of God. The gentleman overhead has been given six thousand years (Bible chronology) to show us the beneficial result of his paternal care and has made a fearful and wonderful failure, and we think it is about time to giv him a dishonorable discharge. The critic who gave this admirable advice, and who likewise spoke very softly of Jesus Christ as a Samaritan, said he came from a rural district. We do not doubt it, and we suppose a ministerial incubator, or theological seminary, is situated in that district. The speaker, who was very eloquent and fluent, should adopt the profession of a Methodist minister; he can command after a short time at least $3,000.

Before closing I take the liberty to attempt to do what the critics forgot to do—say a few words on the criminal question. I think that a partial solution of the question can be gained by a reformation in our prison system, and by treating the criminals in a manner different from the one now used. Our prisons ought not alone to be reformatories, which they are not now, but they ought to be conducted in a way which will make a prisoner wish himself anywhere but inside their walls. We must not baby a criminal. Giv him coarse but wholesome food, and work him for all he is worth, and let the proceeds of his labors, above the cost of his keeping, become his. While confined the individual must be taught ethics, secular morality. Inform him that he is not past redemption, that he is not depraved, and that upon him, and him alone, depends his salvation from social ostracism, from social death. Appeal to the prisoner's honor, to his or her self-respect, and if he or she is devoid of this, attempt to plant and cultivate the seed of it. Let a prisoner not know how long he is to be confined. Let the length of his time depend upon his conduct, and when he is released giv him a ticket to a distant part of the country, where he is known by no one, and let him there report his arrival to the police authority. Such persons as violate the law (criminal law) a second time, send them to a penal colony, where they may be kept under supervision and prohibited from propagating their kind. I believe these are the measures advocated by modern and true philanthropy. GUSTAVE NELSON.

Lectures and Meetings.

FRIDAY evening, December 12th, Miss Ada Campbell, the Australian lecturess, speaks at the Manhattan Liberal Club on "Heredity." At Philadelphia and Newark, where Miss Campbell has spoken, the people value her highly, both for the matter of her discourse and the manner of its deliverance. In dealing with her Christian critics she treats them tenderly, but slays them effectually. Dr. Eccles will do well to make funeral arrangements.

J. E. REMSBURG has delivered twenty-five lectures in California. He spoke at Colusa October 30th; Michigan Bluff, November 1st and 2d; Santa Rosa, 5th; Ukiah, 6th; San Francisco, 7th; San Miguel, 8th and 9th; Monterey, 10th; Merced, 12th; Snelling, 13th; Hornitos, 14th; Lemoore, 15th and 16th; Hanford, 17th and 18th; Tulare City, 19th; Los Angeles, 20th; Santa Ana, 21st; San Diego, 23d; Norwalk, 24th; San Bernardino, 25th and 26th.

JOHN R. CHARLESWORTH is a young Englishman, residing now in New York. He is a good speaker and ready debater, and appears to thoroughly understand Secular philosophy. Judging from his able address at the congress, he is inclined more to the destructiv than to the constructiv aspect of our movement. He was recommended by the congress as the lecturer and organizer of the Union, a position which no doubt he would admirably fill.—Secular Thought.

W. F. JAMIESON acknowledges the following loans toward paying the mortgage on his farm: Mrs. Portia Gage, Vineland, N. J., $100; J. S. Shepard, Vineland, N. J., $5; Elmina D. Slenker, Snowville, Va., $5; W. H. Burr, Washington, D. C., $10; Dr. E. B. Foote, Jr., New York city, $25; Dr. E. B. Foote, Sr., New York city, $25. Mr. Jamieson says: "I hav full confidence that my Liberal friends will help me save our home, and the words I receive, with these loans, cause me to rejoice in the word 'Liberal.' I am, therefore, sending these sums forward to cancel the debt of $750. As soon as paid, I can contract for the cultivation of my farm, which will only yield me $60, it is true, in 1891; but $220 in 1892. This will enable me to pay my interest on time."

A Review of the Church.—Concluded.

"The order," continues Dr. Wooley, "in which the planets are arranged in books on astrology (a discourse about the stars) is this: Saturn, Jupiter, Mars, the sun, Venus, Mercury, moon. The sun, because the largest and brightest, 'is placed in their midst,' says Clemens of Alexandria, 'to dispense light to those above him and to those below—to the superior and to the inferior—according to a certain divine harmony.' Thus it is found that theology and astrology are synonyms—the idea of God or good, which may be traced back through many languages to the Hebrew, never entering into the composition of either term."

Rev. R. Taylor says (D. Pulpit, page 30): "Our words God, and the sun, are really, the one a Hebrew, the other an old Coptic word; both signifying the same thing; but both alike adopted without being inquired into, and naturalized without being understood. God, or Gad, being the never-translated name, in the ancient Tsabaism, or star-worship, of the constellation of the Ram, or Lamb of God, as I hav explained to you, the Rama, the great, the elevated, that is, the first of the signs of the zodiac; that is, by metonymy of the sun, in that sign Aries, or Lamb of God (As the Latin word Aries, the Ram, was derived from the Egyptian word Arez, the sun; as that word is found compound with Dous, which is the same as Deus, God, the whole word signifying God—the sun; the same mentioned by Tertullian as Dysares, the God of all the Arabian nations.), whose astronomical name, Yes, is the root of our Jesus, the lamb of God, as our English words sun and day are found in the first primitivs, not of a particular language, but of the most ancient and universal ever uttered by man. San, pronounced zan, zon, son, and zun, that is, with every vowel and every mode of uttering the initial that the tongue could compass, like Gad, Gid, Ged, God, and Gud, was, like that word, the common Ammonian name for the sun, and Jupiter, as is witnessed by that old inscription, quoted by Bryant, on the tomb of Jupiter; who, like Herod, Hercules, Bacchus, Mithra, Apollo, Christna, Vishnu, and all the other allegorized types of the sun, 'was conceived by the Holy Ghost, born of the Virgin Mary, suffered under Pontius Pilate, was crucified, dead, and buried.' Here was buried the great sun, whom they call God. When the first attempt was made to represent the sun in pictorial hieroglyphics, a mere straight stroke, as a picture of the finger of the priest pointing to the sun, gave the letter I, or J if part of the hand be seen with it, while the circle of the sun's disk formed the O; and thus the radical of all languages, I O, running through the theology of all nations and of all ages, harder or softer in Ai-o (Ja-o), Za-o, Jahavah, Jehova, Jeve, Juve, Jove, all betray that the sun, and the sun alone, was the primordial signification of the terms for God and Jesus, and bring us to an absolute demonstration of the truth betrayed to us by the unguarded father Tertullian, that many think that the sun is our God, and refer to the religion of the Persians (Apologet., chap. xvi), and to the still more explicit acknowledgment in Heb. xii, 29: 'Our God is a consuming fire.'"

From Inman's "Pagan and Modern Christian Symbolism," page 19: "In examining ancient Jewish, Phœnician, and other Shemitic cognomens, I found that they consisted of a divine name and some attribute of the deity, and that the last was generally referrible equally to the Supreme, to the sun, as a God, and the masculin emblem. If the deity was a female the name of her votary contained a reference to the moon and the beauties or functions of women. The higher ideas of the creator were held only by a few; the many adopted a lower and more debased view. In this manner the sun became a chief God, and the moon his partner; and the former being supposed to be male and the latter female, both became associated with the ideas which all hav of terrestrial animals. Consequently the solar deity was associated in symbolism with masculin and the moon with feminin emblems." On page 57: "In Hindoostan, the sun is always represented as a God." Again, on page 111: "Sun-worship was spread all over the ancient world. It mingled with other faiths and assumed many forms. We may point out that according to all the gospels, Christ expired toward sunset, and the sun became eclipsed as he was dying. He rose again exactly at daybreak." Again, page 113: "The sun, being the activ fructifying cause in nature, was generally regarded as male. Thus in the Jewish scriptures he is compared to a 'bridegroom coming out of his chamber' (Ps. xix, 5)."

From "Ancient History of the East," page 197: "The sun was the source as well as the sign of life, the vivifier of the world, the universal father, and, as it shines in the firmament above, superior to all other lights of heaven, it is the universal lord."

I quote from "History of the Sabbath," page 257: "Constantine was a worshiper of Apollo or the sun, a fact that sheds much light on his edict enjoining men to observe the venerable day of the Sun." Thus Gibbon testifies: "The devotion of Constantine was more peculiarly directed to the genius of the sun, the Apollo of the Greek and Roman mythology; and he was pleased to be represented with the symbols of the god of light and poetry. . . . The altars of Apollo were crowned with the votiv offerings of Constantine; and the credulous multitudes were taught to believe that the emperor was permitted to behold with mortal eyes the visible majesty of their tutelar deity. . . . The sun was universally celebrated as the invincible guide and protector of Constantine" (Decline and Fall of the Roman Empire, chap. xx).

The council of Constantine, 381, elected the Holy Ghost as an orthodox dogma of the church. The council of Chalcedon, 451, asserted the Catholic doctrin of two distinct natures in one person united in Christ, without any change, mixture, or confusion. A council in Constantinople, 553, reviewed the doings of the preceding councils and their decrees were fully acknowledged. At another council at Constantinople, 680, the creed which teaches that two wills and two operations were existent in Jesus Christ, was finally determined. At the council of Constantinople, 692, the feast of the annunciation of the Virgin Mary was instituted. Also, this council prohibited the representation of Christ on the cross under the symbol of a lamb. Also in regard to this council, I quote from "Astro-Theology:" "The cross has been an emblem of the church ever since its organization, and the form on the cross was that of a lamb. But in the year 680 of our era, under the reign of Constantine Paganatus, in the sixth Constantinopolitan council, held under Pope Agathus, in the eighty-second decree of that council, it was decreed, and the decree subsequently ratified by Pope Adrian I., that instead of Christ's being represented in the form of a crucified lamb, which had up to that time been the only emblem of the crucifixion, he should be represented in the form of a crucified man." In explanation of why a lamb was used on the cross I continue to quote from "Astro-Theology:" "After passing through the zodiacal sign, the sun goes into the sign Aries, the Ram. The Latin word Aries, the Ram, was derived from the Egyptian word Arez, the sun, and 1890 years ago, about the time Christ was said to hav been born, after passing nearly through the sign, it crossed the equinoctial line and spring began. With the showers attendant on the sun crossing the line, and the stronger heat of the sun on account of its greater ascendency in the heavens, and on account of which the days were of greater length, vegetation began to spring up and grow and seed-time came giving promis of harvests that would save the people from starvation; hence the sun on crossing the line in the spring or vernal equinox was hailed by the people as the savior of the world, and was called the lamb of God for the salvation of the world because it was in the sign of the Lamb that vegetation sprang up into newness of life, with the hope of future plenty and happiness, after having passed through long fasting and prayer in the wilderness of winter when much of the crops and provisions of the past season had been consumed. This zodiacal Lamb was called the head of the church; and if anyone will look at the zodiacal signs in any almanac, it will be seen that the sign Aries represents the head. The zodiacal signs represented the twelve tribes of Israel, and the Lamb represented the tribe of Gad, so the lamb of Gad, or easily written God, became very appropriately a scriptural phrase or name." Josephus's "Antiquities" states that the signs of the zodiac, with the names of the twelve tribes, were engraved on the stones in the breastplate of the high priest. "Also, the signs of the zodiac are in use in the churches of the present day, and are to be seen on the flat, painted roof of Waltham Abbey church, and also in the restored tesselated pavement in the Lady chapel of Chichester cathedral in England" (Frank Leslie's Sunday Magazine, April, 1877, page 511).

The Nicene fathers in 787 decided the doctrin of transubstantiation in the eucharist, in which was not the image of Christ, but his very body and blood. The council of Constantinople, 879, approved, confirmed, and renewed the Nicene decrees. In the ninth century the procession of the Holy Spirit from the father and son was added to the creed. The fourth council of Lateran passed a decree in 1215 obliging the faithful to confess their sins at least once a year. The council of Lyons, 1274, decreed the procession of the Holy Ghost from the father and the son. The council of Lateran, 1513, decreed that the immortality of the soul be an article of faith. Previous to this time immortality was not universally believed in by the church. The council of Trent, 1545, not only decided the canon of the Bible as before spoken of, but it passed decrees on the fall of man, justification, and the dogma of the eucharist; defined the sacraments; settled the communion under one or two kinds; also gave enunciations on indulgences, purgatory, invocation and veneration of saints and the respect to be paid to their relics and images, etc. The council of Rome, convoked by Pope Pius IX. in 1869, decreed in July, 1870, the personal infallibility of the pope in matters of faith and morals to be a dogma of the church.

This, the last grand, or ecumenical, council of the Catholic church, is of such recent date that the present generation is conversant with it and its style of proceedings, and as a consequence those outside of the Catholic church do not accept its dictum as to the infallibility of the pope. And here is where a great inconsistency occurs, for there is nothing in Protestant countries on which to base any Christian doctrin or dogma other than has been given by the Catholic church through its various councils, and if the infallibility of the pope is rejected, then must the divinity of Christ, the canon of the Bible, and the various other doctrins and dogmas promulgated by the Catholic church through its various councils be rejected, for no one can say that the Catholic church has not now as much power and right to enact and decree doctrins and dogmas as it ever had. Then if the divinity of Christ is accepted the infallibility of the pope must be accepted also. Cardinal Gibbons says: "The course pursued by the church regarding the infallibility of the pope was practiced by her in reference to the divinity of Jesus Christ, which was formally defined at the council of Nicea in the fourth century" (The Faith of Our Fathers, page 151).

It will be seen by this review that the principal things that go to make up the church, such as the divinity of Christ, the canonicity of the Bible, and the various doctrins and dogmas, etc., all rest on the votes of priests in the councils of the Catholic church, some voted on separately and then collectivly, as in voting certain books of the Bible to be canonical. In this latter way I may say God, heaven, hell, etc., were elected to office and location respectivly, for in voting a book to be canonical all the characters, places, and conditions described in that book are elected to office, etc., and imbued with the same sanctity as is elected to the book.

But the question to be considered is, Do the votes of priests imbue the characters and books voted on with divinity and sanctity? I think no one of unbiased mind will admit that the votes of anyone, whether priest or not, can imbue any character or book with any sanctity whatever. No votes of priests could make Christ divine, whether living or dead, and it was useless to elect divinity to him three hundred years after he was dead. No votes of priests or others can make immortality a fact. We can go with our friends to the line that divides the living from the dead, but as to what is beyond that line no one knows. No one can know. No reasoning, no analogy, no anything, can reach beyond the dead line. All beyond is a mystery, which can only be solved by each one entering for himself, and then if he knows anything he will know for himself. But so far as we know he cannot impart any information to the living. The same is true of all characters, places, conditions, doctrins, and dogmas, as those last cited which hav been passed on by the councils of the Catholic church, which could not elevate anything to a position of sanctity unless it had sanctity inherent in itself. It is futil for the church to rant and roar, to issue bulls or decrees, thinking to control or govern the people, when the people understand its style of proceedings and its lack of authority or power to enforce or make good what it elects or teaches. The enlightenment of the age, with liberty of thought, speech, and investigation, will dispel the mists and fogs that hav been and still are being cast over the doings of the church in its own councils. The strength of the church lies in the ignorance of the people, and in matters regarding the church that institution is trying to keep them in ignorance. But when the people become enlightened as to the foundations on which the church rests, then in proportion as that enlightenment increases will that establishment decline.

To epitomize: 1. The church is intolerant. 2. The church is not based on the Bible, but the church made the Bible, consequently the Bible is not an inspired book. 3. The Bible has been open to the public only 345 years. 4. The God of the Bible and of the church is the sun, and is worshiped on Sunday. 5. The existence of such a person as Christ is very doubtful. 6. The divinity of Christ rests on the votes of priests in council, which is not good authority for divinity, consequently he was not divine. 7. All the doctrins and dogmas of the church rest on the votes of priests, consequently they hav not a foundation. Conclusion: When the people become enlightened in regard to the church and its assumptions, the church will decline.

I close with a quotation from John Wesley, the founder of Methodism, from a letter on the trial of Hetherington for blasphemy, court of queen's bench, Dec. 8, 1840, Winchester, England ("Eye Opener," page 167): "Another cause that will operate more powerfully and effectually than any of the preceding is the rays of philosophy, which begin now to pervade all ranks, rapidly dispelling the mists of ignorance, which hav been long, in a great degree, the mother of devotion, of slavish prejudice, and the enthusiastic bigotry of religious opinion. The decline of the papal power is owing to the same irresistible cause; nor can it be supposed that Methodism can stand the ground when brought to the test of truth, reason, and philosophy." L. L. DAWSON.

MY UNCLE BENJAMIN. By Claude Tillier. Translated from the French by B. R. Tucker. Price, $1.

This book is alleged to be a humorous, satirical, and philosophical novel, and Mr. Tucker in his preface says of it that it "has no equivalent in the literature of this century." Certainly in unearthing the work of an obscure French genius Mr. Tucker has found a very amusing book, and one with a half or whole truth underlying its every satire and pessimistic utterance. No class of people escapes its shafts of ridicule, and the book makes it apparent that each class deserves all it gets. There is enough of the novel about it to lead the reader along, but the meat of the book can only be found by going over it slowly, and then reading it again. And it will pay for the trouble in fun and philosophy, though its social cynicism—essentially French and not at all healthy—should not be taken too seriously.

LIFE. A Novel. By William W. Wheeler. Paper, 50 cents.

Another story with a moral, or an endeavor to make people read curious ideas by tangling them up with a love story. A man goes into a cataleptic state; people suppose him dead; his sister denies it, and refuses to bury him; the townspeople intend to arrest her as insane; a friend legally marries her so they can't, though the marriage is of convenience and not for keeps; a doctor is called—he cannot resuscitate the patient by any physical means—tries hypnotism—succeeds. Then the doctor and the patient and the friend discuss hypnotism, Spiritualism, Agnosticism, Christianity. Two more girls appear on the scene—church-members, and the three pair off, get jealous, make love; two pairs get married—the third girl sticks to her church and Bible and denounces the heretics. The book is pleasant to read, has a great many unprovable and preposterous theories, makes for Spiritualism and against the church, and will be liked best by Infidel Spiritualists who are not particular as to the plots and finish of their novels. The author is evidently a fair-minded man, but not trained in scientific methods of proving deductions or theorizing from proven inductions.

RELIGION OF MAN AND ETHICS OF SCIENCE. By Hudson Tuttle. M. L. Holbrook, publisher; price, $1.50.

Mr. Tuttle sums up the results of religious postulates and resulting dependent propositions as "superstition, a priesthood, bigotry, persecution, suppression of knowledge, and the arrogance of infallibility." On the other hand he finds the results from the postulate of science to be "man, not God, the divine center, nobility of life, highest ideal aspiration for perfection, calm reliance in the presence of universal and omnipotent forces, all-embracing charity and philanthropy, earnest endeavor to actualize the ideal perfect life rendered possible by his organization in this world, as the best preparation for the next; and for the Religion of Pain, the substitution of the Religion of Joy." The gist of the work is, leaving aside the enigmatical "divine center," that the past has been the age of foolishness, especially in religions, but that the future will see more wisdom shown in this as in all other regards. The book goes over about all the ground from the beginning to the end of things, and finally lands man in an earthly paradise and a spiritual heaven when he is through with the paradise. A good idea of the volume can be obtained from its chapter headings: PART I.—The Religion of Man: What is Religion? Fetichism; Phallic Worship; Man's Moral Progress Dependent on his Intellectual Growth; The Great Theological Problems—the Origin of Evil, the Nature of God, and the Future State; Man's Fall, and the Christian Scheme for his Redemption; Man's Position—Fate, Free Will, Free Agency, Necessity, Responsibility; Duties and Obligations of Man to God and to Himself. PART II.—The Ethics of Science: The Individual; The Genesis and Evolution of Spirit; The Law of Moral Government; The Appetites; Selfish Propensities; Love; Wisdom; Wisdom—the Will; Charter of Rights; Duties and Obligations of the Individual; Duty and Obligations of Society; Rights of Government; Duties of Society to Criminals; the Duty of Self-Culture; Marriage.

Mr. Tuttle is a brilliant but not an original or accurate writer. This book goes over the ground of his own "Career of Religious Ideas," "Origin and Development of Man," Bierbower's "Ethics," and Professor Oswald's "Bible of Nature," and is not always a good parallel to them even in those matters of morals and fact commonly regarded as settled. This may not be the author's fault, for anyone hampered with a God to reconcile with actual things and a varied assortment of supernatural theories like reincarnation, must of necessity depart from strict scientific methods, and assume a good deal that he can hav no hope of proving. Mr. Tuttle knows how to do this brilliantly and attractivly, but a good portion of his book is only words, words, words. The best chapters are those in which he deals with religion, and they are worth the price of the book.

Mr. H. L. Green has obtained permission to print in pamphlet form Colonel Ingersoll's Arena article on "God in the Constitution," and it can now be had for 10 cents. It should be circulated by the million copies for the good it will do aside from the pleasure Freethinkers will find in perusing it.

Those who like Mr. John Prescott Guild's vigorous condemnations of all ideas dissimilar to his own should send him, at Tyngsboro, Mass., 10 cents for his Grand Army address on "The Flag We Float." Mr. Guild never lets his reader go to sleep, though he occasionally arouses angry passions.

Monists, if there be any such people, will, we presume, find the quarterly magazine, the Monist, established by the Open Court Publishing Co., a valuable production. Everyday folks, just ordinarily interested in science and the various new theories and discoveries therein, will also be pleased with it. Since the establishment of the quarterly the Open Court has been reduced in size, and one must now subscribe for both to get what he formerly obtained in one. Price of the Monist, 50 cents single copy; $2 per year.

Until the TRUTH SEEKER ANNUAL AND FREETHINKER'S ALMANAC for 1891 is issued the two best annuals for next year are the "Freidenker Almanac," published in German by the Freidenker Company at Milwaukee, Wis., and the "National Secular Society's Almanac for 1891," edited by G. W. Foote and J. M. Wheeler, and published by Robert Forder, London. This last book contains articles by C. Bradlaugh, Messrs. Foote, Moss, Wheeler, Forder, Standring, and others, with much information useful to Englishmen, and a calendar useful to all Freethinkers. There are quite a number of mistakes regarding American Freethinkers, but not nearly so many as are usually found in English periodicals about America in general, and not more probably than we should make if we wrote about England without consulting our English friends, of whom happily we hav a good supply over here. But, on the whole, the publication has suffered none from the change of officers of the Society, and has, we think, improved in some details. We shall transfer some of its information to our own publication, which will be on sale about at the close of the year. The price of the almanac is 25 cents. The "Freidenker's Almanac" is of course useful only to those who read German, but to such it will be found vastly entertaining, as its corps of contributors is extensiv and able and the editor has gathered much good poetry and statistical knowledge to fill its pages. An article interesting to Wisconsin Germans is "School, State, and Church," by Hermann Boppe. Other contributors known to our readers are Hugo Andriessen, F. Schumann-Pott, and Dr. Paul Carus. The price of the almanac is 25 cents.

During the past year the Humboldt Library has been increased from number 121 to 134, and nearly all of the added numbers are books which Freethinkers desire to possess. Especially is this true of No. 121—J. S. Mill's "Utilitarianism," reprinted from the ninth London edition of that work. Utilitarianism as a basis for morals, or acts which affect others, has never been so thoroughly studied by the people of this country as by those of England, and this reprint opens the way for all, as the price is only 15 cents. Another volume which students of enlightened and progressiv politics will want to read, whether they agree with the authors or not, is No. 125—"Darwinism and Politics" and "Administrativ Nihilism," by Professor Huxley, price 15 cents. No. 124 is "Quintessence of Socialism," by Professor A. Schäffle, which appeals to the same class, and is printed at the same price. Professor Toynbee's Popular Addresses, Notes, and other Fragments, on "The Industrial Revolution of the Eighteenth Century," are printed in two double parts, price 60 cents. "The Law of Private Right," by George H. Smith, is also a double number; price 30 cents. Mr. Smith holds the opinion that the law of private right as administered in this country is fundamentally erroneous, owing to inaccurate text-books and loose judicial decisions. Books that are for students of science in her various branches are "Physiognomy and Expression," by Senator Paolo Mantegazza, director of the National Museum of Anthropology at France, in two parts, 60 cents; "Upon the Origin of Alpine and Italian Lakes; and Upon Glacial Erosion," by several noted English, Swiss, and American geologists—in two parts price 45 cents; "The Origin of the Organs," by Dr. Isaac Taylor, also in two double-number parts, price 60 cents; and "The Evolution of Sex," by Professors Geddes and Thomson—two double-number parts, price 60 cents. Purchasing these volumes is absolutely the cheapest method of keeping up with scientific discoveries of the day, and the price certainly places them within the reach of all. They may be ordered from this office, as may all the books noticed in these columns.

When Helen Gardener fights what she calls social or religious outrages, she does not nip around the edges and leave the root as vigorous as ever, she says, but slashes away into the center of the evil and splashes blood all around. Her book, "Is This Your Son, My Lord?" seems to be one of these slashing splashes. People who hav worked themselvs into the belief that woman is a poor, hunted creature whose chief object in life is to keep out of the reach of man, and that man's whole thought for woman is to make her his domestic slave and sexual plaything, will like this book. Others won't. The same criticism lies against it that lies against Tolstoi's "Kreutzer Sonata"—it is the work of prejudice and one-sided education. In Tolstoi's book, the author is plainly under the influence of his religion, and he draws a portrait of the race which is hideous and unlike. Helen Gardener has written apparently under the influence of the "Alphaites" and the "Dianaites," and other hysterical people who somehow think, and claim to hav evidence to back up their thought, that woman is a ravaged class and a victim of man, who is always vile. If one-half be true that the two "ites" mentioned claim, there ought to be another war for the emancipation of a sex.

The tendency of the times is toward the odd, not to say the erotic, in literature, and as the author of this book is a literary person as well as a reformer, it is not impossible that the opening chapter of this book—which, if Helen Gardener had not written it, we should call offensiv—was not without a purpose other than that of the surgeon cutting deep in order to heal. Be this as it may, it seems to us that she could safely hav let some of the suggestions remain between the covers of holy writ. But this is not the most serious fault of the book. She has drawn a portrait of man, in delineating one of her characters—the heavy villain—that she will find difficulty in duplicating in real life, and yet she must duplicate him or the "moral" of the novel falls to the ground. And on a premis which we do not think exists she has made man out to be a brute. This, no doubt, is due to the influence of those views of life which it is Lucifer's purpose to promulgate. The conversations by which man is thus revealed are unnatural and artificial. Read this: Mr. Mansfield's son has been guilty of an unmanly vice; a doctor, who is telling the story, informs his father, and that amiable individual suggests that the boy be taken to New York. He says to the physician:

"Close up your office for a few weeks and take the boy off on a lark. Paint things red. Go to New York. See the elephant. Oh, you'll know how to pick out a good dove, hang it! You understand."

"But I do not understand, Mr. Mansfield."

He sat down opposit, crossed his legs, drew his eyes to a long narrow line, and looked through the slit at me for a moment, with infinit disgust. Then he said slowly:

"What is the use for you to pretend not to know what I want of you in this case? You are no fool. You've lived long enough to know that men are all alike. What makes me mad is that the little idiot, that boy, has come near ruining his health and mind just for the need of some good, solid advice and a chance. Now I don't care to take him on his first round with the doves. He'd be—well, I suppose I might be a sort of a restraint on the little donkey; and if he goes by himself—well, you know, he'd most likely get into trouble. He'd fall into the hands of some low woman, who'd bleed him, or worse. Now if you go with him, you can arrange for him to meet a charmer—one that is as green as he is, don't you see—and if he took a sort of romantic fancy to her, all the better, for a while." He stopped to take breath.

"And then," I asked, "when the romantic fancy is over?"

"What do you mean?" he replied in astonishment.

"What is to become of the girl after you hav made an outcast of her, and of your son after you hav made a libertin of him?" I began, but he broke in impatiently:

"Oh, plague take the girl! What do I care what becomes of her? 'Becomes of her?' What always becomes of 'em? They can look out for themselvs. Libertin? I don't care how much of a libertin Pres. is; but what I won't stand—what makes me mad—is for him to be a blamed little fool:" and Mr. Mansfield took up his hat, strode out of my office, and slammed the door viciously behind him.

Now, if men generally hold such sentiments as this heavy villain expresses, then this book is timely and has a place in literature. If men do not, then the basing of a sermon in novel form on such a text is a libel on the masculin sex. But as if that were not enough, in another chapter are added two rapes—the description of which we cannot print—a deserted blackmailing woman, two illegitimate children, all in the regular course, as if they were the most common occurrences in the world, and one of the characters does his sex the honor to talk like this about men and women:

"I try to protect my sisters from other fellows; other fellows are trying to shield theirs from each other. If it were a manly desire, honestly felt, to protect the helpless and innocent or inexperienced; if it were from a sense of fairness; if it were innate honor; if it were because we believe that we hav no right to allow the ruin of the life of another being whom it is in our power to shield, why, don't you see, doctor, we wouldn't hav to watch each other at all? Our sisters would all be safe; because every man would do his level best to see that every girl had a fair chance to grow up and make her own choice of her own life when she was old enough to understand; but you know that it isn't so. You know that nine-tenths of the girls that go wrong are tricked or bullied into it, in the first place, by some scoundrel who knows perfectly well what he is about. What does he care for her ruined life? What does he care for justice or honor toward the helpless? She isn't his sister. It won't react on him if she is disgraced. I tell you, doctor, men are a bad lot. You know perfectly well that there is a tacit understanding among them not to giv each other away. They all watch women and shield each other. They don't even want a woman to tell the truth in books. They pretend the conditions do not exist, that women are morbid and erotic. I don't believe that they know the meaning of unselfishness. Every act of their lives is for themselvs. They howl about wanting their families to be happy; but it is all because it would be less comfortable for themselvs if they were not."

These views are the basis of the book, and the evils to which they naturally lead are the roots Miss Gardener is cutting at. It seems to us that she is wasting much effort. The roots are not there.

From the foregoing it will be seen that Miss Gardener's attempt to paint the lives of men is not regarded by us as a great success. The reason is not that she has not the skill to say what she means, but that she is writing of something of which apparently she knows almost nothing. The jokes in the papers about women are all written by men. As psychological studies of the female sex they show great stupidity, and a man who should form his opinion of women from them would get left in practical dealing with them. So with the lessons of Miss Gardener's book. Female readers of inexperience are warned that men are a great deal better than she paints them—or rather, a great deal less rascally. Like the brutes Lucifer rakes up from the muck of humanity, Miss Gardener's villains are so exceptional that they horrify even though existing only in the imagination, and if she could only make them flesh and blood men she would hav a right to write such a work.

Now for Miss Gardener's side of the story. "Is This Your Son, My Lord?" is written for a purpose, which is, to quote from the advertisment, "to expose the respectable frauds, the hypocrisies, and the essential rottenness of society," and therefore its literary finish and value as a product of the novelist's art are of secondary consideration. The main idea is to reform the men. The characters represented are types of good, bad, and mixed men. "Fred Harmon, the conventional, fashionable, polished hypocrit, the product of a false civilization, a blighting curse to all who come within the compass of his influence; 'an echo of an echo,' and something far worse. Preston Mansfield, naturally high-minded, with manly impulses, possessing the foundation of a worthy if not a brilliant manhood, swept by outside influences into the vortex of vice until, sweeping others with himself, he meets a tragic fate. Harvey Ball, noble, frank, outspoken, real, a man who makes one renew his faith in mankind; a type of the honest-hearted, fearless investigator, in error in some of his views as we think, but it is the error of an honest soul who would follow a truth wherever she may lead him, and such error is not to be feared. Such are the types which appeal most strongly to the parental reader." Thus the advertisment. Then we hav Mrs. Harmon, fit mother to Fred; a practical man with a Maudie-girl daughter who finally marries the good Agnostic young man—in the real conventional Elmina-stabbed-the-count style; and a few other character pegs upon which to hang moral garments. The story is kept along in a skillful manner to interest the reader, though in one or two places the transition from action to narrativ is too abrupt, and there are some lines which George Eliot would hav omitted. But everybody will, we think, be glad to hav and read the book, because it has a lot of good heresy in it, and because Helen, beloved of all, wrote it. Besides these reasons, a great many think it superior to any of her previous books—though how it can be compared with "Men, Women, and Gods," is not very plain! Mr. Chamberlain last week praised it highly—but then he is a student of Alphaism—and now Captain Adams, president of the Canadian Secular Union, says of it: "The best book of the age. The only writer who has had the skill to do what only a very few hav dared to try to do—compose a well-constructed story expressing honest opinions to the full and speaking what everybody is thinking of and nobody thinks it polite to mention. It delights me to find the things that I am constantly thinking and saying blurted out so boldly and with such exquisit wit and simile that the old ideas hav the charm of new acquaintances." It is evident that Captain Adams, like the other critics of the race, is "up" in the race's vicious ways. We wonder why. And there are others who think as Captain Adams does. The Woman's Tribune says "It is a novel which has to do with the moral understratum of fashionable life, whose evils and sham it mercilessly exposes. The first pages giv a glimpse into that black pit of moral iniquity from which, covered over by the garlands of fashionable religion and conventionality, there yet rise the noxious vapors that poison the whole social atmosphere. If one can hav confidence enough in Miss Gardener's purpose, as all can who know the sincerity, purity, and courage of her writings, to trust her through the opening chapters, one finds that in this sad story of human experience, duplicated daily in the large cities and aped in the smaller, the most profound lessons are taught. It is an elaboration in fiction of the profound scripture, 'There is a way that seemeth right unto a man, but the end thereof is death.' Still it is always the novel and never the homily. It is scientific in its methods and disdains to appeal to any emotion or sentiment to enforce its high code of honor for men and genuinness for society. Every page breathes sincerity and high purpose." This being the case we suppose all our readers will send $1 for a copy in cloth, or 50 cents for the paper-covered edition.

What They Say About the Picture Book.

Pomeroy's Advance Thought.

Brick Pomeroy is a strong Prohibitionist, and we do not quite understand how he came to write the following; but it goes:

"The Truth Seeker Company, New York city, has lately issued a very curious curiosity book of religious pictures, by Watson Heston, from the characters mentioned in the Bible. These pictures do not disturb the ocean of spirituality that the Bible points to, but they bring out a number of characters mentioned in the biblical narrativ (Bible signifying a book of narrations), according to the character each possessed, judging from the narration as printed. The book contains about two hundred pictures. Price for the large volume, $2. Many of the pictures are very forcible, and are worthy of very serious thought. The first shows Uncle Sam attacked by pests that come swarming from Ireland and European slums. They are represented as bugs and flying vermin, labeled, Pinkerton Thug, Anarchist, Sunday Bores, House Chaplain, Army Chaplain, Whisky Blow Fly, The Pope's Irish, Postal Regulations, God-in-the-state, etc.

"Some of the pictures are lacking in sense and born only of prejudice, while others are bright as day. The one showing Uncle Sam and Education as struggling in the embrace of serpents called Sectarianism and Priestcraft is not correct. The serpents should be named Usury and Monopoly. Many of the pictures offend without pointing to a betterment, while others are strongly and usefully suggestiv. The idea that nearly two thousand millions of dollars' worth of church property is entirely exempt from taxation, and, when sold, goes into the pockets of the survivors of church organization, is worthy of general thought and attention. The pictures representing the demand that no work shall be done on Sunday, are far-fetched and not true to the letter or spirit of the legal law or public sentiment. The picture, The Atonement Doctrin, is very forcible and about right. Clamor of the Creeds is one of the best of the series. Janus-faced Credalists is also a correct satire on all who oppose Mormonism, or rather polygamous marriages. The book is full of food for thought—and thinking is what a large portion of those who profess religion entirely forget. It contains nearly 400 pages, and 185 full-page illustrations. It is 12x9 inches; bound in boards and sent for $2. Truth Seeker Company, 28 Lafayette place, New York city.

Professional Messiahs.

The papers are now telling interesting stories about Johnson Sides, the Indian messiah. Captain York, on a visit to this town from Nevada City, knows the dusky anointed well, and relates this anecdote to show that he is not less eccentric than other mediators between heaven and earth. "I remember," said the captain to a World reporter, "that about four years ago Johnson Sides became imbued with a strong desire to Christianize and educate the members of his tribe, and to that end made a battle for a school-house. A dug-out or a log-cabin would not do. He had to hav a school-house properly framed and built. He was then near Virginia City, and it was on the outskirts of the city he wanted to build the school-house. He had no money and the tribe was poor. Neither did he hav credit, but he determined to hav the school at any cost. So he laid his plans, and soon the lumber dealers began to miss scantling, timbers, and boards, and carpenters had their tools stolen. No one could detect the thief or thieves, and the matter was a mystery until one day a lumber dealer in riding across country happened onto Johnson Sides's school-house. He examined the marks on the rough timber and recognized it as having been stolen from him, and he returned to the city to tell the other dealers of his find. They went to the scene and found the schoolhouse well on toward completion, and near it enough lumber to finish the building. The dealers compelled Johnson Sides to return all the stuff, and then in disgust he exclaimed, 'Huh! Christians make Jesus pay one bit one foot for him cross.'"

Such eccentric disregard of the difference between meum and teum is not peculiar to this alleged messiah alone. We recollect of another son of God, mentioned in sacred mythology, who broke the Sabbath by going through a cornfield, plucking ears of corn to eat, and who when he wanted to journey to a city, hopped upon the first donkey he found feeding by the roadside.

The National Reformers.

And now the National Reformers, the God-in-the-Constitution folk, are angry at President Harrison for not recognizing Jesus Christ in his recent Thanksgiving proclamation. The Presbyterian Journal sorrowfully explains:

"The political entanglements are such that not a few even of our best men do not hold them, or are trammeled in acting up to them; even our Presbyterian elder president refused, though specially asked, to recognize Christ in his Thanksgiving proclamation."

But the Rev. D. W. Carson, in the United Presbyterian, waxes angry in earnest, and thus berates Elder Harrison:

"Only think of it. The president of this Christian nation, himself a member and an officer in the church of Christ, professing to direct us how to obtain a gracious acceptance of our praise, recommends us to go to work and endeavor to merit it by remembering the poor! Does he think that we hav forgotten the story of Cain and Abel and their respectiv offerings, in the very beginning of our history as a race, with its primary lesson on this very subject in which he offers to be our teacher? Or does he expect us, standing in the full noonday light of a complete revelation, to try to please God by spitting in the face of the beloved, his and ours? Merit, indeed! What a time was this, when the story of Calvary is being told in all the Sabbath-schools of the land, diffusing its sweet-smelling odor, which has already filled heaven with its fragrance, all around us! What a time was this to ask us to perfume our thank-offerings to God with such merit as we can distill from our paltry, contemptible gifts to the poor!"

It's really too bad! but when one reads these rebukes to our chief executiv, he is moved to ask, what do these folks want? If Harrison is not pious enough for them, where will they find a man, outside of their own fanatical ranks, who is? Christ himself would never hav suited them.

Mr. Wanamaker—Holy John!—is also belabored by his fellow-fanatics, for permitting any Sunday mail service at all, and he is held up as a fitting object for disciplinary treatment. The Rev. Mr. George, of Beaver Falls, addressed the Sabbath Association of Western Pennsylvania recently, and said of Mr. Wanamaker:

"We all know that the Sunday newspaper is a great evil, and that its publishers and those who sell it, as well as those who advertise in it, are in many cases prominently identified with church work. Such persons should be subjected to the most rigid church disciplin. But let us not overlook an evil which, to my mind, is far more gigantic than the Sunday newspaper. I refer to the United States mail service, which is carried on openly on the Sabbath. At the head of this service is a man who has long been identified with church work, as the teacher of a Bible class, and who is looked upon as a conscientious and consistent Christian; yet this man, an elder or deacon in a Presbyterian church, lends his official indorsement to a most flagrant violation of the laws of God and man. Let the church begin by subjecting this man to disciplin. Let the members of his church or his pastor go to him, and tell him he will either hav to withdraw from the church whose sacramental vows he is clearly breaking, or issue a proclamation putting a stop to work in the government mail service on the Sabbath. Mr. Wanamaker knows he is not acting consistently; as a Presbyterian elder, he cannot help knowing it."

In the Christian Statesman of last week, a contributor makes a suggestion which entitles him to a reward as the most zealous of the Reformers. It is, that all our courts should be opened with prayer! To the possible objection that there is no one in court to do the praying, he makes three answering suggestions as to appointing the leader of the ceremony:

"1. The pious judge. What a solemn, affecting, though novel sight that would be: Judge White, or Ewing, or Stowe, or other well-known Christian judges in Allegheny county, opening court by calling on all to join in prayer for a blessing on their work? With what solemnity would the venerable Judge Miller, of the United States Supreme Court, hav sought the favor of God at the opening of court? Hundreds, thousands of other judges throughout our country, equally good, would gladly and most fittingly perform this appropriate service. Or

"2. Let the service be performed by the various ministers of the gospel in the place. They would gladly do it, taking it in turn. It would be both a pleasure and a benefit to them. Or

"3. In our more important places where courts sit a large portion of the time, let the regular chaplains be employed. Why not? It would be a saving of time. Business would be more promptly dispatched. The general appearance, the personnel, of court-room crowds would be greatly improved. All parties would be the gainers, and the public expense would be decreased. Then why not employ chaplains for our court-rooms as well as, nay, more than, in our prisons and workhouses?"

To this the editor of the Statesman adds:

"The foregoing suggestion is of the utmost practical value. We are glad to inform our readers that the courts in Massachusetts—we do not know how generally or whether invariably—are opened with prayer. Our lamented brother, the Rev. David McFall, rendered this service for some time in the courts of East Cambridge, and once when the present writer was his guest he asked us to take his place, but we were unable to accept the invitation. We ask information from our readers as to whether this custom prevails in other states, and how widely it prevails in Massachusetts."

If the Sabbath Union succeeds in its object, these National Reformers may hope to succeed in theirs, and put Christ into our Constitution, laws, and courts. And what a high old time the parsons will hav then!

Two Sources of Authority.

Replying to our question why the Seventh Day Adventists resist the Sunday laws when they assert that they follow Christ and the apostles, who "taught submission to rightful authority," the American Sentinel says:

"They oppose, not rightful authority, but a most unwarranted usurpation by the state of power that belongs alone to God. They 'render to Cæsar the things that are Cæsar's, and to God the things that are God's,' and refuse to obey the state only when, like the magistrates referred to in Acts iv, 5-19, it commands that which involves the violation of the law of God. We utterly repudiate the pagan theory to which THE TRUTH SEEKER seems to be wedded, namely, that the state is supreme in all things."

Exactly. But who is to say what things are Cæsar's and what things are God's? How do we know what power belongs alone to God? How do we know when magistrates are violating the law of God?

The Bible answers those questions, does the Sentinel say? Ah, who knows what the Bible means? Who shall interpret it definitivly? Think of the scores of sects, each interpreting differently! If the Bible is the authority, then we must hav an inspired and divinely authorized interpreter—as the Catholic church claims to be. No one has more clearly shown the folly of trying to authoritativly outline Christianity than the Sentinel people in their resistance to Blair's Educational amendment. And all they say as to that applies to the Bible in this case.

Again, when the Adventists think the Bible commands one thing and the state clearly commands another the Adventists propose to obey the Bible—in other words, their rights of conscience, as they conceive them to be. What is this but the Catholic position of the church above the state—the pope above the president, the priest above the legislator? And it must necessarily be the position of any true Christian church, or of any church or religion founded upon alleged supernatural events or authority. Are the Adventists that sort of folks?

THE TRUTH SEEKER is very much misconstrued if it is thought to maintain the state's supremacy. It does no such thing. It maintains man's supremacy. Back of the state, and higher than it, back of all constitutions and courts and legislators and governors and presidents, is Man. He is supreme. The state is but the expression of his wish—the method he takes to accomplish his will. This is the American doctrin also—the People are the supreme authority—and not "God."

The difference between the Freethinkers and the Adventists in their contention for church and state separation is that the Adventists imagin that some imaginary God calls for it, while the Freethinkers declare it to be for the benefit of the people. One wants it for God's and man's sake, the other for man's sake alone. The Adventists must, in their advocacy, make their logic straddle both positions. God and Cæsar will never get together, for there is no one to survey the boundaries of their respectiv dominions. Therefore, as God makes no disturbance over whatever man does, and as Cæsar does, we can for practical purposes reckon only with Cæsar, ignoring the other's claims. For whenever ambitious man attempts to sit upon two stools he falls to the ground. Work, then, for justice and human happiness in this world; let God take care of himself with the aid of his omnipotence.

The Beneficent Comstock Law.

One of the beautiful possibilities of the Comstock postal statute which we hav forgotten until now to mention, but which is again rendered timely by Mr. Wanamaker's post-office report, is thus shown by the Evening Post. The incident occurred during the recent campaign. With the politics of the story we hav nothing to do:

"The postmaster—one Fiedler—at Bellefonte, Pa., has come to his aid by excluding the World's story of Quay's criminal career from the mails at that place as 'obscene literature.' The World's supplement containing the story was folded in the issue of a local Democratic paper, the Centre Democrat, and Fiedler took upon himself to refuse to deliver the Democrat unless the supplement was taken out of it, on the old Southern plan. We question if there is any remedy for this if Wanamaker chooses to stand by Fiedler, as he doubtless will. But of course all this uproar over the charge helps to spread the story of Quay's dishonesty, or, in other words, helps the Independents. Nothing so stimulates curiosity to see a book or pamphlet as its exclusion from the mails on any ground, and especially on the ground of 'obscenity.' The effect of Fiedler's exploit is hightened, too, by the fact that he himself edits a Republican sheet called the Keystone Gazette, and is, therefore, one of the goodly company of the muzzled."

Mr. Quay may or may not be guilty of the charges made against him. But, either way, the postmaster was strictly right if the law be right. The supplement was undoubtedly lacking in modesty and good manners, for it is very ungentlemanly to constantly remind people of their faults, and also, it undoubtedly offended Mr. Quay's sense of delicacy. To him and his friends it was unbecoming, indecorous, unseemly. Being so, it was indecent, and therefore unmailable according to the new Comstock statute. To exclude the supplement "was the simple duty of the" Bellefonte postmaster, who of course could "never discuss the policy or wisdom of breaking the law."

To the Seventh Day Adventists.

We respectfully call the attention of the Advent Review and Herald and the American Sentinel to this occurrence. Ralph Avery, who lived near Delzura, a place not far from San Diego, Cal., was an industrious man, fifty years of age, highly esteemed, and possessed of more than ordinary intelligence. Not long ago he became a convert to the Seventh Day Advent faith, and talked religion until everybody was bored. Then, his hallucination increasing, he began to fast, and imagined that the mantle of the prophets was about to fall upon him from heaven. On Thursday of last week he came to the house where his wife and child were, shouting frantically that he was the second Christ. The wife rightly judged that he was insane, and, taking her child in her arms, started to run for a neighbor's. The fanatic overtook her, and demanded his son, declaring that he was commanded by heaven to spill the boy's blood as a sacrifice. The child was rescued and placed in other hands, and the neighbors took Avery in charge. Upon his person was found a knife which he had sharpened agreeably to the supposed divine command to cut his son's heart out and burn it as an offering to God. Except for the interference of others he would doubtless hav followed directions and killed the child. Another hallucination of Avery's was the belief that a ray of light had entered him, giving him a subjectiv illumination, together with unbounded wisdom.

When Prof. J. O. Corliss next goes into the mission field, spreading the third angel's message, we hope he will be careful whom he converts. It is better that folks like Avery should "die in their sins" than that they should be saved at the cost of innocent lives.

It is said that the Adventists are closer students of the Bible, and more literal believers therein, than any other Christian sect. We suggest, therefore, in order to avert murder, that their Publishing Association get out an edition of the Bible from which all reference to sacrifice is omitted. For (as Freethought says) ever since Abraham imposed upon his superstitious tribe the story that God demanded the sacrifice of Isaac, people of weak mind hav believed in sacrifices and many hav made them. The crucifixion of Christ, with the doctrin of vicarious sacrifice attached to it, increased the evil. The doctrin therefore is pernicious in practice, besides being unjust in theory. Let the Adventists take heed, learn wisdom, and expurgate their Bible before their sect is responsible for any more insane men.

Still a Good Christian.

Two weeks ago Albert H. Smith, of Brooklyn, was convicted of forgery and sentenced to prison for seventeen years.

The regular monthly business meeting of Plymouth church, the late Henry Ward Beecher's charge, was held Friday evening, December 5th. Deacon B. F. Blair presided, and the routine business was quickly settled. Then the Rev. Dr. Lyman Abbott, now pastor of the church and editor of the Christian Union, arose, and claimed the attention of the gathering. He alluded first to the fact that Albert H. Smith, the forger, was a member of Plymouth church. He then sketched the career of the forger and his crime. Dr. Abbott told of his interview with Smith, and said that he firmly believed that the criminal had repented. He then read a letter from Smith as follows:

"DR. LYMAN ABBOTT, My Dear Pastor: Will you kindly advise me of my present position as an unworthy member of Plymouth church—what my duty is toward the brethren? I can, at the least, but express my bitter sorrow and sincere repentance for the crime I hav committed, and ask you to make expression of this to the proper officers of the church.

"My daily prayer is for God's forgivness and for grace to bear my deserved punishment and humiliation. I feel that he has brought my heart back to himself. He saw me slipping away from my professions to the world of a desire to lead a Christian life, and has taken this means of saving me. I see in this call to bear this heavy cross and shame that I hav yet an opportunity to serve him and try to do his will. I trust I hav set my face in the right direction, and ask for your prayers and forgivness.

"Very sincerely yours, ALBERT H. SMITH.

"Dec. 1, 1890."

The letter was written from the Tombs. "My dear pastor" then offered the following resolution:

"Resolved, That this church, fully recognizing the sin of Albert H. Smith in the act for which he is now suffering the legal penalty, retain his name upon the rolls, in the faith that no man more needs the watch and care of a Christian church than one who has fallen into sin, but has sincerely repented of his sin, and desires to return to the way of righteousness and life. Our message to our brother is that God pardoneth and absolveth all those that truly repent and unfeignedly believe in his holy gospel, and we commend him to the prayers of the members of our church and to such special offices of spiritual aid as it may be possible for the pastors or other officers of this church to render to him."

The resolution was unanimously adopted, and so when forger Smith returns from Sing Sing he will resume his place among the brethren as a member of the church in good and regular standing!

Not So Very Deplorable.

The Evening Post has discovered a mare's nest in Western Europe. It is that the Catholic church is rapidly drifting into Socialism, citing Cardinal Manning's letter to a convention at Liege in proof. The cardinal said: "It will never be possible to establish peaceful relations between employers and workingmen in an effectiv and lasting manner, until there shall be enacted a just and proper law regulating profits and wages—a law by which all free contracts between capital and labor shall be governed." All the churches, adds the Post, are drifting more or less rapidly into the same position, and for the reason that the people, having found out that heaven is a myth, are demanding their paradise here on earth. "They used to accept the promis of a heaven hereafter as a solution for their earthly privations, but they refuse to do so any longer, and the clergy are forced, in order to hav an influence with them or get a hearing from them, to promis them a heaven on earth, for that is what Socialism offers."

Of course the Post thinks this tendency most deplorable. "The plan of 'a just and proper law regulating wages and profits,' assumes the existence somewhere in humanity of a stock of grace, wisdom, and understanding, and of legislativ and administrativ talent, which the world has not yet drawn on. Who is competent to draft such a law, and where are the saints who are to execute it so as to make this earthly paradise? Even Mr. Bellamy, perfect as his arrangements are, does not provide a general superintendent or board of control for his phalanstery. Three years ago there was a widespread notion that somehow the Knights of Labor had been specially consecrated for the work of regenerating at least American society, but in a very few months Satan was as busy among them with his varied assortment of deviltries as among the rest of mankind. The chiefs lied and stole, and quarreled and failed, just like capitalists and brokers. The notion which some of the clergy are helping to spread, that human society can be improved independently of improvements in human character, has just as much promis and potency of social mischief in it as the invasion of the barbarians in the fifth century. It may overthrow what we hav, but it will take now, as it took then, a thousand years to put something decent and bearable in its place."

We cannot agree at all with the Post that, "humanly speaking," this spread of skepticism is "deplorable," though no one can deny that the race is not, by many years, fitted for such cooperativ life as Socialism or Anarchism presents. There is too much of the savage in us yet. But the very fact that the people hav quit thinking about an imaginary heaven and gone to thinking about improving their condition on earth is, if it be really a fact, the most hopeful sign of the age. As long as people would accept the promis of a heaven hereafter as payment in full for slavery here, but little progress in solving economic puzzles could be made. But let the world seriously turn its attention to devising and practicing schemes whereby every man shall be enabled to consume the full equivalent of what he produces, and the result will be felt in less than a thousand years. At any rate, there is no use in standing still because first steps may hav to be retraced and a new path sought.

Editorial Notes.

THE editor of the Investigator asks this curious question: "Is Balfour a greater enemy to Ireland than Mrs. O'Shea?"

Why Mrs. O'Shea? Is it always to be Adam's answer, She did it?

THIS is a Methodist opinion of "Father" Huntington, from the Christian Advocate: "Protestant monkhoods merit only contempt, being the monkeyish imitations of Rome." Alliterativ and accurate!

THE Christian Statesman says:

"THE TRUTH SEEKER is a journal published in New York and devoted to the secular theory of government, or the utter divorce of civil government from religion. Here is its estimate of the Prohibition movement: 'It is a base conspiracy of raving cranks, frothing fanatics, gibbering lunatics, frenzied bigots, designing knaves, rotten demagogs, and unprincipled politicians, who would apply the torch of conflagration to the glorious temple of liberty bequeathed us by our fathers, and dance in fiendish revelry around the smoking ruin.'"

When did THE TRUTH SEEKER ever say that?

PRESBYTERIANISM is progressing. The First Presbyterian church of Spokane Falls, Wash., held a foot sociable last week. A heavy curtain was hung, and on one side were the ladies, on the other the gentlemen. The ladies had to exhibit one foot from under the curtain, and the gents took their choice of which foot carried the fairest owner, and brought her to supper in consideration of fifteen cents for the privilege of choosing.

MISSOURI is a pious state, and has a good Sunday law, based so entirely upon religion that it exempts from penalties "any person who is a member of a religious society by whom any other than the first day of the week is observed as a Sabbath, so that he observes such Sabbath." But notwithstanding this, so bloodthirsty are the evangelical Christians of the state that two Seventh Day Adventists, William Fritz and Robert Gibb, living in Howard county, near Armstrong, hav been indicted and arrested for performing common labor on their farms on Sunday. The cases were docketed for trial in the circuit court at Fayette, Tuesday, Dec. 2, 1890, but no further particulars hav reached the headquarters of the sect at Battle Creek, Mich.

The Picture Book, Bound in Cloth, $2.50.

Many purchasers of the "Freethinker's Pictorial Text-Book" having expressed a desire for a cloth binding for it, we hav arranged to satisfy the demand, and for an additional fifty cents will send it in silk cloth, gold and black lettering. In either style of binding it is the cheapest book for the money among Freethought publications. It is also one of the very best.

Letters from Friends.

FINDLAY, O., Nov. 25, 1890.

MR. EDITOR: This postal is the result of a call in the last issue of THE TRUTH SEEKER. I heartily indorse the motion of Mr. Guthrie, as seconded by Geo. L. Pratt in the November 22d issue of THE TRUTH SEEKER. Also I am in for a family record as suggested by Capt. T. J. Kennedy, and for having the pictures engraved of the worthies he named; and if Mr. Heston so kindly sees fit to push it I will pledge myself for a copy unless the cost is too much.

SAML. H. ZIMMERMAN.

HEBER CITY, UTAH, Nov. 15, 1890.

MR. EDITOR: The present inclosure is for one year's subscription and one copy of the picture book. I should like to be able to help the cause more than I do. But I do the very best I can. Can every other truth seeker say the same and tell the truth? If they can, you hav a hard row to hoe. But I think you hav the courage to face it. And I for one will pledge myself to help you all I can. Hoping you will liv long to fight the good fight, I remain,

Yours for the truth, ANDREW LINDSAY.

HEBER CITY, UTAH, Nov. 17, 1890.

MR. EDITOR: Your article on the failure of the fulfillment of prophecy as published in your paper of October 11th, is in my poor judgment unanswerable. Hence I inclose $1 for two or three copies, and desire to keep that record. Hav you any pamphlets in print on that subject? If so, I should like to get some if I knew how. If any, send me a copy, and I will remit and may order more.

Your sincere well-wisher in the struggle of Right against the tyrant Might, JOHN DUNOAN.

SNOWVILLE, VA., Dec. 1, 1890.

MR. EDITOR: The mother is the real head of the family, yet Captain Kennedy proposes a family record surrounded on all sides by men. He forgets men are only what mothers make them. He forgets how much woman has done and is still doing for freedom and Liberalism. But it is to be hoped the record makers will remember to at least alternate the picture of each man with the picture of some good woman. Ernestine L. Rose, Harriet Martineau, Susie H. Wixon, Elizabeth Cady Stanton, Matilda Joslyn Gage, Susan B. Anthony, and hundreds of others are on the roll to be selected from. The only trouble will be that so many grand, good women must be left out.

The wife, and she is not one jot less than the husband;
The daughter, and she is just as good as the son;
The mother, and she is every bit as much as the father.

ELMINA DRAKE SLENKER.

HENDERSON, KY., Nov. 25, 1890.

MR. EDITOR: I hav to acknowledge that the "Freethinkers' Text-Book" contains many powerful facts from the highest authorities contradicting and completely setting aside many of the follies and wicked features of the churches, and, with the powerful assistance of the illustrations, throwing discredit on even the most respectable doctrins and practices. I hav found very little in the pictures to condemn, but a great deal that deserves a hearty amen. I think the Decline of the Papacy in Italy is the best, and the Race between Ingersoll and Gladstone is second; but the least of them is still magnificent. I do not know how much toil and perspiration are expended in the production of one of these inimitable sketches, but I must say: Heston, you are a master. Everybody should hav the book, and I am willing to help pay for a copy to be sent to Mr. Gladstone and one to the pope. T. J. STEVENSON.

HAMBURG, IA., Nov. 24, 1890.

MR. EDITOR: Will you please giv the names of the twenty-seven Bibles as given by Kersey Graves's work, through the medium of THE TRUTH SEEKER, and also to whom the revelations were supposed to hav been made?

If any of the subscribers hav any back numbers they do not want, they can make good use of them and help the cause by sending them to August Wagner, of this place, who will highly appreciate the favors and use them to the best advantage. Yours truly, E. DALBEY.

[The chief among the Bibles enumerated by Mr. Graves are: Rig Veda, Yojur Veda, Sama Veda, Atharva Veda, Institutes of Menu, Ramayana, Mahabarat, Barta Shastra, Hermas, Zend Avesta, Sadder, Desatur, G. Javidan, Sophi Ibrahim, Ta-Heo, Chung Yung, Book of Mang, Shoo King, She King, Chun Tsen, Tao-te King, Musnavi, Bour Desch Kaliwakim, Saga, Kaliocham, Athenian Testament, Yohar, Koran, Book of Mormon, Shaker Divine Roll, Talmud, Old and New Testaments. These number upward of twenty-seven. Mr. Graves givs the alleged recipients of the revelations only in the most important cases. The names of the recipients will be found, so far as known at all, in various works on religions.—ED. T. S.]

CHICAGO, ILL., Nov. 25, 1890.

MR. EDITOR: On Sunday evening, November 23d, Mrs. M. A. Freeman gave her new lecture, "The Battle for Bread," before the Chicago Secular Union, Princess Opera House, to an appreciativ and magnificent audience. The house was filled to overflowing. Many prominent citizens were present, and the occasion was one long to be remembered. An elegant basket of flowers was presented to the lecturer by Mrs. J. H. Greer. A recitation was given by Mrs. Hannah, a former member of the Milwaukee Liberal League. Mrs. Freeman's lecture, the "Battle for Bread," was delivered at th recent congress at Portsmouth—that is, in part, as she was allowed only forty-five minutes on that occasion. The following is from the Chicago daily Globe:

Mrs. Freeman delivered a lecture on "The Battle for Bread" last evening, before the Secular Union, at the Princess Opera House, West Madison street. Mrs. Freeman attracted the largest audience that has ever attended the Union's meeting. She is a pleasant speaker and her address contained many salient points and much good advice.

And the evening Journal says:

The Chicago Secular Union had its largest audience of the season Sunday evening at Princess Opera House to hear Mrs. M. A. Freeman's lecture, "The Battle for Bread," in which she held her hearers enraptured for an hour with her expressions of practical ideas mingled with poetic sentiment sustaining her high reputation as a lecturer. Mrs. M. J. Weeks's singing was much appreciated by the audience and there was instrumental music by Mrs. Reece, Bertha Piper, and J. Greer.

It is said that a prophet is without honor in his own country, but the large and appreciativ audience upon this occasion was an eloquent tribute of the people's enthusiasm for Mrs. Freeman's ten years' work in the Chicago Secular Union, to which she has unflinchingly devoted her time and talents. She has resided in Chicago for twenty-two years, and it only needs to be announced that she will speak to fill the house to overflowing. J. H. GREER.

SEWARD, NEB., Nov. 25, 290.

MR. EDITOR: Will you favor me by inserting the inclosed obituary in THE TRUTH SEEKER? If you will please send me seven or eight extra copies, I will remit to you when I send for my historical cartoon book. Ours was the first funeral exercise of the kind in Seward, which has over two thousand inhabitants with a dozen churches.

H. L. BOYES.

OBITUARY.

Gone to that undiscovered country from whose bourne no traveler returns.

BOYES.—At her residence in Seward on Monday, Oct. 13, 1890, Mrs. Esther L. Boyes, aged 75 years and 18 days.

Mrs. Boyes was the daughter of Col. Arunah Hibbard and Esther Hibbard. Her father, Colonel Hibbard, served in the war of 1812. The deceased was born in Erie county, N. Y., Sept. 25, 1815, and was married to Hiram L. Boyes, Oct. 20, 1836. She was one of the oldest settlers of Seward, Neb., having removed here with her husband more than twenty-three years ago. She was respected and loved by all who knew her, and was noted for her genial disposition and kindness to all, especially to those in adversity. She leaves her husband, five sons, and two daughters to mourn the loss of a devoted wife and loving mother. The funeral services were held at the residence of the deceased, and were simple yet very impressiv. Many friends gathered to pay their last sad tribute of respect to the dead friend and neighbor. After an appropriate selection of vocal music, with organ accompaniment, had been rendered by Mr. Merriam, Mr. Bain, Mrs. Smith Atkins, Mrs. Reichman, and Miss Jolley, Judge Lowley read that exquisit poem, "Why Should the Spirit of Mortal be Proud?" in his own good style. Mrs. D. C. McKillip then read an extract from Edwin Arnold's "Light of Asia" with an impressiv manner. Another selection of music was rendered, and the corpse was taken to the north cemetery and laid to rest surrounded by a large circle of sorrowing friends.

A CARD.

We offer, as far as words can, our grateful thanks to the neighbors and friends who, for so many months, and especially in these last sad days, hav assisted so much in the care of our sick; and after her death, to those who assisted in the last sad rites, do we especially express our gratitude.

H. L. BOYES AND FAMILY.

BEE, NEB., Nov. 20, 1890.

MR. EDITOR: With your permission, I desire an answer, through the columns of your enlightening journal, to the following:

As the brain of man is the seat of his intellect and emotions, it includes his understanding, his affections, fancy, and imaginations; and as the spirit is an immaterial, intelligent, and immortal substance in man which distinguishes him from brutes, that part of man which enables him to think and reason; and as the fact of progress has been fully demonstrated, in that life began in the simple sea-plant, rising through millions of successiv differentiations and survivals of the fittest, and a continuous and almost unbroken chain of upward gradation through diatoms and crinoids, animalcules and crustaceans, and through all the lower orders of vegetable and animal life, until through the continuation of natural selection the climax of upward gradation is reached in man; and as this truth is acknowledged by the most intelligent supernaturalists of the day, they will confer a great favor on myself and others by fully explaining at what period during the evolution of man from a lower order of animals a "spirit" or "soul" was imparted to or inserted in man, and denied or not given to the lower order of animals from which mankind were derived. And further, as the brain is the seat of intellect and emotions, of fancy, affections, and imaginations, it must be the cause of the animation or propelling force in the spiritual gradations of a future existence, or there is no sensitiv, sensible, or reasonable guide to the immaterial, intelligent being, or substance, called a spirit. And as the brain dies and decays with the body, returning its mite of matter to our common parent the earth, from which it derived its subsistence and former existence, does it not necessarily and naturally leave the theoretically constructed spirit of theologists to take an aimless and crazy flight through nature's illimitable space, devoid of intellect, of fancy, affections, or imaginations, and without the knowledge or emotion to materialize in a Spiritualistic séance in response to queries of the living, or to twang a harp on the golden streets of an orthodox heaven?

The lack of knowledge of the history of priestcraft makes women the soul of the church, and a mystic faith without reason makes man a passiv subject in the antique mold of superstition. His lot is cast in occasionally filling a vacant pew and the purse of the parson who preaches prehistoric paganism to a pathetic penitential party of plutocrats, including the trinity of polytheism, and then, if scientifically educated, he goes homeward laughing in his sleeve at the unalloyed and contagious ignorance of mortal man.

INQUISITOR.

GRAY, KY., Nov. 23, 290.

MR. EDITOR: I was pleasurably surprised when I arrived at this place to find out a day or two after that I had got into a Freethinking community. Our postmaster, W. R. Barton, made an inquiry about me and soon sent me word that he would like to see me. As I was a stranger in the community, I at once came to the conclusion that he was a Freethinker and had been reading THE TRUTH SEEKER. So I called on him and made myself known. He then told me he had been reading THE TRUTH SEEKER and was pleased to see my article on the constitutional convention. At once there was a mutual good feeling at work with us. I was next made acquainted with the genial gentleman C. C. Gray, who is a subscriber to THE TRUTH SEEKER and the man whom the village and post-office are named in honor of. He has a son named in honor of Colonel Ingersoll. I hav also made the acquaintance of B. F. Gray, a merchant of this place and a fearless Freethinker. F. M. Reese is the public school teacher, and it is but just to suppose that nothing but a secular education will be taught in his school, as he is a Freethinker. I hav also made the acquaintance of D. W. Conger, a jovial gentleman who is clerking for the North Jellico Coal Co. And I must not forget to say I hav met Mr. Wm. Robinson, a late subscriber to THE TRUTH SEEKER. There are other Freethinkers here whom I hav not met; D. F. Martin, C. C. Farris, and S F. Widener are among them. In fact, I am always glad to meet a Freethinker and reader of your grand old paper. I think it advisable for all Freethinkers to wear a Freethinker's breast-pin, so that they can be known among their friends. When I get able I am going to hav one of Brother Wettstein's breast-pins so that I can show the Christians my colors and my Freethinking friends may know who I am without introduction.

I am in favor of a closer union of our forces, and the establishment of a mutual benefit society. It can be done, and it ought to be done.

Well, our constitutional convention has done it at last. They got God into the constitution; and preachers—and of course priests—are eligible to the governorship. So you see we are something as Artemus Ward's Army of the Potomac were when they got their shoes on the wrong way—progressing backward. We ought to hav better sense than our forefathers had, since we hav their experience and history to teach us. But these gentlemen of the constitutional convention hav gone backward a hundred years. I hope the people will reject their work entirely and giv the bigots a just set-back. I do not think a Catholic priest in the governor's chair would sit well with the people of Kentucky. If a preacher is eligible, why not a priest? S. P. HERRON.

FORT JONES, CAL., Nov. 5, 1890.

MR. EDITOR: This is the frontier, a term synonymous with backwardness and ignorance, but I can venture the assertion that miners as a class are the greatest readers in the world. They are observers of nature, and their observations lead them to conclusions directly in accordance with nature's laws. There is no question more discussed than the combined subject of politics and religion. I say combined advisedly, because we all hav been watching the trend of American politics lately, and we hav come to the conclusion that a uniting of church and state is one of the direct aims of a certain party in the United States. We are opposed to it. We believe that the American flag, which has protected all nationalities, creeds, and peoples for one hundred years without recognizing a constitutional theocracy, is still capable of floating without acknowledging a Christian God, is still capable of ruling the destinies of sixty-five million people. There never has been a country where a triumphant church, worldly in all its aims and ends, has ruled a people, that that nation has not been corrupt, rotten, filthy in its political history. France, ruled by a priestly caste, brought on its head the awful river of blood of the French Revolution. Greece, Rome, Italy of the ancients, Spain, Austria, Mexico of the moderns, are priest-ridden, and as a result ignorance, poverty, and degradation are the outcome to the people. True, a certain class are refined and elevated, but the great masses are confined in their liberties and methods of acquiring intelligence. Spain shows that the church, no matter of what denomination, will crush the intellectual spirit, if given a chance.

Within its iron clasp there are hidden the iron spikes that, like the statue of old, will crush the spirit from man and leave him a hopeless intellectual wreck, whose only attribute is mental idiocy. But we need not leave the United States to find these qualities. Go to the polls on any election day and you can find examples.

How many men are there to-day who cannot write their own ballots? One out of every seven. What is the nationality and religion of these men? From the sunny shores of fair Italy, and the vine-clad hills of Spain and Portugal, they come. And they regularly attend confession, receiving holy absolution at the hands of men whose only recommendation is duplicity and dishonesty.

These are live questions, and we believe that you can giv them wide circulation. Thoughtful men will recognize these questions, and will prepare themselvs for the issue. "As for me I hope that when my eyes close at the sunset of life they may still behold" a country free from all entangling alliances of state and church, and that the declining years of my life may be cheered by the spectacle of a free flag, free religion, and free ballot, untrammeled by any influence of party, sect, division, or organization of men whose only purpose is the destruction of our liberties and the enactment of laws that shall bind us in any way, shape, form, or manner in the exercise of the grandest privilege ever bestowed on the citizen of any government or state of ancient or modern times. JUNIUS.

MELROSE, MASS, NOV. 30, 1890.

MR. EDITOR: Occasionally I get a chance to read, and when I do I sometimes get suddenly enlightened. I passed Thanksgiving with a good Baptist sister, and between meals took up an "Encyclopedia of Human Nature," by Prof. A. E. Willis. If any of your readers hav not enjoyed it, they can do so and save the money from the dime museum. A part of it equals that institution. They, like myself, will become enlightened on Colonel Ingersoll and Infidels. Under a poor picture of the Priest of Reason, Common Sense, and Truth, the professor (?) says of Ingersoll: "He is much better adapted for a politician than a theologian. He is deficient in spiritual nature, and mental imitation"—though he admits that the colonel "possesses a good degree of veneration." He enlightens us by saying that "a Christian imitates and conforms to the life of Jesus Christ." I wonder if it is really true that the colonel is so unregenerate that he would not "imitate" the "everlasting punishment" sentiments of Jesus. Couldn't he be persuaded to commend the adoring Mary, and criticise the working Martha? Could he not "imitate" the calling non-believers "fools," "liars," "hypocrits," etc.? Is he really so impenitent that he would not curse a fig-tree (an apple-tree might do) for not bearing fruit out of season? And if he could just sandwich in a little judicious damning, à la Jesus, as reported by Mark, he might be excused from further imitation on account of the deficiency of his "spiritual nature." The professor also charges that the colonel "is always willing to hav a heaven, but dislikes the idea of a hell," and insists that this is a weakness of "poor, selfish human nature." How terrible this is, that a man is not willing to hav a hell for those who believe differently from him, and for those who deny him. It is truly soul-saddening. But the professor rises to his grandest when he arraigns the "Infidels." He relates many incidents that are valueless, but laughable to any reasoner. He claims to hav "staggered" one skeptic by finally saying to him: "You are conceited, and want to bring the almighty down to your standard of reason and judgment." This was so unanswerable and so convincing that the Infidel never troubled him again. I suppose the Infidel was so disgusted with the arrogance and conceit of the man that he despaired of ever teaching him how to reason and argue, and so left him to his faith and ignorance. I need quote but one more Christian sentence from this pious brother. Listen now and tremble, you wretched skeptics and Infidels. He says of these, that "they are God-forsaken, lawless spiritual outcasts, and are just as miserable as the outcasts of business and social society." There! And the title-page of this book states that he is going to tell "the truth, the whole truth, and nothing but the truth," and so there is no chance for anyone to think there may be a mistake. There was more in the same grand, logical style, from which I recovered in time enough to hav a good appetite for my Thanskgiving supper, and to be thankful that most of the world is growing beyond such petty nonsense. Let us be glad that our Liberal papers and literature are doing such valiant work in spreading the gospel of Freethought, and let us all resolve to sustain them all we can.

By the way, I do not want to close without making two more quotations. Reading an article on Switzerland and her ways, these sentences made me think. The writer assumes that the Swiss are the best-educated people in the world, and proves it in a two-column article, intensely interesting. "Compulsory education, free schools, and almost free text-books are fundamental principles of the Swiss educational system. The schools stand at the head of everything; even the army costs less than their schools do." The next striking sentence is: "The preachers hav an uphill row of it, for hundreds of the Swiss teachers are Infidels." Two and two are four in everything but theological arithmetic, and so we can well afford to rejoice.

Success to THE TRUTH SEEKER. C. FANNIE ALLYN.

LYONS, KAN., NOV. 25, 1890.

MR. EDITOR: In the columns of THE TRUTH SEEKER I perceive the letter in relation to Prohibition in Kansas by Friend Shepard, of Leavenworth, has been answered by two non-residents of the state, one from Massachusetts and the other from Texas. Both of the latter gentlemen are perhaps fair reasoners from their standpoint, but are lacking in stating the solid truths as to the practical workings of Prohibition, such as I hav experienced since Kansas started on the cold-water craze. Whether there is more or less liquor drunk in this state since the Prohibition era or not, is a question of some doubt, but I am strongly inclined to the belief (wishing to be fair) that the quantity is less. But the manner in which that less quantity is obtained is too pusillanimously loathsome to state in detail, from the fact that the law has made moral cowards of most of the thousands who continue to imbibe when an opportunity presents itself. This sly back-alley bottle-drinking hinted at will be construed by some as one of the strongest reasons why the traffic should be suppressed. The same argument applies to the secret underground meetings of religious devotees in former years, who hav been hunted from cellar to garret for worshiping the God or Gods they believed in. Of course my Liberal friends will admit the injustice of persecuting the human family for their religious convictions, because it is plainly an invasion of private rights and a thrust at individual liberty, at the same time showing the despotism of a narrow-minded, illiberal majority.

Let me ask right here whether we hav any individual rights. If we hav, I should be pleased to know of what they consist. We are supposed to hav passed through the era of the Inquisition, wherein our very thoughts were analyzed and the life squeezed out of honest inquiry, and now at this late day Prohibition, the pretended savior, with dictatorial arrogance insists we shall return to our first love, water. For argument's sake let us suppose Prohibition has prohibited in the United States all liquors alcoholic. Most Liberals, I presume, will admit that one of the worst evils which afflict the human family is either superstition or priestcraft, or both. Shall we then, believing ourselvs secure in the knowledge of such injurious beliefs, trespass upon the rights of those who differ from us, and when in the majority prohibit religious worship, pious gatherings, and protracted meetings, because we think such practices strengthen superstition, weaken the intellect, befog the brain, and tend to insanity? Rather let us follow this line of argument and see where it will land us. Prohibition of tobacco is said to be the next move on the Prohibition checkerboard. Then come tea and coffee, spices, and the usual condiments for seasoning our food. Without going further you will perceive that when this much is accomplished we shall hav retrograded back beyond our historical starting-point, when brute force and majorityism reigned supreme.

A wave of superstition and intolerance seems—nay, has overspread a large portion of the United States. Said malady, like the measles, being infectious must hav its run, and has I think about run its course. The religious craze, together with the Prohibition racket, is somewhat on the wane, the Republicans of Kansas having divided and split up on the resubmission question and being now politically out in the cold. Thousands of dollars from this state were by the Women's Christian Temperance Union collected and sent into Nebraska to swell the fanatical ranks of Prohibition in that state; prayers were sent up; the preachers invoked the aid of the most high—but God seems to hav turned a deaf ear to their prayers and scoffed at their pious offerings of gold, having showered his favors among the Democrats, the party who in this case are advocating individual liberty. And now that the mother of the God-in-the-Constitution party has suffered them to be snowed under, I hope, for the general good of sunny Kansas, they may hav a blissful, permanent repose. ED. BUTLER.

MAKANDA, ILL., NOV. 11, 290.

MR. EDITOR: I had proposed to write an article on astronomy with a view of contrasting its truths with the ignorant and absurd teachings of the Bible on that subject, but I am glad Mr. Peck has undertaken it. I suspect your printer has made him say "Neptune" instead of Uranus. The figures he gives as the diameter of the orbit of Neptune (3,600,000,000) are correct when applied to Uranus, while the diameter of the orbit of Neptune is 5,700,000,000 of miles. I wish Brother Peck had given his authority for the statement that the star Lyra would fill the orbit of Neptune (Uranus). This would require it to be billions of times larger than our sun, and many thousands of times larger than Sirius the great Dog-star, which has been considered one of the largest, if not the very largest, star belonging to our stellar system. Dimensions so great seem contrary to all known analogies, and should be supported by first-class proof. I wish Liberals would more generally study astronomy. Except possibly geology, no science demonstrates the ignorance of the Bible writers so conclusivly as does that of astronomy. Had its truths been known to the masses in Bible times, our Bible would never hav been written nor would the Jewish and Christian religions hav humbugged the world. In urging that our people study astronomy, I do not mean that they all should master it so thoroughly as to be able to calculate eclipses, transits, occultations, etc., but they should hav a general knowledge of the real and apparent movements, dimensions, and distances of the heavenly bodies, so that a glance at the stars would enable them to tell, approximately, the time of night at any time or place. This knowledge is within the reach of the ordinary student, and is often the source of much satisfaction. In my youth, and when thoroughly orthodox, it used to seem strange to me, in view of the comparativ insignificance of our little planet, that it and its inhabitants should engross and monopolize the attention of the infinit creator of the universe. Compared with the sun, and most of the other planets of our solar system, our earth is a very small affair, not much larger than one of the four moons of Jupiter. The Bible writers seem to hav been entirely ignorant of the facts of the case. They thought that this little planet was the grandest work of their God, requiring such an immense expenditure of energy that he became so weary that for a whole day he "rested and was refreshed," while the creation of the stars was comparativly nothing, and seemed to occupy but a few minutes Wednesday morning, and was deserving of only the brief notice contained in the words, "He made the stars also." All this was done about six thousand years ago. Had the Bible writers understood the subject they would hav known, as we now know, that some of the stars or nebulæ visible to the naked eye are quadrillions of miles distant, and must hav been created at least sixty thousand years ago, or they would not be visible, as their light, though it travels more than 11,000,000 of miles in a minute, would not yet hav reached us. While many of the other four or five thousand nebulæ, invisible to the naked eye but revealed to us by our powerful modern telescopes, are vastly more distant. So far are some of them removed that it is estimated that light would require millions of years to pass from them to us. This distance is so immense as to be about as inconceivable as infinity itself, yet were we removed to one of these far distant nebulæ, we would, no doubt, see thousands of other stars and nebulæ as far beyond them as they are distant from us, and so on and on forever, or until lost in the infinit. Then, when we reflect that each of these nebulæ represents an immense stellar system containing millions of stars, each of which, like our sun, is probably the center of a planetary system like our own, the absurdity and silliness of the Bible and John Jasper idea, that all revolve around this earth, and were created to be tributaries to it, are apparent. The smallest microscopic atom is larger, when compared with this earth, than this earth is when compared with the universe with which it is connected. Now, the Bible and orthodoxy teach us that the infinit God, who made and governs this grand aggregation of suns and systems, had his throne above Palestine, and so near that he could be seen sitting on it (1 Kings xxii; Isa. vi). On one occasion Moses, Aaron, Nadab, Abihu, seventy elders, and the nobles of the children of Israel, "saw the God of Israel" (Ex. xxiv). These, and many other similar statements, Christians believe, notwithstanding Christ positivly declares them all to be false, where he says, "No man hath seen God at any time" (John i, 18). Think of the infinit, invisible, omnipresent God, "without bodily parts or passions," covering Moses with his hand till he "passed by," then removing his hand and showing him his "back parts." Think also of the unchangeable God, "without passions," getting "angry every day," swearing in his wrath against his weak, erring creatures, vexing them in his sore displeasure, or "hot rage," as Rouse has it, raining snares, fire, and brimstone and a horrible tempest on them, and then laughing at their calamity and mocking at their fear. Not only is he represented as being local and limited in his presence, and possessed of human passions, but he has bodily parts also, hands, feet, eyes, arms, etc.

Neither is the conduct attributed to him consistent with the character of a God of infinit wisdom and goodness. Think of an infinitly wise God puzzled with the question how to persuade Ahab to fight, so that he might be killed, and in order to get light so as to solve the mighty problem, calling together all the hosts of heaven, and after full discussion adopting a course of falsehood and treachery at last (1 Kings xxii). Why, any of our saloon-keepers, with a supply of our modern "fighting whisky," could hav solved the problem in a minute. In Job i, we hav another illustration of our subject. God and his sons were holding a family reunion, and Satan stepped in among them. God received him cordially and seemed anxious to know where he had been and what he had been up to. And after Satan had informed him in that regard, he asked him if he was acquainted with his servant Job, who God said was a "perfect man," "none like him on the earth." Satan said Job served God because he had made him rich. "Touch all that he hath and he will curse thee to thy face." God told him, "All that he hath is in thy power," but forbade him to injure his person. Then follows a series of outrages scarcely paralleled in history. All Job's children are murdered in cold blood. Bandits are stirred up who murder his servants and carry off all his four or five thousand camels, oxen, and asses. An avalanche of fire from heaven burnt up his seven thousand sheep and their shepherds. Still Job maintained his integrity. Then Satan came again into God's family circle, and God, speaking to him of Job, said: "Thou movedst me against him to destroy him without cause!" Here God tells us that he had been influenced by Satan to perpetrate all these cruel outrages against his best friend without the shadow of justification—"without cause." Nor is this all; Satan, though defeated, insists that if God would "touch his bone and his flesh, he would curse him to his face." And what did God do? Did he drive him out of heaven, and refuse to permit further outrages upon his faithful, trusting friend? Nothing of the kind. Job, in the days of his prosperity and power, had "fed the hungry, clothed the naked," protected the stranger and the weak; had been "eyes to the blind, feet to the lame," and "made the widow's heart to sing for joy." Now, by the cruel conspiracy of God and Satan, he is stripped of everything, and reduced to penury, disgrace, and utter wretchedness. God sees him still true and faithful, but bowed under his load of unutterable sorrow—penniless, childless, forsaken, and broken-hearted—yet still trusting in God! In view of all which it would seem that even a fiend ought to be satisfied, and say, "It is enough." But not so God. He says to Satan, Behold, he is in thy hand, but save his life—that is, torture him to the very verge of life, but do not kill him. And so they did. Thus Jehovah treated his most faithful and trusting friend, the best man on earth. Who can love, trust, honor, or worship such a God? Such an ignorant, local, limited, cruel God could never hav been the author of this infinit universe. And had not the people been ignorant his worship could never hav been introduced. And I am sorry to say this ignorance is by no means yet banished from the Christian world. For example, a few years ago a minister at New Bedford, in a sermon on astronomy, speaking of the immense distance of Neptune, told his congregation, many of whom regarded him as a prodigy of wisdom, that to get to that planet we would hav to pass through the Milky Way, while the truth is that Alpha Cyqui, believed to be the nearest fixed star in the Milky Way, or in the heavens, is seven thousand times more distant than Neptune. A few years ago, while conversing with a minister, one cool May morning, with regard to the probability of frost, he told me that there was no danger of frost, for the sign had been in the Steer in the light of the moon in April. After a moment's bewilderment, I asked him if he didn't mean Taurus the Bull. He said he believed some people did call him a bull, but he called him a steer. After a few words explanatory of the signs, and appropriate to his ignorance, I left him, thinking that if he knew no more about the "spiritual things," concerning which he preached, than he did about the natural sciences, he was another example of the blind leading the blind, and that they would soon all be in the ditch. I hav noticed that, generally, those persons who know all about God, heaven, hell, etc., know little or nothing about anything else. W. W. WALKER.

Children's Corner.

Edited by MISS SUSAN H. WIXON, Fall River, Mass., to whom all Communications for this Corner should be sent.

"Between the dark and the daylight,
When the night is beginning to lower,
Comes a pause in the day's occupations
That is known as the Children's Hour."

The Silver Lining.

A fisherman sat at his door one day
Watching the clouds that, heavy and gray,
Obscured the sunlight's shining;
And he said to Bright Eyes at his knee,
"Look yonder in the west and see
The cloud with a silver lining."

I think when our skies are cold and gray,
And we vainly seek to find the way,
Somewhere the light is shining.
If we bravely resolve to do our part,
And bear our griefs with a patient heart,
And free from all repining,

We shall be led to a higher way,
To a better work than we do to-day,
And find love's sunlight shining;
For truth of spirit and strength of soul
Will make the darkest cloud unroll,
And show its silver lining.

The Cats' Convention.

The cats had a convention. At the risk of limb and life Gray Tom, or Tom Gray, made nocturnal visits from house to house, to notify any cat or cats belonging to it to meet on a certain night under a certain large barn, where it was impossible for a dog to creep, except one of very small size, which could easily be frightened away.

They were at last assembled, and Tom Gray, mounting a small, inverted wooden box, which chanced, for some unknown reason, to be in the center of this place, thus addressed them:

"My Brother and Sister Cats: Do you know that we are the most maligned, persecuted, and cruelly treated beings on this globe?"

"Meou! meou!" was the response from all sides, which translated would read, Aye! aye!

"I hav appointed this meeting for a purpose which I will make known later on. We are made as we are, whether good, kind, faithful, and trusty, or the reverse, by human beings. Those that make us the former I find to be humanitarians and reformers and just in all their dealings, while the latter are selfish, mercenary, and hav all the primitiv traits of character. We are slandered by them, kicked, clubbed, stoned, starved, and by their children pinched, choked, pulled, thrown, whipped, and also dogged, and something must be done. I propose now that a few, or all of us, relate a part of our experience, whether good or bad. Will our Maltese friend on my right please take the stand, and others follow?"

SPEECH OF MALTESE.

"Dear Brothers and Sisters: My first recollection is of playing on a green lawn with my mother, after first eating a mouse which she had brought me, when a large dog rushed into the yard, and almost before she saw him caught and killed her. The family rushed from the house, drove away the dog, and carried me in. They hav a little boy and girl who are very kind to me, and none of the family abuse me, although none of the others pet me. I hav only one complaint to make, and that is, they feed me only on milk. I know one can liv on milk alone, but, oh, how he will long for something to masticate! I would not mind so much if there was plenty of game near by, but I hav caught it all; and as the neighborhood swarms with destructiv dogs, it is unsafe to hunt for it far away. I will close by making this remark: The dog who killed my mother was utterly useless and worthless. He ate the bread and meat from the children, and would not even stay by to protect or play with them, and never guarded the premises by day or night. He roamed the streets by day (only he was sure to be around at meal times), and slept in his kennel at night, while my mother was a worker, keeping the premises free from vermin and even those of our near neighbors, and was never known to do mischief."

KITTY MASON'S SPEECH.

"Dear Friends: I am, as you can see by my looks, a cat who is never fed. My people hav a dog as useless as the one mentioned by our friend Maltese. He is fed regularly and abundantly, but will snap and snarl at me if I ask for even a mouthful. They seem to think if they feed me I will not hunt, when I would hav so much more strength and courage to do so if well fed. (Emphatic ayes from the audience.) Nothing is gained in that way by starving us. Two months ago I had six little babies. Oh, they were such beauties! One morning I was very hungry and went out to hunt. I succeeded, after a long time, in finding a small mouse and two grasshoppers. I then returned to my babes; but, alas! only one remained to me. Knowing that people often kill all the kittens but one, I concluded they had killed mine, and, grieved as I was to lose them, I felt that perhaps it was best, as I knew, with the small amount of game I could find, that when they were large enough to require food I could ill supply it. So I tried to be reconciled. But the worst remains to be told. I was hunting one day in the grass, when, what did I find? My little ones! All were dead except one, which was moaning and gasping in its last agonies. I talked to it, I lapped it, and tried to warm it with my body. It was too far gone to take nourishment and soon died. My babes had been thrown out there alive to perish by hunger and cold. ("Terrible!" "Horrible!" "Monstrous!" was heard from every side.)

BUFF'S SPEECH.

"Dear Brothers and Sisters: I am owned by a family who are very kind to me. I am well fed, as you will at once perceive, and petted by them all. I hav the freedom of the house. I am extremely fond of music, and when my young mistress plays the piano I sit on top of it and listen, and when my young master practices on his violin I lie on his shoulder. And when my big master reads the evening paper I curl up in his lap for a nice nap. My big mistress talks to me, but as she has a young babe she cannot hold me. But best of all I love my little mistress. Her name is Lily, and she has golden curls. She never hurts me, but hugs and kisses me, and holds me, and lets me lie on her doll's bed, and always divides with me whatever she has to eat. I hav no kittens, being, as you see, of the male half of cat, and I giv all my game to Lily. Sometimes I bring her as many as four gophers in a day, and several mice, besides a rat or two, and the greatest trouble I hav is because she cannot eat them. I never catch birds, knowing she does not like me to do so. How I wish you all had as good a home and owners as I hav."

TOM JACKSON'S SPEECH.

"Brothers and Sisters: I was nearly but not quite as well treated as our Brother Buff for a long time. But one day a dog caught, and nearly shook the life out of me; indeed he left me for dead. I only partially recovered, and hav since been able to hunt but very little. Since my accident they will not allow me in the house, and never feed or giv me any attention outside. I hav a lame back, a broken leg, and am weak, hungry, and miserable. Could I hav my leg bound up, and be fed and cared for awhile, I would soon recover. Right here I wish to express my surprise that people will keep, feed, and love a worthless dog, and despise and abuse a good cat, who, if fed and cared for, will hav strength and courage to hunt the vermin, and no desire to catch or meddle with young poultry, or pets. There is still another thing that surprises me. You know when we kill anything it is because we are hungry and need it to eat; but with a dog it looks as if he did so just because he liked to take life and it hurt him to see anything liv except himself and his kind. Why, I heard of a few dogs attacking a man in this city one evening when he was walking along about his business in a rather unfrequented street, and he barely escaped with his life. A dog never eats his game, but after depriving it of life leaves it and goes about in search of other victims. If a cat should do a few of these things he would be exterminated as soon as possible; but little is said in disparagement of dogs, whatever they do."

SPEECH OF KITTY PERRY.

"Dear Friends: My owners are all very kind to me, although they do not pet me much. Rover, the dog, and I were raised together from a puppy and a kitten. He is a good dog. He guards and watches everything by day and night—the poultry, the pet lamb, Lulu, and myself. He will permit no other dog to approach me. He was taught to destroy nothing, and to allow nothing destroyed. We are fed together on the same plate, but he knows that on account of his large size he eats faster and more than I do, and always waits for me to eat first. We play together and sleep together. I love him and he loves me."

TOMMY PRESTON'S SPEECH.

"My Friends: I was given the freedom of the house. I could sleep on the bed, or in my mistress's work-box. I always had a dish of milk under the kitchen sink, and could lap it when I chose. They never fed me other things, or petted me, and the little boy often handled me quite roughly, yet I felt that I was much better off than the generality of my kind. But they moved away, and left me to my fate, which has been hard and cruel so far. 'Take Tommy,' said the little boy. 'No,' replied his mother, 'there are cats enough where we are going, and it is a bad sign to move a cat.' I could see no reason or philosophy in that. Instead, although I am only a cat, it looked primitiv and barbarous, and so superstitious. As if it could be a bad sign to move a cat, and not to move a dog, parrot, or canary bird!

"The house was empty for a long time, and I used to lie on the porch and sun myself in the door-yard. But now there is a family living there who hav a bad boy and dog who would kill me if they could, for they hav tried to do so several times, and I dare not go there any more. Oh, it is so heartless and cruel to move away and leave a poor cat alone, unprotected, and uncared for."

KITTY DOLEN'S SPEECH.

"Dear Friends: The family who owns me (I speak of the grown members) are not unkind to me, and occasionally giv me a little milk or a plate of food, I suppose when they think of it; but, oh, the three children are extremely cruel to me. You notice that I am very small in size, a half-grown kitten, but I am a year old, nevertheless. The treatment to which I hav been subjected has kept me from growing larger. They fight over me, and I often receive the blows intended for each other. One will often take me by the fore legs, and another wanting me at the same time will grab me by the hind legs and try to pull me away. I am frequently obliged to kick and scratch for my life, and run and hide to escape a severe whipping for doing so. They used to tie a string around my neck and pull me around by it, but a lady passing one day threatened to complain of them to the officers of the Humane Society, and they hav not done that since. They kick me, throw water on me, toss me in the air, and sometimes against the house. I might thus continue to relate my sufferings, but I believe I hav done so sufficiently."

Here a large tri-colored cat, yellow, Maltese, and white, accompanied by her daughter Pattie, a beautiful tortoise-shell, half-grown kitten, mounted the platform.

PUSSY RAY'S SPEECH.

"My Dear Brothers and Sisters: We hav a good home with plenty to eat, and any amount of petting. There is one small, white, curly dog who shares all with us, and we are great friends. He likes to chase pigs that are in mischief, but never ill-treats cats, because he has been taught better. A great complaint I hav to make is of the worthless curs belonging to the neighbors coming onto our land when we are hunting, and chasing me and a few other cats and destroying our children, until there are not enough of us in number to capture the gophers, which are so numerous and destructiv where I liv, and our neighbors in consequence resort to poison. One of my sons has recently died a terrible death by eating one of these poisoned gophers. Oh, he was so intelligent and beautiful! His brother, another bright and promising boy, is very ill from the same cause. People say that dogs are more faithful to man than cats. I deny it emphatically. If cats were treated in every respect as kindly as dogs, they would be just as faithful. We will go anywhere with our mistress where it is safe. I hav traveled with my master, mistress, and young mistress three hundred miles, riding on the seat or back part of the wagon with them, the same as the dog. When the horses were unhitched at noon or night I would get down on the ground and hunt and play and hav a fine time, and when I saw the horses were harnessed and being hitched to the wagon again, and heard my young mistress say, 'All aboard, Puss,' I would scrabble in. Now, we only move occasionally short distances, and my mistress puts me in the large cage with the little birds. We hav never moved since my children were born. Do you think we would catch their young poultry, pigeons, rabbits, white mice, or any of their pets? Why, my friends, I refuse to eat them if they get accidentally killed and are given to me. I once nursed a young rabbit with my kittens, and the two white rats eat and run around with us. [From the audience, "You were trained in this manner?"] No, we were never even told not to touch them. We knew they were pets the same as ourselvs, and how could we wish to destroy what our dear master or mistress wish to keep? No, we like them ourselvs because they do, and would protect them instead."

TOM GRAY'S CONCLUDING SPEECH.

"My Dear Friends All: I am well acquainted with Puss and Pattie's owners. They hav befriended me often. They write for the press, and as their big mistress understands cat language, I propose that Puss relate to her our experiences, which she will write and send to some editor for publication, which may be the means of helping us by causing people to feel more kindly toward us."

As there was no dissenting voice to this proposal, Puss has done as requested. I hav not written half of the speeches, as I thought it unnecessary. I assure the editor, and every reader, that their stories are true. I know from actual observation with one exception. I did not see the little kittens dying and dead in the grass, but was told of the fact by an eye-witness. SADIE A. MAGOON.

Notes on New Books.

"Euripides and the Gods," by T. Bush, is a reprint of an article originally appearing in the Independent Pulpit. It is a consideration of Greek philosophy and religion, with more than incidental comparisons with, and reflections upon, Christianity. It is pleasantly written. Price, 10 cents.

Those interested in the welfare of the Quakers, or Friends, and desirous of knowing what one of them thinks to be the reason why the sect is declining so fast, should send 25 cents to the Friends' Book Association, 15th and Race streets, Philadelphia, for "Ritualism and Dogmatic Theology," by Thomas H. Speakman. The prominent idea of the pamphlet is that the Friends hav got too much theology.

A curious view of Burns is taken by Alexander Webster in a little 75-cent book called "Burns and the Kirk." It is that Burns was a religious reformer, playing to Calvinism the part of a Luther to Catholicism—a re-maker of Scottish religion, and a deeply religious man himself. The book is sufficiently appreciativ of Burns, but the arguments do not convince us that the poet was what Mr. Webster thinks him to hav been.

There are two good articles in the Arena for this month—M. J. Savage's "Then and Now," showing the changes in men's acts and opinions since ante-bellum days; and Helen Gardener's "Thrown in with the City Dead," a description of Potter's field on Hart's island in the Sound. Lyman Abbott gives his opinion of "What Is Christianity," but he and John Calvin would decidedly disagree.

DONALD KENNEDY

Of Roxbury, Mass., says

Don't write to me when taking the first bottle of my MEDICAL DISCOVERY. I know how it makes you feel, but it's all right. There are certain cases where the DISCOVERY takes hold sharp, but it is the diseased spot in you it has taken hold of, and that's what you want. The DISCOVERY has a search warrant for every humor, from backache to scrofula, inside and outside, and of course it makes a disturbance in your poor body, but the fight is short, you are better by the second bottle; if not, then tell me about it, and I will advise. I will, however, in the future, as in the past, answer any letter from a nursing mother.

Sincerely yours,
DONALD KENNEDY,

THE TRUTH SEEKER CO.

FOR HER DAILY BREAD.

A NINETEENTH CENTURY NOVEL.

Preface by R. G. INGERSOLL.

For Her Daily Bread is the story of two young girls and a younger brother who were left parentless, with little money, fair education, and much courage, to make their way through the world by going to Chicago. The author is also the heroin. The narrativ is, in the main, a history of a working girl's life and experience in the city of Chicago among bluff business men, kind-hearted folks, and disreputable hypocrits. It is just such a story of human life as we should expect Colonel Ingersoll to be interested in; and whatever he admires and appreciates is sure to be worth the attention of the rest of the world. Price 25 cents.

TRY-SQUARE:

OR,

The Church of Practical Religion.

BY REPORTER.

This is the history of an attempt to found a church without superstition, and its success. Uncle Job Sawyer, the pastor, having established his pulpit, uses it to discuss all the vital questions of human concern, religious, political, and otherwise. The book is written in well-chosen language, and easily understood. There is just sufficient narrativ about it to interest the reader and hold his attention while the truth is being brought to his mind.

Professor Kooh will decline the proposed national testimonial in the form of money. Esteem of his lymph is declining. The violence of its effects on the system has caused several deaths, while it has performed only one undoubted cure, which was of lupus. Medical men now think it good in lupus, doubtful in bone diseases, and, as far as proved, of no efficacy in consumption. Nevertheless, consumptivs still flock to Berlin.

To the States or any one of them, or any city of the States, Resist much, obey little,
Once unquestioning obedience, once fully enslaved,
Once fully enslaved, no nation, state, city of this earth, ever afterward resumes its liberty. —Walt Whitman.

What we want to-day is what our fathers wrote down. They did not attain to their ideal; we approach it nearer, but hav not reached it yet. We want, not only the independence of a state, not only the independence of a nation, but something far more glorious—the absolute independence of the individual.—Ingersoll.

Giv me matter, I will show you how a world shall be evolved thence. —Kant.

It is quite intelligible that those who believe in a vengeful God, and an everlasting hell, should tremble on "the brink of eternity;" and it is natural that they should ascribe to others the same trepidation.—G. W. Foote.

The Christian religion fails to produce the results claimed for it. An intelligent physician states that he has witnessed more fear of death and more distress upon the death-bed among Christians than among unbelievers. He says he has never witnessed a painful death of an unbeliever. His explanation is that Christians contemplate the end of life and a future state more frequently, and the proofs are not strong enough to allay the fears that these meditations arouse. Everyone can recall aged "saints" who hav lived excellent lives and hav always been devout and prayerful, yet who close their lives in gloom and despondency. . . . The Rationalist has superior grounds for a glad and hopeful spirit.—Adams.

Indestructibility of force, indestructibility of matter, ceaseless change of motion, work, and velocity—such is the general result of our present physical science.—Buchner.

Each changing place with that which goes before,
In sequent toil all forwards do contend.

Crawls to maturity, wherewith being crowned,
Crooked eclipses 'gainst his glory fight,
And Time, that gave, doth now his gift confound.
Time doth transfix the flourish set on youth,
And delves the parallels in beauty's brow,
Feeds on the rarities of nature's truth,
And nothing stands but for his scythe to mow. —Shakspere.

To the World's Columbian Exposition Commission:

Learning that there is an organized movement among the more conservative church people—manipulated by a "Sabbath" organization—to induce your honorable body to close on Sundays the World's Fair, to be held in 1893 in Chicago, the undersigned respectfully put in this counter petition, and ask that the Fair may be open to the public on each Sunday of its continuance. We ask this for the following reasons:

1. That the American principle of separation of church and state may be maintained.

2. That public morality may be subserved by providing a substitute for the immoral places to which men may resort when no moral amusements are available.

3. As a matter of justice also to the people of Chicago who have given of their means to make the Fair possible, tens of thousands of whom can visit the Fair only on a general holiday; and as a matter of justice also to the visitors to the Fair, whose time or means may be limited, and who certainly are entitled to great consideration at your hands.

4. For the public good. The opening of the Fair on Sunday will be for the benefit not only of Chicago, but of the whole country. The rights of no one are infringed, the happiness of no one disturbed. Those who wish to attend can do so; those who do not can otherwise spend the day. This is a solely humanitarian question, a question of human relations and human welfare, and, therefore, the only standard by which you can decide is that of the public welfare.

5. It will benefit the Fair, attracting a much larger attendance, interesting more people in it, and increasing its receipts.

6. To the objection that Sunday opening of the Fair will destroy the day as a rest-day, we affirm that the tendency would be exactly the opposite. The more beautiful you make Sunday, the more attractive, the more noble and varied in its pleasures and instructions, the more difficult it will be to change its character, the less danger there is that employers will ever have the power to transfer it from its present position to the days of toil. With choice of Sunday occupation restricted to attending church or visiting a saloon, the average workingman would choose to keep on laboring.

7. Finally: Opening the World's Fair on Sunday will harm no one but the keepers of immoral places, while it will benefit the Fair itself, the people of Chicago, and the visitors to the Fair, thereby conducing to municipal prosperity, individual education, public morality, and the development and good of the whole country.

Notes and Clippings.

FOUR thousand "cheap manuscript sermons" are advertised in a London journal. Over here, says the World, cheap sermons superabound.

THE Russian government has forbidden the newspapers to publish a petition drawn up by the Jews asking that they be placed on a civil equality with other classes in Russia. An edict of the ministry of lands directs that no work in connection with the government shall be given to Jews outside of the territorial limits assigned to them.

THE Hebrew Standard says: "Nehemiah essayed to stop traffic and trading on the Sabbath, and with a marked degree of success. If some modern Nehemiah would call upon our thoughtless Jewish ladies and point out to them the inconsistency of Sabbath shopping, the community would be benefited by it." How like the talk of the Christian Sabbath Union this sounds, and yet the Standard means Saturday.

THE religious Kansas City Star says that every convict in the state penitentiary is furnished with a Bible and they are always found to be in an excellent state of preservation. The Kansas Blade suggests that they be furnished each a copy of the "Arabian Nights," and at the end of the year see which gives evidence of the most use. Both are ancient books and abound in marvelous tales. The Star says the convicts don't care "much for the revealed word," but devour everything in the newspapers, even to the advertisiments.

THE newspapers of Constantinople announce that the government intends to send Mohammedan missionaries into the Turkish possessions in Africa with the purpose of preserving the followers of the prophet from the seductions of European missionaries, who hav gone into those parts to spread the Catholic faith. The propagandists will giv a very practical direction to their enterprise, and, besides inculcating the true faith, will found many schools and establish asylums where the poor may get shelter and food without pay.

ON a recent Sunday evening a prominent Sabbath Union orator was holding forth to a small audience in a church in this city; on the opposit corner Gilmore's band was discoursing sweet music to a crowded house. The situation was not to the orator's liking, and, in the bitterness of his soul, casting a sad look upon his handful of hearers, he remarked, "If you would close up that synagog of Satan over there, you would hav more people in here." And that desire—the wish to fill the churches—says the American Sentinel, accounts for the milk in the American Sabbath Union cocoanut.

OUR brethren outside the fold, says the Catholic Review, meaning the Protestants, hav a hard time with the separation of church and state. With the right hand they are doing all in their power to sustain their own privileges in all public institutions, and with the left they are doing their utmost to pull these privileges down. The recent school conference in New York illustrates this point admirably. It declared for an utter divorce of church and state one moment, and the next it praised this state for its teaching of Christian morals and its maintenance of religious exercises. We must ask the members of the conference what consistency lies in their position.

A CORRESPONDENT sends the Christian Register the following incident: Mrs. A. and her five-year-old daughter recently had a Jewish neighbor die, leaving a pretty boy-baby orphan dependent on public sympathy. His condition appealed very strongly to little Miss A., and she tried to convince her mother of the advantages it would be to the baby to hav them for mother and sister. Mrs. A., with the idea of settling the matter, said, "But, Mabel, he is a Jew; and you wouldn't hav a Jew for a brother, would you?" Mabel thought for a moment and then said, "No, mamma; but couldn't you spank him and make him believe in Christ?" This little girl, says the Register, was simply putting into childish phrase the spirit and method of coercion illustrated again and again in the history of the Christian church.

AT a recent teacher's institute in Pittsburgh, Pa., the subject of religion in the public schools was discussed. "Dr. Noss," says the Pittsburgh Dispatch, "paid a high tribute to the German system, which he said cultivated the pupil's thinking powers, physical powers, and moral powers. He did not think that the Protestant teachers should be greatly offended when their Catholic contemporaries speak of the godlessness of the public schools. He was of the opinion that religion should go hand in hand with secular training, and that the result would be that the moral education of children would be greatly furthered." Superintendent Luckey took issue with Dr. Noss in regard to religion in the schools. He said that if intense religious instruction would produce a nation of Infidels like the Germans, he did not want religious instruction in American schools. It was impossible, he said, to giv secular and religious instruction in the public schools.

THE San Francisco Argonaut says: "Thos. O'Brien, an Irish Roman Catholic, was elected over A. B. Maguire, an Irish Roman Catholic, for tax-collector, because he was loyal and sends his children to the public schools, while his opponent is credited with being a Jesuit, and the Jesuit branch of the church was playing its tricks with a stiletto and by stabbing with secret circulars. John Swett was elected over his opponent, J. C. Ruddock, by over seven thousand majority for superintendent of schools in San Francisco; both being capable. Swett was New England born, and favored free, non-sectarian schools Ruddock was of Irish extraction and a member of the papal church. A Mr. James W. Anderson was nominated by the Republican convention for state superintendent of schools; the Democracy nominated a Mr. Henry C. Hall, formerly of Virginia. He favored parochial schools, because he had become a convert to the church of Rome. Anderson was a Protestant and from the North, and he was elected by a decisiv and overwhelming majority. The issue was the public school question, and Rome was beaten. Not one of the twelve school directors of the city and county of San Francisco is a Romanist, and there could not hav been elected a single member of the board of education if he had been suspected of loyalty to the pope of Rome."

In Europe while the church ruled the roads were infested with thieves and robbers, and oftentimes the victim was made to say his prayers before having his throat cut, in order to hav him die like a Christian. Mexico, South America, and some other countries are little better to-day. The cross marked every church and grave and house, and nearly every garment worn by the people. Such was the result of the God majority in Europe for more than a thousand years.

How did this majority work in our own country? In 1620 a company landed on our eastern shore who had left home and friends and country to encounter a rigorous climate, an unbroken forest, wild beasts, and savages, for the privilege of worshiping God according to the dictates of conscience. They believed God was on their side, and that whichever side God was on constituted a majority. If there ever was a people whom we should expect to be tolerant, considerate, magnanimous, and humane, who would deal out equal justice and be governed by the strictest moral code, and regard every human being as a brother, and grant to every man the fullest freedom, it would be the Pilgrim fathers, as they were called, driven to these inhospitable shores, as they claimed, for the purpose of enjoying full and perfect freedom. Notwithstanding the fact that the rules for the government of their society were taken almost exclusivly from the Bible, and notwithstanding the fact that they looked to God for counsel and believed that he sanctioned every act, they were the most bigoted, intolerant, and tyrannical people in the world, and committed some of the most brutal acts recorded on the page of history. They whipped women and dragged them through the streets at the tail end of carts. They hanged helpless old women as witches. They banished Quakers, who found more hospitable quarters among savages than among Christians. They imprisoned men and women for not attending church on Sunday. Their punishment for differing from them in religious opinions was barbarous and cruel. In some states their inhuman penalties are still standing upon the statute books—such as branding, cropping of ears, slitting of noses, boring the tongue with a hot iron, etc. These terrible penalties were inflicted for such offenses as ridiculing the Bible, denying the holy trinity or the existence of God. And for a repetition of some of those offenses the death penalty was inflicted.

Did Infidels ever behave worse than that? Such hav been the consequences of Christian fanaticism and cruelty when God has been on the side of Christians. Oh, there is nothing so much to be dreaded as this God majority and Christian cruelty!

To-day, November 19th, while I am writing this article on my knee, I am passing my seventy-first mile-post. At the best I hav only a few years longer to stay. Will some young Liberal pledge himself to take my place when I am gone? And will all young Liberals remember these facts as I hav related them? And when some ignorant or lying minister—as one has recently done in Naples—stands up and tells the people that Christianity has produced all the great men and built all the institutions of learning, and carried with it the highest civilization wherever it has been introduced, refer him to these facts, and tell him they are interwoven into the history of the country and cannot be denied. If he is too ignorant to know these facts, he is too ignorant to be a teacher. If he is dishonest enough to cover them up, let him meet that scorn and contempt which he so justly deserves.

I refer to these matters not because I wish to injure the feelings of Christians, but because the truth ought to be known. When the people are more generally informed in regard to these facts, the theological stool-pigeons will no longer be able to lure the masses into their ecclesiastical gull traps.

The people are generally made to believe that the Christian religion exerts a healthy moral influence wherever taught.

This I deem a false impression, and the people ought to be disabused in regard to the matter. Christianity has not been the promoter of good morals in many countries where it bears sway—notably in Russia, Abyssinia, Italy, Spain, Portugal, Mexico, and South America.

Neither is it true, as sometimes stated, that all great and good men hav been Christians. In the arts and sciences, in literature and morals, as great and good men hav been produced outside of Christianity as Christianity could ever boast of. Has Christianity ever produced greater philosophers or more moral men than Plato and Socrates? Has it ever produced a greater or wiser lawgiver than Solon? A greater orator than Demosthenes? A greater general than Alexander the Great? Greater poets than Euripides, Sophocles, Virgil, and Homer? And it is claimed by many that the ancient painters and sculptors hav never been equaled up to the present time.

Yet these were all pagans, and lived long before the Christian religion was introduced, and could not therefore owe either their greatness or goodness to the influence of its teaching.

If these great and good men could be produced independently of the Christian religion, can it be said that the great and good men of our own time are the outgrowth of that religion? When such men as Ingersoll, Draper, Oswald, Proctor, Huxley, Jefferson, Keats, Shelley, and scores of others, stand in the front ranks of poets, orators, historians, statesmen, and scientists, and stand before the world with characters as pure as snow, does it look as if that particular system of religion was necessary to produce great and good men?

The truth is that great and good men are not now, and never hav been, the outgrowth of, or peculiar to, any system of supernatural religion. It depends on the degree of civilization, and that upon the climate, the soil, and environment, and not upon any system of religion.

When the heat was on for the acquisition of Cuba, a member of Congress asked Mr. Ingersoll what he thought about obtaining Cuba. "We don't want it," promptly replied the colonel. "Why," said the Congressman, "it has one of the finest climates ever spread out under heaven, and the most productiv soil of any country on earth; why don't we want it?" "I'll tell you," said the colonel. "You may take twenty sons of professors in colleges, and twenty sons of ministers, and send them over there, and the second generation will be found riding on mules with hay halters, barefoot, their hair sticking out of the crowns of their hats, with a rooster under each arm, going to a cock fight. It is not a good place to raise first-class American citizens. I tell you, sir, we don't want it." With the soil, the climate, and surroundings there is probably no system of religion in the world which would prevent that result. He further said that this world was better adapted to fish culture than man culture—that there was only a narrow belt around the earth which produces first-class men; and that is true in spite of all religions.

And this is just how Christianity holds its grip on the people. There are thousands who pay pew-rent and uphold the ministers who take no stock in their platitudes, yet encourage the wife and the children to attend church, because after all they think it exerts a moral influence, or in any event can do no harm. But deception never did and never can promote good morals; the ministers who teach it fall into more pitholes than any other class of men according to their numbers.

Christians claim that all our ideas of morality are derived from the Bible, and that they can come from no other source. Here is where Christianity and Liberalism part company. Let us quote a few lessons from this great fountain-head of morality, and see if the practice of the commandments would tend to elevate the people to a high plane of morality.

"Ye shall eat the flesh of your sons and the flesh of your daughters" (Lev. xxvi, 29).

"Thou shalt eat the fruit of thine own body, the flesh of thy sons and thy daughters" (Deut. xxviii, 53).

"The fathers shall eat the sons, and the sons shall eat the fathers" (Ezek. v, 19).

"I will cause them to eat, every one the flesh of his friend" (Jer. xix, 9)

Now, I ask those who support the ministers and pay pew rent, and send their children to church for the good influence, if they want their children turned into cannibals.

I am aware that this kind of morality will never be taught in the church. Indeed, the utmost care will be taken to keep the attention of the people away from the filth and barbarity of much of the Bible. But it is there, and it would be ruinous to the church for the people at large to know all the abominations which the holy cess-pool contains. Does the story of David and Bathsheba contain a good moral lesson for the young? Does the story in which Lot is represented as being warned by divine interposition to flee from the destruction of the city of the plains and as becoming at once the father and the grandfather of his daughters' children, prove bracing to good morals? Does the privilege granted in the Bible of selling tainted meats hav a tendency to make men honest in their dealings? Does the story of drunken old Noah induce men to practice temperate habits?

The attention of a Christian was called to some of these passages not long ago and he denied that any such stuff could be found in the Bible. When the passages were read to him he became furious, and said if he had such a Bible he would burn it. And I agree with him; such teaching ought to be burnt out or kicked out. It is a disgrace to the civilization of the nineteenth century. To teach that such loathsome savagery is the word of God is to spit in the face of common sense, and outrage the soul of decency.

Teaching the people to hav faith in an old book filled with absurdity and obscenity, and in a system of revealed religion, instead of teaching the principles of a lofty manhood, fills the world with unscrupulous hypocrits, and makes them liv out an ugly lie every day of their lives.

There is a protracted meeting now in full blast in Naples. The minds of many are worked up to a white heat. By command of the church all places of business are closed after 7.30 o'clock every evening. All the windows are placarded to that effect. One man who has crawled on his belly and licked up the ecclesiastical spittle, said they might "fife and whistle, but it did not prove their stuff to be true."

Another man who has had much to say about the bad influence which my teaching exerts in society, and sings in the choir and sits with bowed head and looks very sanctimonious, went home the other day and told a particular friend that he did not believe a "damned word of it." And that is what this religious teaching does for men; it makes them very dishonest, and induces them to make pretenses before the world which they abhor in their souls. It does not promote morality, it does not make people better. Its tendency is directly in the opposit direction, and I go on to prove it.

Everyone knows that no outspoken Infidel could be elected to any important office in the United States. All the successful politicians are impliedly Christians. Every four years vast sums of money are raised to carry on the political campaigns. Wanamocker gave $10,000 to go into the corruption funds when Harrison was elected. The Democrats applied all the money they could raise for a similar purpose. It is an open secret that this money is used to buy votes, and win in the political contest by any means foul or fair.

Ingalls is a great politician and a great Christian. He said the Sermon on the Mount, and the decalog, had nothing to do in politics. In a speech at Topeka he said: "The old Romans had a saying, 'Money does not stink however acquired.' 'Votes do not smell badly after they are cast and counted,' no matter how procured. Numbers, not quality, obtain the certificate of election." Here is set forth the honesty of a great Christian.

Neal Dow said that politicians would lie, cheat, perjure themselvs, bribe voters, miscount votes, stuff ballot-boxes, falsify voting lists, or any other thing which they think advantageous to their party. And he does not forget to say that many of them are church members in good standing. Such is a fair specimen of church influence and church morals.

From the politician to the criminal the transition is easy and natural. Both furnish lessons of instruction. All who read the papers know that nearly everyone who takes the rope route to escape the evils of this world is attended by a priest or minister or spiritual adviser, and Christ and God and heaven are his last words before starting for his celestial home.

Guiteau, the murderer of Garfield, sung and talked about heaven while standing on the gallows. Otto, who murdered his wife and was hanged in Buffalo, regretted that his wife had died unrepentant, and could never meet him in heaven, where he should quickly appear.

Herri, an Italian who has paid much attention to crimes and criminals, says that crime is closely related with religion or superstition. Among two hundred murderers he did not find one who was irreligious.

Cassenova, himself a great criminal, says all those who liv by unlawful means confide in the help of God.

In the city of Naples there are sixteen murderers to every one hundred thousand inhabitants. Naples is one of the most religious cities in Europe.

"No other city," says Caropalo, who has made special study of the Neapolitan criminal, "is so close an observer of the practices of the church. But the murderer, still stained with the blood he has just shed, devoutly fasts, even while he is meditating a fresh assassination. The vilest woman places the image of the Virgin near her bed and devoutly prays before it."

Out of five hundred criminals Marro found forty-six per cent regular attendants at church. A man imprisoned for rape reprimanded the prisoners when he heard them use irreverent language. "I do not imitate them," said he; "morning and evening I say my prayers." In one prison a convict turned evangelist and held regular services every day, and seemed just as enthusiastic as Sam Jones when he conducts a protracted meeting at two hundred dollars a week. It is found that the strictest observers of church ceremonies hav the largest representation on the criminal list, while those who are considered the most lax, viz., Quakers and Universalists, hav the smallest, while the few Infidels who hav been imprisoned hav been convicted in almost every instance, not for crimes committed against society, but for crimes against the church.

That the Christian religion should tend to produce criminals is not to be wondered at. When they read in a book which they hav been taught to regard as sacred that God's chosen people borrowed without any intention of paying, and were commanded to do so by God himself; when they read that innocent people can be sacrificed, as Jephthah's daughter; that innocent babes were murdered by God's command and mothers ripped up alive and girls torn from their parents and given over to a brutalized soldiery; that men could rob and plunder and wage wars of extermination, and keep women enough around them as wives or concubines to shame a Turkish harem; that they could sell tainted meat with God's approval—is it any wonder, I say, that people, with such belief, should swell the criminal list in any country where such belief is entertained? There are many passages of scripture which seem to license men to walk in crooked ways.

For instance, God hardened Pharaoh's heart so that he could not let the Israelites go, and then brought the most terrible curses upon the whole people because he did not. A meaner act was never recorded for either God or man. Would not such acts on the part of God naturally lead one to think that any mean act performed in the name of God would be justifiable?

There are other passages which are not well calculated to provoke men to good works, such as the following, viz.: "God shall send them strong delusions that they may believe a lie." "Being crafty I caught them with guile." "For if the truth of God hath more abounded through my lie unto his glory, why yet am I also judged as a sinner?"

Now, I do not quote these passages for the purpose of giving the Christians a raking down—far from it. I call attention to them out of a good motiv. Because I believe they exert a bad influence over the minds of men. While I believe there are portions of the Bible which are grand and sublime, and calculated to exert a good influence over the mind, yet to teach that such passages as I hav quoted are the words of God is a wickedness, it seems to me, that no well-meaning man would be guilty of.

There are other passages of scripture well calculated to produce disastrous effects, both mental and moral.

A few years ago a man, under religious excitement, read the account of Jephtha's daughter, and became impressed with the idea that he ought to sacrifice his daughter. Twice he attempted to burn her on a pile of wood, and twice, by mere accident, she was rescued. In the last attempt he burnt her clothes nearly off, and blistered her limbs fearfully. A woman held the hands of her little boy upon a hot stove to giv him a foretaste of what he would hav to suffer if he was wicked and went to hell.

The father of a little boy was quite sure that God had commanded him to offer "little Benny" as a sacrifice, as Abraham was commanded to offer up his son Isaac. He plunged a large knife into little Benny's body splitting through his breastbone, and inflicting a mortal wound. Benny did not die immediately, and asked his mother to put him in his little bed. When the fever raged and his throat became parched he asked for water, which was refused him for fear it would make God angry to relieve his suffering. The mother said she supposed it was the will of God, but it seemed hard. When the authorities disinterred little Benny, the father put him upon his knees, and held him in position while he showed how he thrust the knife into him.

Years ago a minister whipped his little boy to death in a cellar because he could not spell a word. He had read and believed if he "spared the rod" he would "spoil the child."

The story of Freeman and his daughter is familiar to all. His little girl was sleeping when he plunged a long knife to her heart. She opened her eyes and said, "Papa!" and all was over.

(TO BE CONCLUDED.)

Let Us Return Thanks.

Why should we return thanks? I never feel like thanking any persons unless they hav put me under obligations to them. For instance, I never feel like running across the street to thank a stranger that I never saw, unable to tell him why I was thanking or what for. Yet there are people in this country who run after a strange God to thank him at least once a year, according to the commands of their high priests and governors. But do they return thanks? In my opinion there is as little reverence for the day and the God they pretend to worship as I hav—and that is none. It is a mere form with the presidents and governors that they issue those Thanksgiving edicts. It is only a sop thrown to the bigots, who pretend to think the people want to suspend work in order to "thank God" for the kindness shown them during the year. The evidence of the hypocrisy is shown by the indifference to the command. The people as a general thing pay no attention to it. And why should they?

At this place on Thanksgiving day a poor miner was mashed almost to death by falling slate in the mine. The thought occurred to me as I heard it: What has that poor fellow got to thank G-a-u-d for? Other men are feasting and making merry, while this poor fellow and his class are crawling in the mines like worms in the dust and darkness, for a pittance to liv upon. Yet they are commanded to thank the Lord by the president and governor. They will not do it, because they hav neither time nor inclination to thank him who shows so little concern about their welfare. This God has brought them into a world without their asking or consent, where they are made to slave like culprits, and then, if they should break "the least of his commands, they are guilty of the whole." Yet his commands are so many that it is almost impossible to keep them; in other words, the devil's mortgage means a foreclosure. How men find it in their hearts to worship such an exacting God, and one with so little concern about their welfare, I cannot tell. Had they been born in hell they could with as much consistency hav thanked Satan for the occupancy of one corner of his sooty majesty's cavern as thank God for the privilege to occupy such an unwholesome place as the mines of America. Hereafter I hope that presidents and governors of this "free" country will withhold their messages. They are nauseating to common-sense people.

Every large city throughout this broad land has charitable institutions in it—insane asylums, asylums for the deaf and dumb, institutes for the blind, widows' and orphans' homes—all of them built, and their inmates kept, by the labors of men—by a tax—yet I hav the first instance to hear of where man complained of such a tax. Then let us return thanks to whom thanks are due—to man for his generosity.

Is There a God?

A vengeful, pitiless, almighty fiend,
Whose mercy is a nickname for the rage
Of tameless tigers hungering for blood.—Shelley.

Long, long ages ago, millions of years before man came upon the earth, the laws of nature (as they are to-day recognized) were in vogue, had been in uninterrupted operation, thus proving their uniformity, also that no supernatural interference could divert them from their regular course. There is not, and never has been, one single instance on record, that can be pointed out, of any irregularity in their career or of any violation whatever. Upon the immutability of their order depend the calculations of the astronomer, and by such calculations he is able to predict the exact moment of an eclipse, the return of a comet, the transit of Mercury or Venus across the sun's disk, the time of high and low tides, and the exact place where a solar body can be found at a given time. And the accuracy with which these calculations are given is unanswerable proof of the immutability and uniformity of the laws of nature. But once we admit the existence of a God, and thereby introduce spasmodic action into the machinery of the universe, which would be the case if such a God could supersede or interfere with the regularity of these universal laws, and the result must be instant chaos, disorder, and confusion. Newton's "Principia" would never hav been published, the three laws of Kepler would hav been an abortion, and La Place's "Mechanique Celeste" would hav been written in vain; legitimate sunrise and sunset would be uncertain; the mariner and the agriculturist, the philosopher and the scientist, would be daily baffled at the uncertainty and the reeling of nature's throne. Happily, however, such is not the case, such has never been the case, and such never will be the case. The past systematic succession of events is sufficient proof of this. Now, if I were told that somebody or something called God, an abstraction, made or created both nature and its laws, and that he who made them can also unmake them, change or suspend them, I should reply by saying that it is simply an assertion that is incapable of verification by experience. And I should first require to be shown beyond the possibility of doubt that there is really a God, and second, that he did make nature's laws. I should require to be demonstrated (as we would demonstrate a problem in arithmetic) the existence of a being superior to and outside or independent of the rest of nature, and then how, after establishing definit and physical laws, he could do physical impossibilities. If such a being exists, let him demonstrate his existence to his credulous children in such characters as cannot be mistaken or misunderstood. It is easy for a privileged class to speak upon this subject in vague and general language, but I ask for one positiv fact: If your God is superior to nature's laws, let him make the sun rise in the west and set in the east. Let him cause it to remain stationary or retrograde half a day. Let him make water freeze at 212° Fahrenheit, or vapor rise at 32°. Let him cause gravitation to be suspended or the rotation of the earth to cease. The opposit of these are nature's laws, fixed, definit, and unalterable, and the more we know of them, the less we know of that which is called supernatural.

But, says the Theist, arguing from a necessitarian standpoint, there must hav been a beginning to all this, or, properly speaking, a "first cause." I reply by asking, How, where, when, or what is the "first cause?" The question itself is unthinkable; we cannot imagin a first cause or beginning. The whole of nature is one long, continuous line of cause and effect, each cause being but an effect, and each effect exercising a causativ influence. To conceive a beginning, or first cause, we must break the line somewhere, and by so doing we should annihilate existence, which is impossible. Neither can we imagin an uncaused cause, nor can a cause cause itself, for then it would cease to be a cause (except in relation to what followed) and would become an effect. And therefore it is impossible for man to conceive an origin in nature, i.e., a first cause, i.e., a beginning. Hence, the conclusion to which we are driven is, first, that material existences could not be created from nonentity, for not one single atom of matter exists but what is an activ or passiv agent, or both; second, that action and reaction are reciprocal, death giving rise to life and life eventuating in death; this ring of changes is eternal, without commencement or termination; third, that this belies creation or a beginning, there being no beginning or creation. There could not be. In fact, there is no need for a beginner, or creator, or God. It may be argued, if there is no God, or creator, how came existence? If so, I could only reply that "existence" came not at all, but that "existence" always was, is now, and ever will be, world without end, amen.

Men prate about the insufficiency of nature to produce what we see around us, but in so doing they seem to forget, or rather they do not know, that they are making their own ignorance the measure of nature's power. "Do men know all that nature can do and how she does it?" What right hav they got to demand from me a belief in the supernatural until they hav mastered the natural? What right hav they to dogmatize, and fix limits to the powers of the material world, and ascribe what are as yet secrets in nature to something out of nature? Not only is such a course paradoxical and presumptuous, but it is fatal to all demonstration, for under it reason must be abandoned, facts ignored, and inquiry itself an incongruity. Here, indeed, lies the grand fallacy of all religions, the groundwork of all superstitions. And while "man" has been watching for a "God" who may never come, the priest is watching his opportunity to plunder the poor watcher of his good here, and not until men are modest enough to confess the truth, and honest enough to avow it, will priestly despotism and intolerance be deprived of its power. The name of God has ever been a black, dark cloud across the intellectual atmosphere of man. It has ever been a mighty and effectiv weapon in the hands of the priests, by which they hav been enabled to dominate and subjugate mankind. It does seem surprising to me that men should hav been swayed by motivs so cowardly and so unworthy of them. The priest by pointing to the future has blinded men to the stern duties and realities of life, to be awakened only by the clanking of their chains, to find themselvs the slaves of a king. And the king to show his gratitude has shared his power with the church, and between these inhuman parasites with the ferocity of brigands and robbers, pity finding no place in their cruel hearts, man has been kept in subjection and servitude—in subjection to the one by the awe-inspired dread of the other. In conclusion I could not do better than to quote Shelley in answering the question asked by my title, who, in speaking of the burning of an Atheist, says:

I wept.
Weep not, child, cried my mother, for that man
Hath said, There is no God.

There is no God;
Nature confirms the faith his death groan sealed:
Let heaven and earth, let man's revolving race,
His ceaseless generations, tell their tale.
Let every part depending on the chain that links
It to the whole, point to the hand that grasps its term.
Let every seed that falls in silent eloquence unfold
Its store of argument. Infinity within,
Infinity without, belie creation.

Our London Letter.

The great Booth boom is being well advertised, but in spite of this the money is not coming in at the rate the promoter of the scheme evidently anticipated; the conditional promises of substantial sums will not come to much, judging by present prospects, and those generous individuals who will pay £1,000 if so many others will subscribe a like amount in a certain time, will most probably not be called upon to part with their money. This method of giving is simply laying your own odds against the scheme being carried through, while the general public at once jumps to the conclusion that the promiser is supporting the affair. The religious sectaries were at first loud in their praises, but after reflecting over the matter are now beginning to fight rather shy of Booth and his works. The editor of the Freethinker has treated the scheme exhaustivly, and shows its utter absurdity, and what small probability there is of its being worked out on the lines laid down. Other papers hav taken a retrospectiv view of the Salvation Army, and pointed out that there are no appreciable good results after all the time it has existed, and the thousands of pounds sterling that hav been collected. All this money has practically gone to the aggrandizement of the promoter and his family and immediate friends, and if it were not that the crop of fools never fails, he would hav come to the end of his tether. Socialism is sneered at and decried by the very people who now support the man who has some muddled ideas on the subject, and fancies he can turn the wastrels into first-class citizens. All those he cannot possibly lick into shape are to be exported for some other nation to take in hand, but he does not yet say what country is to be the recipient of his bounty.

The Parnell business is causing great excitement just now, and great efforts are being made by certain parties to oust the chief actor from his position of leader of the Irish party. It is evident this is some political dodge, and the divorce suit is merely a handle to wield the weapon. If it was really a question of immorality, we should hear of a similar outcry in the case of many of the members of the house of landlords. The Connemara case is far worse, and yet this most "noble" individual was not kicked out of his post immediately his foul deeds were divulged to the public. It is nothing but gross hypocrisy on the part of the eminent professing Christians in expressing their horror of such "awful depravity." Christ is not reported to hav thought adultery so very heinous, as he is said to hav told those who wished to punish the woman taken in the act that the ones among them without sin might cast the first stone.

That eminent and humble follower of the Lord, Dr. Lidden, carried out his master's injunction to lay not up treasure on earth almost to the letter, for his personal estate was only valued at the small sum of £47,226. It is interesting to know that by the terms of his will he kindly commits his soul into the hands of almighty God, who will no doubt be highly gratified by the bequest, and probably has by this time sent a special company of angels to guard the treasure to the New Jerusalem.

An article in the current number of the National Reformer, by the editor, on "The Present Outlook for Freethought in England," is a capital sketch, containing as it does a great deal of information in a very small space, and as the writer knows as much about the subject as any man living, it is worthy of careful and repeated perusal, and might be reproduced with advantage in THE TRUTH SEEKER and other American Freethought papers, as a correctiv to some inaccurate versions that it seems hav already appeared.

It is rather inexplicable that two professed Agnostics, Samuel Laing and the marquis of Queensberry, should each hav sent £100 to the Booth scheme, for the great Booth is nothing if not profoundly religious, and his two helpers say they hav no faith in anything of the sort, and are totally opposed to the very creed Booth preaches so loudly. The working of the human mind is a great mystery. J. D.

A Query Answered.

In your article, "Been at Church," in THE TRUTH SEEKER of May 10, 1890, you speak of Josephus's speaking of Christ being an interpolation by Eusebius, and you say Dr. Lardner, Bishop Warburton, Faber, and other ancient writers, consider it so. What I wish to ask is this, can you giv me references where to find these facts, of those writers rejecting this interpolation by Eusebius, or the proof of it being an interpolation? W——.

In reply to the above question, I would refer inquirers to Taylor's "Diegesis," a book that contains more matter for argument against Christianity than any other half-dozen books I know of. It is a perfect mass of proof, just such as all investigators need. It goes back to the beginning of Christianity and sweeps it entirely away—Christ and all. Its facts are so well classified, too, and literally heaped and piled up. On page 386 Taylor says of the famous passage in Josephus: "The passage was first quoted by Eusebius, who exults over it as if he had found a prodigious prize, his exultation itself only serving to awaken suspicion in every critical mind that the passage is but another added to the long list of his own most audacious forgeries, as he immediately subjoins, 'Wherefore since this Hebrew historian hath of old delivered these things in his own writing, answering our savior, what evasion can save those who invent arguments against these things, from standing convicted of downright impudence?' Yet, for all this terrible defiance, the most unquestionably orthodox and best learned of the whole Christian world hav invented arguments against the validity of this passage, and hav shown, to absolute demonstration, the certainty that Josephus did not write the passage, and the probability that Eusebius himself did." Gibbon says: "The passage concerning Jesus Christ was inserted into the text of Josephus, between the time of Origen and that of Eusebius, and may furnish us with an example of no vulgar forgery." Taylor continues: "Conviction has thus far forced itself upon the mind of the highest authority which Christians themselvs can appeal to. Their own all-deciding Dr. Lardner has pronounced this passage to be an interpolation. It is rejected by Ittigius, Blondel, LeClerc, Vandale, Bishop Warburton, and Faber. This latter author suspects that Eusebius himself was the author of the interpolation. What, then, must we think of Eusebius? He is the sheet-anchor of reliance for all we know of the three first centuries of the Christian history."

Lardner says of the passage, "It was never quoted by any of our Christian ancestors before Eusebius. It interrupts the narrativ. It is not quoted by Chrysostom, though he often refers to Josephus, and could not hav omitted quoting it had it been in the text." On page 363 Rev. Robert Taylor says: "If the testimony to Jesus as the Christ had been from the beginning in Josephus's works, it is strange that it should never hav been quoted by ancient apologists for Christianity, and now in the beginning of the fourth century be thought so important as to be quoted by our author in two of his works still remaining"— that is to say, surely Eusebius forged it himself, for the purpose of quoting his own forgery. There was never an advocate of the Christian evidences yet whose conscience would hav any hesitation to such services in so good a cause.

ELMINA DRAKE SLENKER.

A New Christmas Story.

In the long years ago the people lived without any written calendar to keep the years and months and days. And many millions of revolving years passed away before they knew what made or constituted a year, or to even count the changes of the moon upon their fingers. But after many tribes and wandering nations had grown up and passed from human sight away, the laws of evolution at length brought forth a class of better, and a trifle wiser, men.

A certain few of these men commenced to study the stars and to build pyramids and costly temples, and establish a worship of the golden sun.

As the people grew more proud and grand in physical things, they commenced to make to themselvs priests and ruling things. And these, in turn, instituted many silly rites and mock ceremonies to deceive the people and induce a worship of themselvs.

But soon these "holy lords" became too numerous and jealous of each other, and divisions and quarrels ensued.

And the people, too, were having too many Gods, and too many kings and priests to support. Hence tyranny and blood for a season bore rule.

At this period most nations were taught that this world was the only world, and that it always existed, while others thought it had a beginning.

At length there arose another nation with many kings and priests, and they had great authority over the people.

The people of this nation were called Jews.

The priests taught this nation that a great invisible personal king who lived somewhere above the "firmament" made this "big" world in just six days out of a stick of candy, having nothing else to begin with. And that he had three or four nice days to work in before there was any sun.

From this time onward the Jews kept a kind of memorandum of the age of the world, in lunar months and years as they rolled by.

The Jewish priesthood soon became a popular and a paying business.

But one golden calf was not quite sufficient for them all.

Hence many seceded from Jewish authority, and joined with other nations for the establishment of a new era, by the making of a visible "God" in the form of man.

So these priests told the people that a man-god would soon be born, the fact having been seen in a dream.

The purport of the dream seems to be this, that a gust of holy wind, or a personal ghost, would soon make love to a modest young "virgin," and she would become the mother of a beautiful child, and his name should be Christna.

Of course the "invisible God" would be his father and he would be "his only begotten son."

But, as the story is told, it seems the cruel father neglected to look after, or care for, this prospectiv mother. She was left to shift, and support herself, as best she could.

In due time ominous signs appeared. The "wise world" commenced to whisper the words of slander. Oh! poor neglected and deserted Mary! Blame her, not the ghost, nor the gods.

She needed friendship. She sought for and found one (who had been recommended by the priesthood) by the name of Joseph.

It may be sad to relate, but it is said that this lonely virgin—deserted by her seducer—was compelled, by a decree from the king, to walk in company with her friend Joseph many long miles to a great city to be taxed. This city was called Bethlehem. It is located, agreeably to our modern maps, in rather a cold climate—forty degrees north latitude.

Upon reaching this city, both weary and footsore, she found the tax-payers, to support the priesthood, so numerous that no warm fire, or spare room, was left for her.

But necessity became the mother of invention, for a "God" was soon to be born. Her good friend, Joseph, soon found a lonely hovel where beasts were fed. Finding a few sticks and a little straw he made a nest, or bed, in its cold manger, on the 25th of December, year 1 (new style), while the thermometer registered from thirty to forty below zero.

Just think of it! Talmage says it was right here where the "Great Jehovah" permitted his "only begotten son to be born."

Oh, poor child! freezing, freezing, and his father above the clouds, and his poor mother in a swoon, unconscious, half dead. But to be charitable it is presumed that some anti-Jew, or some outside sinner, had compassion on him and his mother, and they lived. For so says the "Christian system."

To perpetuate this miserable superstition, every 25th of December some half-civilized wiseacre, or some Salvation Army tramp, must be dressed in rags and parade himself before little children under the name "Santa Claus." And when the tramp is not at hand, then put a few beechnuts and a baby doll in an old stocking and hang it on a nail in the chimney corner on the night of the 24th, and then in the morning of the 25th call up your children and begin to tell them a whopper by saying that old Santa Claus, or the good old devil, brought them down the chimney during the night.

Out of the foregoing myth came the day called "Christmas." It is accepted as true only by a few nations, and not by the well informed in those.

And thus ends our present Christmas story in the bogus year of a bogus Lord, Dec. 25, 1890.

But let us be merry and joyful on the 4th of July, and also on the birthday of as many "Lord Gods" as our knowledge and clear conscience will permit.

Mr. Vogtherr, president of the Free Religious Association of Berlin, has been sentenced by the provincial court of Potsdam to six weeks' imprisonment.

He had in a lecture used the following expression: "The nursery tale of six days' creation, and a God phantom, are hindrances to mental progress." A minor court had sentenced him to six months' imprisonment, but, your readers remember, he appealed to higher authority.—Freireligiöses-Sonntags-Blatt.

That our readers may know what to expect when the recognition of Christ as the ruler of all nations has been embodied in our laws, we present the following piece of news taken from Freiheit. A few weeks ago a young man was persuaded to enter the village church of Naumburg, Germany. His friends, who were to lunch on our savior's flesh and blood, succeeded in getting him up to the altar, but he resisted most effectually any attempt to make him kneel down. The city authorities sentenced him to eight days' imprisonment for blasphemous conduct.

The clergy of Bohemia is very tolerant indeed. Some time ago the widow of Dr. Brauner died in Paris and was, according to her own wishes, cremated. The ashes were sent to Prague, but the clergy denied to receive them in the church, to sprinkle the box containing the remains, and to pray for her soul. An appeal was made to the archbishop, but he sustained the action taken by his subordinates. It is to be remembered that Mrs. Brauner had while alive contributed several thousand dollars to various religious institutions. But all this was forgotten because of the "Atheistic" disposal of her remains.—Der Lichtfreund.

Considerable excitement exists in the ranks of the Liberal party in Spain. Since the last Catholic congress at Saragossa, where the clergy called upon the queen-regent to assist the holy father in the Vatican against the Atheistic Italian government, the queen has pardoned two Basque priests who were by the court of Bilbao sentenced to five years and seven months' imprisonment for treason against the Spanish government. It is a bad sign, and considering the moral cowardice of the greater part of the Spanish people, as exhibited by concealing their true belief—or better, disbelief—a severe clerical reaction is looked for.—Las Dominicales.

A little volume of "Moral Instruction for Children" has recently been introduced in the schools of Bavaria. The plan is quite novel, and as a means to destroy moral purity and innocence in children it has not its equal. I will take but one example, and add that the rest of the book is worse, and decidedly so. On page 8 of this "moral" instructor it says: "Fourth commandment: Thou shalt honor thy father and mother. Reflections. 1. I hav wished in all earnestness evil to befall my parents (grandparents), guardians, teachers, . . . times (. . . during the week), (. . . during the month)" The blank spaces are to be filled out by the children at the end of each week and month. If nine-tenths of the children using this book do not become moral lepers, liars, or hypocrits it is not the fault of the clergy who originated this move.

In the Russian province of Wiatha a new Christian sect has seen the light of day. These Christians believe only in God, but not in Christ Jesus or the Holy Ghost. During the summer months the members meet in the woods, during winter time in isolated houses, and always at night and in darkness. Among their peculiar notions is one which prohibits them from smoking and drinking for a term of twelve years. As a result of this they are very much in demand as laborers. The government does not interfere with them, only so far as it tries to prevent them from beating into insensibility the drunken clergy, the pops. Some time ago, it is said, the Kuger-Sarta, as is the name of the sect, found a pop on the road in a state of glorious intoxication. They fastened an old door to the top of a high flag-pole, and placed the reverend gentleman on it, and kept him there for a term of five days on bread and water.—Der Freidenker.

GUSTAVE NELSON.

A Period for Messiahs.

In what is to be found the real origin of the Indian messiah craze? Why do the Indians persist on in their curious "ghost dance?"

The popular explanation hitherto has been that the messiah idea, at any rate, is borrowed from Christian teachings. But this is probably a mistake. It is more likely to be a survival of folk-lore traditions which antedate Christianity by thousands of years. Such traditions are universal among the savage peoples of our entire globe, as every comparativ mythologist knows, and they hav been preserved, chiefly by word of mouth, not only among savages, but among peasants and the uneducated classes generally, with the most startling fidelity. Our knowledge of this fact, however, is comparativly recent.

As far back as we can peer through the dim twilight of ancient paganism we see messiahs appearing from time to time, and there is every reason to believe that the date of their appearance was made to accord by learned priests with certain astronomical periods of about six hundred years each. In short, these ancient messiahs are usually sun-gods, and while the story of their doings varied with the locality they bore a well-marked general semblance to each other.

The sun-god in all mythologies is usually born on December 24th to 25th, three days after the winter solstice, when, the southward retreat of the sun being checked, the days begin to lengthen, so that in a very real sense, the sun may be said then to be reborn into the world. We must remember that this is the reason why Christ's birthday is kept by the church upon that date—not because it is definitly known to be the birth-time of Jesus—for among the early Christian fathers there were good authorities for every month in the year—but because the common people were too wedded to the old festival of the sun to giv it up. The church, therefore, wisely grafted the new anniversary upon the old.

But the evil powers of winter and darkness at once seek the life of the sun-child; and the reigning king (winter personified) issues an edict to destroy by frost all the young growing creatures in the country. This "massacre of the innocents," whose tradition is so pathetically preserved by St. Matthew in his beautiful stories of the Christ-child, was sculptured on the rock temples of India many centuries before the Christian era, and was undoubtedly first related of Christna, if not of some earlier deity. The young sun god, however, slips away unharmed through the constellations, and grows in favor daily with God and man.

At the feast of the vernal equinox, of which the Saxon festival to the goddess Eostre (compare our Easter) was a survival, the solar deity appears as a radiant youth who emerges from the wintry underworld of death, bringing life and gladness to all creation—plants, beasts, and men. For at the spring equinox the days which hav ever since the sun god was born at Christmas been lengthening, finally gain upon the nights, so that the powers of light may be now said to triumph over darkness. From this time he mounts higher and higher in the heavens, until he reaches the zenith at the time of the summer solstice (June 21st), when he is received in a blaze of glory into the arms of that ineffable sky father of the blue expanse who was called in Sanskrit Dyaus-Pitar, in Greek Zeus Pater, and in Latin Jupiter.

Some mythologies were content to leave the sun god at this glorious consummation of his life, but most of the folk-lore tales preserve the traditions of a false friend who steadily creeps upon the solar hero and wounds him from behind, or in some way drags him down to the under-world of winter and death at the autumnal equinox, when the nights begin to lengthen over the days. Thus was the solar hero, Siegfried, of the Nibelungen Lied, stabbed in the back, where the treacherous red cross marked his vulnerable part; thus was Baldur, the beautiful, slain by the mistletoe of the evil Loki in Norseland; thus was Achilles wounded in the heel, and thus was King Arthur betrayed by his trusted friend Launcelot and his kinsman Modred.

But, although the sun god sinks to the under-world in the autumn, no evil thing can permanently harm him. He possesses, even in hades itself, the revivifying power of the sun, and, as he passes through the abode of the dead, the souls of the departed gather about him to be redeemed and led up to the new life in the spring. The Christian feast of All Souls, and the Hallowe'en, or nut-crack night, which precedes it, are in reality festivals of the autumnal equinox, which hav gotten belated with the lapse of centuries through imperfections and changes in the calendar. And the ghost dance among our Indians of the Northwest is evidently the survival of the ancient pagan festival of All Souls, a survival which shows internal evidence of having been handed down in the Indian folk-lore and not transmitted through Christianity.

Can we wonder at the persistency of our Indian tribes in keeping up their ghost dance at this season of the year? Can we wonder at the positivness with which they declare that the messiah, who is to save them, will come in the spring? Nor can we wonder at the action of that Indian who, seizing the arm of Mr. Stewart, the agency saddler at Standing Rock agency, forced him to look straight at the blazing sun, exclaiming: "See, there is the Indian messiah now!"

But why should their messiah come all of a sudden this special year? To giv the probable reason—a reason which is not invalidated by the possible use made of it by designing whites and crafty medicin men—we shall hav to again refer to the ancient pagan beliefs.

At one epoch in the world's history the messiah of the spring equinox appeared when the sun was in the zodiacal sign of Taurus, the Bull. At that time the bull was the symbol of the sun god and was sacred to him. In Persia we read of the Mithraic bull; in Egypt of the bull of Apis, and the sacrifice of bulls on the altars of the Romans and other peoples persisted in down to a comparativly late date in history.

But by the mutation ("nodding") of the earth's axis—a movement which resembles the "wobbling" of a top that is running down, but which, in the case of the earth, requires twenty-five thousand years to describe a single complete circle in the heavens—a phenomenon called the precession of the equinoxes takes place. The time came when, by this precession, the vernal equinox had slipped back into the sign of Aries, the Ram or Lamb. Then this last animal became the chosen symbol of the messiah, and both Horus, the Egyptian god, and Christna, were called "the good shepherd." Many of the beautiful similes of the New Testament which deal with sheep, lambs, and shepherds hav their origin in the pagan worship of the sun when in the constellation Aries, and they were undoubtedly adopted by the apostles and other early Christians, because only in this way could the new religion be grafted upon the superstitious observances of the common people. Indeed, it is manifest to every deep student of mythology, that only by this apparent sanction of the older worship can any new belief ever gain a foothold in the affections of the populace.

Just previous to Christ's birth the whole civilized world was on tiptoe with anticipation of a new messiah—the messiah of the sign Pisces, the Fishes, and we read of many "false Christs" who are said to hav asserted themselvs at that time, both before and after the appearance of Jesus himself. And now the time is at hand when, by the precession of the equinoxes, the sun, at the spring equinox, is about to slip back into still another sign—that of Aquarius, the Water Bearer, and we may confidently expect an eruption of messiahs for some little time to come among the savages or among the illiterate of our own people who faithfully preserve in their household customs and folk-lore, without definitly knowing why, the memorials which warn them when a new messiah is at hand. El Mahdi, the Arabic prophet, was perhaps the first of these nineteenth century reincarnations of the solar messiah, although he posed rather as human, acting under divine guidance; Schweinfurth, with his following of singularly deluded and hypnotized women, is a second of these messiahs; and now the subject of this craze among the Indians of the Northwest is a third. But the end is not yet; there are more to follow from the ranks of ignorant enthusiasts in the near future, for the time of the astronomical change whose memorial the folk-lore of the common people has preserved in a hundred and one unobtrusiv ways is at hand; and moreover, we are at the end of the regular six-hundred-year period when, after a certain conjunction of the sun and moon, the new solar messiah is likely to be born.

It is greatly to be deplored that the government has not made a point of sending some good comparativ mythologists out in the field to study up this Indian ghost dance. It is an opportunity which has probably never occurred before to the American people, and which will probably never occur again, of studying, at the fountain-head, memorials of sun-myths handed down from a prehistoric past. When the occasion which called forth the present messiah craze shall hav passed, many of the priceless folk-lore memorials which could now be so easily obtained will hav slipped out of sight of the white race, to be tucked away in the memories of their Indian owners, and only to be gotten at by white folk-lore students with hard digging.—*Ida C. Lectures and Meetings.

"CREEDS and Morals" will be Starr H. Nichols's subject at the Manhattan Liberal Club, 220 East 15th street, Friday evening, December 19th.

THE Brooklyn Philosophical Association, Bedford avenue and South Second street, Brooklyn, E.D., will listen to Mr. E. L. Starck on "Logic in Language," Sunday afternoon, at 3 P.M., December 21st.

W. F. JAMIESON will probably deliver a lecture before the Chicago Secular Union on "What Freethinkers Believe and Disbelieve." The Liberals of Chicago would like to hav a debate, if a clergyman could be found to meet Jamieson.

"REMINISCENCES," by Lucy N. Colman, ($1) is the story of a life spent in the interests of truth and freedom, and particularly in support of the antislavery agitation and in furtherance of the abolition of "woman's wrongs," as expressed by Mrs. Colman. The "Reminiscences" are full of curious experiences, not the least of which was the interview of the authoress with President Lincoln, who avowed that he was not an Abolitionist, and would not free the slaves if he could save the Union in any other way. "He believed in the white race, not in the colored, and did not want them put on an equality." The book contains excellent portraits of Mrs. Colman and of her friend Mrs. Amy Post, a short notice of whose activ life concludes the volume.—Tarrytown Record of the Times.

CHRISTIANITY, when consistently interpreted, assures its followers of tribulation in this world, and the hopelessness of all efforts to advance the moral welfare of the human race. The teachings of Jesus and Paul are pessimistic. Things are to wax worse and worse till the coming of Christ to destroy the world, out of which he saves his chosen few. It is the Christian then who is without hope in the world.—Adams.

A Rejected Article.

[In the Des Moines daily News, of November 11th, we read an account of the formation of a "Sunday Rest Association," and a brief synopsis of its platform. Thinking that the readers of that journal would like to hear the other side of the question, I sat down and wrote a reply to the principles of the association, and mailed it to the editor. Several days passed, but the article did not appear. Determining to know the cause of this, I called upon the editor of the News in his sanctum. That gentleman received me very courteously, and when I made known my business he said that he had not read the entire article, but from what he had read of it he had decided to withhold its publication for fear that it would raise theological rancor. I replied that my object in writing was to merely state facts, though I knew they were facts that the majority of the people were ignorant of, and that those who did know of them as a rule did their best to keep the public ignorant of them. He then answered that he would reconsider the piece, and if he decided not to print it, would preserve the manuscript. I waited several days longer, and as it still did not appear, I called again and received the manuscript. I would not say an unkind word against the editor of the News. He has done, not only myself, but the Secular Union of this city many a favor that I shall long remember, and I am positiv that had he been able to conform to his own wishes he would hav published my article. But there is a class of men in every community whose business it is to suppress all discussion upon religious subjects. They hate the truth, and they hate a man who speaks it, and they also hate a newspaper that publishes it. This class of persons, it is to be regretted, exercise a power by which they can boycott a journal that will publish an article setting forth their evil doings, and especially their unblushing hypocrisy upon the Sunday question, and unless a paper is so firmly established that these small Goliaths of superstition cannot assail it, it is in many cases compelled to succumb to its authority. There are hundreds of editors who are in hearty sympathy with Freethought and Secularism who dare not express their opinions for fear of the ruining of their business by Christian bigots. One editor that I know of was once heard to remark that the entire religious business is the meanest thing that a newspaper has to contend with. With these words in explanation, I submit the rejected article to the readers of THE TRUTH SEEKER, that they may form for themselvs an opinion of a cause that will not permit such facts as are here presented to be placed before the public.—F. S.]

EDITOR OF THE NEWS: In the issue of your paper for November 11th, we find an account of the formation of a "Sabbath Rest Association," and a synopsis of its principles. As the News professes to be an independent paper, no apology need be made for criticising either the association or its principles in these columns. After speaking of the history of the organization, the News proceeds to state, "The main object of the work is to preserve and promote Sunday as a day of religious worship." But when Rev. Wilbur F. Crafts, the high priest of the Sunday movement, was in Des Moines in August, he distinctly asserted, and reiterated the assertion many times, that the new Sunday law, proposed by the American Sabbath Union, is based upon civil and not on religious grounds. The difference is, that the Sabbath Association of Des Moines is more honest than the society of which Mr. Crafts is secretary. It wants the government to recognize Sunday as a day of religious worship, and has the candor to say so, while the national Sunday organization desires the same thing, but knowing that the people will overwhelmingly crush such a measure if they understand its true nature, just as Congress crushed the first Sunday bill brought before it, they hypocritically profess to advocate a civil Sabbath. To add to the absurdity of this profession, we may say that we already hav a civil Sabbath in the majority of the states, and hence the talk of a new law to bring about what we already hav is the sheerest nonsense. As these gentlemen claim that the object of their association is to promote the observance of Sunday as a day of religious worship, which includes the total abstinence from all secular work on that day, we certainly hav the right to inquire of them their authority for so doing. When we ask this question we are most invariably referred to the commandment, "Remember the Sabbath day to keep it holy, . . . for in six days the Lord made heaven and earth, the sea and all that in them is, and rested on the seventh day, wherefore the Lord blessed the seventh day and hallowed it" (Ex. xx, 8–11). But if this injunction is binding, is not the following equally so? "And six years shalt thou sow thy land and gather in the fruits thereof; but the seventh year shalt thou let it rest and lie still, that the poor of thy people may eat, and what they leave the beasts of the field shall eat. In a like manner shalt thou deal with thy vineyard and with thy oliv yard" (Ex. xxiii, 10, 11). If the proposed law is enacted, a penalty for its violation must accompany it. Why not be consistent and adopt the Bible penalty? "While the children of Israel were in the wilderness, they found a man gathering sticks on the Sabbath day, and they that found him gathering sticks brought him unto Moses and Aaron, and unto all the congregation. And they put him in ward, because it was not declared what should be done to him. And the Lord said unto Moses, The man shall surely be put to death; all the congregation shall stone him with stones without the camp" (Num. xv, 32–36).

But in Ex. xxxi, 12, we find another reason given for regarding the day as sacred, entirely different from the first one. "And the Lord spake unto Moses saying, Verily, my Sabbaths ye shall keep, for it is a sign between me and you throughout your generations." As we see, there are two conflicting reasons given, and the question arises, Which is the correct one? As to the first, it is opposed to the leading fact of geology, which is emphatic in stating that the "heavens and the earth, and all that in them is," were not created in six days. In regard to the second, it is binding only upon the Jews and can hav reference to no other nation. Coming down to the time of Christ, we will see whether he or the apostles enjoined or encouraged the observance of the Sabbath as advocated by modern sticklers for that day. We may state to begin with, that nowhere within the lids of the New Testament is the idea hinted at. When the Sabbatarian fanatics denounced Christ for healing on the Sabbath, he in turn denounced them as hypocrits (Luke xiii, 15–17), and at another place he said, "The Sabbath was made for man, not man for the Sabbath" (Mark ii, 27). Paul says: "Let no man therefore judge you in meat, or in drink, or of the new moon, or of the Sabbath day" (Col. ii, 16). In Rom. xiv, 5, he again says: "One man esteemeth one day above another, another esteemeth every day alike. Let every man be fully persuaded in his own mind." More than this, for more than three hundred years the Christian church did not keep the Sabbath. They ridiculed the thought. Justin Martyr, one of the ablest of the Christian fathers, in his controversy with Typho the Jew said: "You, because you are idle for one day, suppose you are pious. Our God is not pleased with such observances. You see that the heavens are not idle, nor do they observe the Sabbath. Continue as you are born. For before Abraham, there was no need of circumcision, nor of Sabbaths, nor of feasts, nor of offerings before Moses, so now, in a like manner, there is no need of them since Jesus Christ."

Irenæus, another Christian father, who wrote about the year A. D. 180, said in his work against heretics, "These things, therefore, which were given them for bondage, and for a sign to them, he [Christ] canceled by a new covenant of liberty." Eusebius, the "father of ecclesiastical history," says, "They [the patriarchs] did not, therefore, observe the Sabbath, neither do we." Another fact to be remembered is that the Jewish Sabbath was Saturday, while the Christian Sabbath is Sunday. Who had any authority to change the day? John E. Remsburg, of Oak Mills, Kan., has a standing reward of $100 to anyone who will show him one passage of scripture to justify this assumption.

We will close with a few quotations from some of the most eminent of Christian scholars and divines.

Martin Luther said: "As regards the Sabbath, or Sunday, there is no necessity for keeping it. The Sabbath in no way pertained to the gentiles. It was not commanded to them nor observed by them. Paul and the apostles, after the gospel began to be preached and spread over the world, clearly released the people from the observance of the Sabbath" (Works, vol. iii, page 73).

"It is meet, therefore, that the keeping of the Sabbath giv place to the commodity and comfort of man" (Erasmus).

"Since the Sabbath was originally an ordinance of the Mosaic law, since it was given to distinguish them from other nations, it follows that if those who liv under the gospel are emancipated from the law in general, least of all can they be bound by the Sabbath" (John Milton).

"The observance of Sunday is no more a natural duty than circumcision" (Bishop Warburton).

William Paley, from whose works ministers draw their stock-in-trade arguments in defense of their religion, has said: "If the command by which the Sabbath was instituted be binding among Christians, it must be binding as to the day, the duties, and the penalty, in none of which is it received. The observance of Sunday was not one the articles enjoined by the apostles."

Jeremy Taylor, the learned divine of the Church of England, said: "The Lord's day did not succeed in place of the Sabbath, but the Sabbath was wholly abrogated."

We think we hav given enough evidence to show that there can be no Bible authority for the observance of Sunday as the Sabbath Association of Des Moines would hav it, and if they can giv any to refute it, they should proceed to do so.

Spiritualism.

The people of Portland hav been entertained for the last few weeks by the discourses of Moses Hull, whose political and economic ideas are very lofty and admirable, and for whom I entertain the most kindly feelings and respect. But his ghost stories to me seem very amusing, not to say absurd. That absurd or illogical stories or theories should be given greater credit or accepted because of coming from Mr. Hull, is not in accord with our modern ideas. The time is past when theories, or even statements of so-called facts, must be accepted or given credence merely on authority or because of coming from some eminent source. Nothing should be accepted, no matter from what source it may come, unless it can stand the test of reason and fulfill the requirements of practical demonstration. Disregarding, then, the source of theory or story, we only ask, but decidedly ask, for reasonable proof, for evidence that will stand the test of criticism and conform to the rules of testimony. Every system of supernaturalism with which I am acquainted endeavors to establish its authenticity and make converts by the reciting of stories. That great system of supernaturalism known as the Christian religion or church has for over a thousand years been telling snake and fish stories in proof of its divine origin. A great deal of the success of the Methodist church is no doubt due to its constant rehearsal of graveyard stories. And now comes modern Spiritualism, claiming superiority to all other systems of supernaturalism—claiming freedom of thought and the breaking of mental chains—seeking to establish itself by ghost stories. Snake and fish story tellers hav, to say the least, a foundation for their tales. Not so with the ghostites. Snakes we hav seen, and fish; ghosts, never. And before our good friends, the Spiritualists, can expect us to believe stories concerning the spirits, they must establish the fact that spirits exist. The telling of stories concerning the spirits, and what they do to prove their existence, is too much like wearing a pair of boots awhile in order to make them large enough to pull on.

We hav seen snakes and we hav seen fish, and when a man tells something unreasonable about either we can only question his veracity, the acuteness of his observations, or the reliability of his source of information. But when a story is told about ghosts—I use the word ghosts in preference to spirits, as I know that there are such things as spirits and some of the uses to which they are put—my first question is, What is a ghost? just as I would demand to see the fish that weighs five hundred pounds and swallows steamers. Show me the ghost. That "it is the immortal part of man" is no answer. Is there no immortal part to the other animals inhabiting this globe? But conceding it to be the immortal part of man, whence came it? Anything that has a beginning must of necessity hav an end. Immortal means never ending, deathless. If the ghost of man cannot die, then of necessity it never began to liv. Where were all the countless millions of ghosts during all the eons of ages that had elapsed before man's appearance in the arena of existence? Before "almighty God" had established this little "workshop for the manufacture of man," where were the countless ghosts that were to animate these men and what were they doing? A blissful state of ignorance they must hav enjoyed, for we know that all our knowledge is gathered from the experience of the race since its evolution from lower types. And if it is claimed that the ghost part of man has not always existed, the question arises, When does the ghost part of man begin to exist, and how? When does the ghost part enter the physical man and from whence comes it? If a ghost is an aggregation of particles of matter, then, in common with all other material forms, it must come to an end.

And Spiritualists should bear in mind that it is absolutely necessary to show that this is merely a continuation of a former immortal existence, before it can be established that there is a future immortal continuation of this existence. Taking as I do the negativ, it is not in my province to prove, but to ask for and examin the proofs and evidences on which Spiritualism rests. These evidences I find to be principally ghost stories, and are consequently of but little value until the existence of the ghosts has been proved. But let us look at one or two and see how reasonable or logical they may be. Mr. Hull said he had argued with disembodied ghosts to prove to them that they no longer continued to exist in a corporal or physical body, and found it difficult to convince them. I greatly wondered how the ghosts could possibly be ignorant of their decease, and got no clue to the solution of the problem until one night at the Salvation Army meeting I heard a poor man tell how he had loafed around, had no special object in life and no particular place to stay. He would fish a little and sell the fish in Chinatown, and dodge his creditors, thus avoiding the payment of board and supplying himself with liquor. Suppose he had died? His ghost might hav been loafing around the docks and selling fish to Chinamen (provided the fish would bite at a phantom worm on an immaterial hook and the immaterial line would hav pulled it out), receiving joss paper therefor. This would explain how the Chinamen can afford to sell fish so cheap, and what they do with so much joss paper. For my part, I could not be out of this body many minutes without knowing it (provided I knew anything), for when I met friends on the street and they did not answer when I spoke to them, I would try and find out why they did not speak. Or when Saturday came and I could not find any dollars and cents, cold, hard silver, in my pockets, if I had any pockets, with which to pay my boarding-madam, and she would not take the phantom money I offered, or pay any attention, I would surely think it so queer that I would try and discover a cause for such a strange state of affairs. It is beyond the power of my mind to conceive of anyone going out of these present conditions and out of this body without knowing it or soon finding it out, provided his consciousness continued as before. But we hav no scientific or satisfactory evidence that there is any thought or consciousness separate from brain action. In fact, all the evidences on this subject strongly point the other way. Everyone has noticed that a blow on the head stupefies the person struck, and a heavy enough blow will cause absolute cessation of thought; the reason being that the concussion of the blow on the skull causes a weakening or total suspension of the brain action, indicating that thought is dependent upon brain action for its existence. When the skull is broken and pressed down on the brain, thus interfering with its action, the thought is broken, incoherent, and uncertain, which fact points unmistakably to the conclusion that without free and unimpaired brain action the thought cannot be free or reliable. Diseases of the brain cause imbecility, insanity, and idiocy. This plainly shows that without a healthy brain there can be no healthy thought. In fact, upon the condition of the brain depends the force and quality of the thought. A year or so ago I read of an ex United States soldier who had been to all appearances hopelessly insane since struck on the head by a piece of flying bomb. But upon a surgeon, who knew his business, lifting the depressed skull from his brain, he immediately regained consciousness, but had no recollection whatever of the intervening time, although more than twenty years had elapsed. Where had his ghost been, and what had it been thinking of, all the years, that it should hav no recollection of what had happened? Perhaps, with Rip Van Winkle, it had been sleeping in the Catskills. Curious coincidence that it should wake and call around just as the brain again became able to operate!

A similar incident occurred during the bombardment of Alexandria. A man in the rigging of an English man-of-war was asked a question and began to reply, "Just ahead," but at this juncture a piece of shell struck him in the forehead, and he very naturally quit speaking. He was taken to England, where the shell was removed from his brain, whereupon he immediately finished his reply, "Sir, a little, a little to the port, sir," thus clearly showing that, although the thought had been formed, it could not be expressed without brain action, and that the brain commenced its work of forming and expressing thought exactly where it had left it off by inability to act. These evidences, I contend, point unmistakably to the conclusion that there is no thought without brain action. Without thought there can be no intelligence, and as the brain is material, material is necessary to intelligence. How, then, can an immaterial something, ghost or spirit, be intelligent?

We close, then, by again asking Spiritualists to prove the existence of spirits, and, when that is done, by telling from whence these spirits come; when and how they enter the body; how they hav employed the past ages, and how those unembodied will employ the ages to come before they enter some human form, and how they can think without a material brain. Then Materialists might listen respectfully to their ghost stories, if it was not so much like the two men who went to dig clams, but found that the tide was in, when one remarked to the other that it was against the law to dig clams while the tide was in. "How is that?" said the other. "The law of nature, of course," replied the first one. And so it seems to us very much against the law to go to the dead for information or knowledge. And it is absolutely useless to tell ghost stories until the existence of the ghost is first established. HENRY ADDIS.

Godology.

It is common to hear professed Christians boasting of the consistency of their religion, and insisting that its teachings are so plain that the "wayfaring man, though a fool, could not err therein." It is the object of this article to present a few thoughts touching the prime factor in their philosophy, "godology," and to ascertain, if possible, whether the claims held by its devoted aspirants are in accord with the demonstrated truths of science, or whether they agree with the known principles of reason or common sense. It is assumed that a God possessed of infinit intelligence has existed from eternity, and that at some time in the past he brought into existence all else that exists. Now the first question I wish to ask is, in what does intelligence consist? Does it not necessarily consist of thought, in a reflection of the mind upon something? Can you conceive of any such thing as intelligence without thought? And can you think of any such thing as thought without an object or subject—without something to excite thought or think about? Since this is logically impossible I would ask, What constituted God an intelligent being, and about what did he think during that period prior to the creation, in which, and during which, there was nothing in existence about which to think?

It is evident, ther, that, in order that God could hav existed from eternity as an intelligent or thinking being, something must hav existed from eternity about which to think. Now, if something existed from eternity (which we see it did) in order to constitute God eternally a thinking being, it must be evident to the dullest comprehension that God did not make that something. Who, then, did make it? Could it hav been made at all? Since, then, something certainly did exist to some extent, and which God did not make—since something certainly did exist at least to a finite extent—why may not something hav existed to an infinit extent? Why may not all the matter composing the boundless universe hav existed from eternity? To whatever extent that something may hav existed, whether to a finite or infinit extent, it is reasonable to suppose that it must hav been possessed of some qualities or of some properties. Since, then, what we call force is inconceivable apart from matter, how do we know that force is not a property of matter and coexistent with it? How do we know, then. that the process of formation, of dissolution, and reformation, is not an eternal process? The less we assume and the more we prove in an argument, the better it is for the argument. Now, let us see. The Materialist lays his foundation in matter, the existence of which is not disputed. He sees matter and he knows that it exists. He also sees that it is indestructible by any known process, and he therefore logically assumes that it is eternal. Thus he is able to demonstrate the existence of matter; and logically infers, and hence assumes, its eternity. But how is it with the Theist? Not being able to demonstrate his basis, not being able to prove the existence of his God, he is driven to assume his existence, and then to assume that he, all out of nothing, created the boundless universe, than which there could not be a greater absurdity.

One of the most specious though fallacious arguments presented by theologians is that founded upon the theory of design. The point argued is that the qualities of beauty, order, harmony, etc., existing in the affairs of nature bear evidences of design, and that therefore nature must hav had an intelligent author. Now, since nature possesses these qualities, and if nature therefore had an intelligent author, it is reasonable to suppose that that author would necessarily hav to be possessed of these qualities to an equally great if not infinitly greater degree than that of the works of his hands. Now, if it is the beauty, harmony, etc., existing in nature that proves that nature had an intelligent author, must not that infinitly greater beauty, order, harmony, etc., possessed by nature's author still more definitly prove that nature's author must hav had an antecedent?

And so that antecedent he, or it, if you please, must hav been preceded by a still more remote cause, and so on ad infinitum.

Thus if we admit one God to account for certain qualities existing in nature, we are bound to admit another to account for the existence of these qualities in nature's author. Thus if we hav a million gods, or a hundred millions, we would always be entitled to one more to bring our last god into existence and to endow him with these qualities.

Is it not far more plausible, then, to suppose that nature is self-existent and automatic; that matter is eternal, and possesses the inherent powers of its own operations, rather than assume the existence of that of which, should it really exist, we could hav no conception? I do not deny the existence of a God, but I do deny the existence of any plausible evidence to be deduced from nature proving the existence of such a being. Why, the very description given of him sinks him into nothingness—"without body, parts, or passions, boundless, formless, shadowless," etc.; deprives him of all entity and renders him a being of the imagination alone. Persons who profess to know the most about "gods" usually possess a very limited knowledge of nature. But we are happy in the thought that knowledge is every day gaining ground, and will ere long supersede the darkness of superstition. Science will dispel the gloom and illuminate the world, the gods will retire and man will be free. P. H. MCCROSKY.

How and When Did Jesus Die?

The notion that Jesus did not die on the cross was entertained by the late La Roy Sunderland as far back as 1863, when he wanted to print an article on the subject in the Herald of Progress, but did not get it in.

And now a Dr. Clark, in the Medical Review, thinks he has shown pretty conclusivly that Jesus revived in the cool tomb, made his escape, and lingered out his few remaining days among his trusted friends.

This ingenious solution of the mystery of the resurrection is based on what Dr. Clark considers as the unquestionable credibility, in all essential particulars, of the trial, crucifixion, interment, and reappearance of Jesus—"facts as assured to my mind," says the doctor, "as the taking of Jerusalem by Titus."

The siege of Jerusalem is too well attested to be doubted. The details are given by the Jewish historian Josephus. But neither he nor any other contemporary Jewish or pagan writer has recorded a word about the life and death of Jesus.

Furthermore, it is impossible to ascertain the year of the alleged crucifixion. Several years ago Judge Joseph P. Bradley, of the United States Supreme Court, endeavored to solve the problem by astronomical calculation, and his conclusion was as follows:

There were only three years from A.D. 27 to A.D. 36 inclusiv, in which the 1st of Nisan, and consequently the 15th of Nisan, happened on Friday, and these were A.D. 27, 30, and 33, the last of which is very doubtful. But the crucifixion could not hav happened before A.D. 28, and probably not later than A.D. 31. Therefore the year 30 is the only one which satisfies all the conditions of the problem. It does satisfy them, because it gives opportunity for Jesus to teach publicly for about three years and to attend three passovers during his ministry, or four, according as it commenced before or after April 3 A.D. 27. Now, since in A.D. 30 the 1st of Nisan fell on Friday, the 24th of March, the 15th fell on Friday, the 7th of April, which was the day of the crucifixion.

Accepting the truth of the statement that the passover full moon in the year 30 fell on Friday, April 7th, and carrying out the calculations for the five succeeding years, we hav the following table of passovers:

A.D. 30, April 7, Friday.
" 31, March 27, Monday.
" 32, April 15, "
" 33, " 6. Saturday.
" 34, " 23 Friday.
" 35, " 13, Wednesday.

The early fathers are unanimous in placing the crucifixion in the year 29. But they were all mistaken. If the passover full moon was on Friday, April 7, A.D. 30 then in the preceding year it was on Sunday, April 17th, or Monday, April 18th. If we had the exact hour of the full moon April 7, A.D. 30, we could ascertain to a certainty the passover days in all the other years, remembering that the Jewish day began at sunset. As it is, there may be a variation of a day in any of the above calculations.

But when it is demonstrated that the only year when the crucifixion could hav occurred was A.D. 30, let it be known that the Jewish passover was never celebrated on Friday, and that no culprit was ever tried or executed on the great passover day.

Therefore there was no Christ crucified under Pontius Pilate, but a hundred years before there was a Jesus stoned and hanged on the day before the passover or the Sabbath, and that was the Jesus preached by Paul in Damascus prior to 62 B.C., when Aretas, king of Arabia Petrea, held the government of that city. The governor under King Aretas sought to apprehend Paul as a disturber of the peace, and he escaped by being let down through a window by the wall in a basket (2 Cor. xi. 32).

The Rev. John W. Chadwick has recently attempted to fix the date of the crucifixion about mid-April in the year 35. That would be Wednesday, April 13th, when the passover occurred in that year. But if ever Jesus was crucified, as described in the gospels, it was on Friday. So therefore the year 35 is out of the question.

Mr. Chadwick truly says that the whole career or ministry of Jesus was comprised within the limits of a year, as described by the first three evangelists, and that John's statements to the contrary cannot be harmonized with the other gospels. But this is not the worst contradiction of the four gospels. The first three describe the crucifixion as occurring on the great passover day, while John distinctly fixes the event on the day before the passover and the Sabbath. ANTICHRIST.

I HAV just been reading Draper's "Conflict Between Religion and Science," and, upon the whole, I like the modesty of Science as against the solemn arrogance of Religion. The one, while knowing much, modestly confesses its ignorance; the other, knowing nothing, professes to know everything.—Frederick Douglas.

The Ethical Societies Convention.

The fourth annual convention of the societies for ethical culture was held in this city, beginning December 5th, in the Workingman's school, on Fifty-fourth street. Thirty-eight delegates were present, twenty-two of whom reside in this city. The societies represented were those of New York, Chicago, Philadelphia, St. Louis, London, and Cornell University. The New York society numbers six hundred members, and owns the building in which the delegates met. Reports were made of the work of the various societies, which is chiefly to instil ethical teaching in schools and churches. The report from the Chicago society was that it is doing "what it can to enlighten the thought of the pulpit."

The interest in the convention centered upon the recommendations of Professor Adler upon various topics, one of which was the relations of the ethical societies to the church. On this subject the professor said: "In how far can we, do we, take the place of the church in regard to the more external acts of the consecration of marriage and burial of the dead? Especially of the former, hav not some of our societies been lax in claiming their right from the respectiv states in which they are located? Should not they be prodded by us to take action so their leaders and teachers may be enabled to discharge this beautiful and solemn function? Every church has a ritual partly fixed, partly variable. Can we not hav an ethical ritual, the objects of which might be to remind us of those principles which we believe in, of those duties which we agree in regarding as most binding and sacred? Such weekly reminders, coming into our lives like the sounds of a bell, would surely be of assistance, and would increase the value and add to the dignity of our Sunday exercises." "In conclusion," said Professor Adler, toward the end of his address, "I feel like pronouncing the words of an orthodox benediction, 'May the Holy Spirit be with us in our deliberations.' We are met here for a holy object. Let us address ourselvs to this object in a sacred spirit. Let us keep our eyes steadily fixed on the main problems. Let us refrain from enlarging on matters irrelevant or of minor importance. Let us confirm among ourselvs the sense of unity of brotherhood, that we may go forth at the end of this convention, each to his separate field of work, rich in new thought and new impulse, with larger courage and deeper devotion to the common cause in which we all are alike enlisted."

Another important subject was the establishment of a Summer School of Ethics. Upon this Professor Adler offered some resolutions, which were adopted, as follows:

"Resolved, That the union of ethical societies sanctions the project of a summer school of ethics, provided that it be conducted on the following principles:

"It shall be pledged to no opinion or school of opinions.

"It shall offer a free field and no favor to every scientific treatment of the subject within its curriculum.

"It shall be divided into three departments:

"First: A department of economics and social reforms, in which instruction shall be given on such subjects as the history of coöperation abroad and in the United States; history of poor laws, the tramp question, workingmen's homes, with an account of French, English, German, and American experiments in improving them; history of the temperance movement, an account of state Socialism as it is being applied at present in Germany, etc.

"Second: A department of ethics proper, in which special attention shall be given to the subject of the moral instruction of the young. In this department a normal class shall be formed for the training of teachers of morality. Also, lectures shall be given on the development of ethical thought and the history of ethical systems.

"Third: A department of comparativ religion. In this department lectures shall be given on the history and philosophy of all the great religions of the world; also special efforts shall be made to include in the staff of lecturers leading representativs of the Catholic, Protestant, and Jewish theology, in order that these systems may be fully and fairly set forth by those who are convinced of their truth. It is a weakness of the present methods of theological training that the views of opponents are exhibited through the colored glass of sectarian prepossession. The proposed department of comparativ religion is a sincere attempt to expand the horizon of the religious teacher by enabling him to study the various systems of religious belief as expounded by the believers in them, and thus to create an opportunity for every shade and mode of religious faith to reveal itself in its strength and weakness before the earnest and impartial seeker after truth.

"Resolved, That the executiv committee of the Union of Ethical Societies be empowered to raise the sum of $4,000 for the support of the summer school during a period of one year.

"Resolved, That the executiv committee of the Union of Ethical Societies be instructed to hand over the management of the projected school to a committee of nine, of which three shall be members of the Fraternity of Ethical Lecturers."

The discussion upon these points shows that, outside of New York, the societies are still partly Christian, with a most tender regard for the church. The St. Louis society "instructs" its young members by telling them stories from the Old Testament, and Mr. Williams, of Philadelphia, thought the societies, neither individually nor as a whole, should do anything to antagonize unnecessarily the church, as the defiant declarations of principles of some do at the very start. He went so far as to say that the ethical societies ought not to meet on Sunday because their services conflicted with those of the church. The other speakers, among whom were Dr. Abbott of Plymouth church and Heber Newton, favored the summer school principally, it appeared, because the clergy could go there and learn something about ethics.

Professor Adler, however, had more confidence in ethics than his brethren. He protested particularly against the utterances of the Philadelphia representativ, saying the Ethical Society takes the place of the church for those who are churchless, so that there was no question of the services conflicting. Continuing he said that, on the idea that the society was a substitute for the church, he had culled ethical passages from the "Imitation of Christ," and from the writings of Epictetus and Seneca, to serve for public and private devotional reading. Acting on this idea, he moved that the Fraternity of Lecturers be instructed to consider the subject of an ethical ritual, and prepare a specimen of one for the consideration of the next convention. The motion prevailed with the amendment that the sample be prepared at least two months before the convention meet, so that the delegates might get acquainted with it.

The ethical societies, it seems to us, are making the error that all reformers do who cater to Christianity. They ought to know by this time that however reform and the Christian religion may be forced to agree theoretically, practically they can never unite. Even two societies with common objects so identical as those of the American Secular Union and the political society of the Seventh Day Adventists must work separately. The people composing them are of different mental habits, are animated by different motivs, and respond to different appeals. Professor Corliss, the Seventh Day Adventist representativ at the Secular Union's late congress, recognized this, and said in his address that union would be impossible—the two classes could never work harmoniously. And the same view of the Ethical Society's invitation to the clergy to attend their school and obtain wisdom is taken by the chief organ of the Methodist church, the largest Protestant body in the country. "The evangelical clergyman," says the Advocate, "who goes to Felix Adler for instruction in his work should do so understanding that Mr. Adler is without faith in a personal God or in immortality. He is essentially what may be called a philanthropic Secularist, who is not at all occupied with thoughts of the kingdom of Christ or of God, but finding himself in the universe tries to make the situation of things as tolerable as possible. Evangelical clergymen would do well to study social problems as citizens. The Christian method of elevating mankind is first to bring men into the kingdom of God; when that is done and they are properly instructed, they will become honest, frugal, philanthropic, intelligent, patriotic, and will be sustained in all these qualities by the hope of securing the approbation of Christ, doing good to their fellowmen, and laying up treasures in heaven."

The human view of things taken by Professor Adler does not suit the church, which must elevate the supernatural above man or lose its grip upon the people. In the autumn festival of the Workingman's school, witnessed by the delegates to the convention, the central scene was a tableau by girls clothed in the colors of different nations rendering homage to the Genius of Humanity. Such humanitarian views do not and cannot suit the churches, for they ignore the very basis of Christianity—the supernatural. As Dr. Lyman Beecher said when asked to pray at an antislavery meeting where the speaker was noted for his hostility to Christianity, "He does not worship my God, he will not trust in my savior, he spurns with contempt my Bible, and looks with disdain upon my whole ministerial life. I will listen to him upon a secular platform, but will not invest it with unwelcome religious sanctions." And how can the Ethical societies expect a different reply now to their overtures? It is not surprising that the religious journal quoted adds: "Let the Infidels work out their schemes if they can. The Christian minister should preach and practice the gospel ecclesiastically, doctrinally, practically, devotionally, and emotionally. If he coöperates with Infidels, as he may hav occasion to do, in promoting temperance and philanthropy, he should do it as a citizen, and never as a religionist, lest the people should infer that he regards as of minor importance the spiritual revelation which he believes is the sole source of that godliness which has the promis of the life which now is, as well as of that which is to come."

This, we think, will be the reply of all the Christian sects to overtures from the heretics. We do not believe that even the western Unitarians would coöperate with Infidels, though politically they may agree identically with them, and in their theories regarding the present and future very closely. There is an exclusivness, an I-am-holier-than-thou air, to the Christian sects, no matter how "liberal" their theology is, that prevents practical union. A Freethought speaker will invariably offend the Christian membership of any such temporary union, and a Christian speaker disgusts the Freethinking membership by talking what to them is silly nonsense. It was so at the Secular Union congress: Professor Corliss and Rabbi Phillipson were aggrieved by contemptuous references to the Bible, and they in turn wearied the Freethinkers by their defense of that volume. Any such union, to suit either party, must be too one-sided to suit the other.

Recurring to this subject upon his arrival home from the congress Mr. Watts said in his paper that he thought the coöperation of each party could be secured without sacrificing the main principle of either, and promised to tell us how. Perhaps there is wisdom enough in Canada to evolve a sufficient plan, but we doubt if there is in the States. And until our Toronto friend shows us Christians and Infidels coöperating without friction in the Canadian Secular Union we shall continue to doubt the practicability of the scheme. And we shall also watch the establishment of the Ethical Summer School, and its endeavor to get the preachers therein, with interest, confident that the attempt will fail but ready to herald its success as one of those triumphs commonly regarded as impossible to all persons but the one in whose existence the members of Professor Adler's society do not generally believe.

The Legal Suppression of Profanity.

The mayor of Williamsport, Pa, has undertaken to stop public profanity in that city by ordering the policemen to arrest every person who uses profane or obscene language in the streets. So says the Philadelphia Inquirer.

The statute of Pennsylvania against profanity is a curiosity from ancient days, as follows:

"If any person of the age of sixteen years or upwards shall profanely curse or swear by the name of God, Christ Jesus, or the Holy Ghost, every person so offending, being thereof convicted, shall forfeit and pay the sum of sixty-seven cents for every such profane curse or oath; and in case he or she shall refuse or neglect to pay the said forfeiture, or goods and chattels cannot be found whereof to levy the same by distress, he or she shall be committed to the house of correction of the proper county not exceeding twenty-four hours for every such offense of which such person shall be convicted. And whosoever of the age of sixteen years or upwards shall curse or swear by any other name or thing than as aforesaid, and shall be convicted thereof, shall forfeit and pay the sum of forty cents for every such curse or oath; and in case such offender shall neglect or refuse to satisfy such forfeiture, or no goods or chattels can be found whereof to levy the same by distress, he or she shall be committed to the house of correction of the proper county, not exceeding twelve hours, for every such offense."

The Christian Statesman, in its ignorance, confounds this section of the blasphemy laws with the one aimed at blasphemy as an offense against Christianity, punishable by a fine of $100 and three months' imprisonment, and says: "Profanity, therefore, is not merely a personal vice. It has important bearings on the public welfare. The state has a right to suppress it as a public evil. The failure to do so brings guilt on the nation, exposing it to the inevitable judgments of God. It is matter both for astonishment and for alarm, that the laws against blasphemy are to so large an extent a dead letter on our statute books. Judicious efforts for the enforcement of these laws, preceded by whatever enlightenment of the public mind and appeals to the public conscience might be thought proper in each community, were among the measures commended to the local National Reform committees, recently formed in Columbia, Montour, and Northumberland counties, in this state." If every Pennsylvania Christian who uses profane language were to be imprisoned for the offense they would hav to be taken on the installment plan, for there are not enough houses of correction in the state to hold a thousandth part at one time. And "the inevitable judgment of God" must be very slow in arriving or the state would long ago hav been condemned.

Christianity, Mohammedanism, Buddhism.

A fact that keen observers and calculators hav pretty well impressed on candid and reading Christians of late, is that the religion of the latter is being so outstripped in missionary propagation by Mohammedanism that it bids fair to dwindle into insignificant proportions.

In the first place, Mohammedan missionaries hav made large conversions of negro tribes in Africa, against exceedingly small conquests by the Christian agents. In thirty years ten thousand of the former hav been dispatched to preach the Koran, and many tribes hav acceded to their gospel.

And in the second place, leaving the question of proselytes from other religions to Christianity or to Buddhism, and considering the number of the Christians themselvs who hav been converted to Mohammedanism and against them the Mohammedans who hav been converted to Christianity, we find a yet greater preponderance of the faith of Allah. For while there has not been during the present century a single Mohammedan convert to Christianity, many tribes of Christians in Africa hav become worshipers of the Arabian prophet.

In the great religion of India, too—Buddhism—there is growth of a movement to send out missionaries, who will probably hav success equal to that of the other rival of Christianity above mentioned.

It is, indeed, intended to send many of these latter to Europe and America to enlighten the Christian heathen of those countries. This design interests us considerably, and we would willingly see it joined in also by the faith first spoken of above. For there are good features both in the doctrin of Mohammed and in that of Buddha which are lacking in that of this land, and their exhibition here would help in the work of showing our pietists how defectiv and condemnable is their system. "The Mohammedan is surprised to find societies for the protection of animals in this Christian country, and lifts up his eyebrows and says that no one dreams of being cruel to a brute in his land, because the Koran forbids it." Likewise is he shocked at the drunkenness of the followers of Christ. His own creed forbids the use of liquor. The contrast between the effect of his doctrin and that of Christianity is well seen in the comparativ prosperity of African tribes who hav become converted to the former and tribes who hav given allegiance to the latter. The Christian tribes hav been almost ruined by liquor-drinking. They hav fallen from whatever habits of industry and order they before possessed, to hopeless sloth and vagabondage. On the other hand, the districts where Mohammedanism has been embraced show sobriety, endeavor, and surprising advance. Neighborhoods which under Christian permission of drink had almost sunk into bestial anarchy hav been reclaimed to rule and prosperity by the intervention of Mohammedanism. These superior merits of Mohammedanism, and others, could be held up to the view of chagrined Christians by Islamitic missionaries, to the good of both. And the Buddhist propagandists can lay before us equal superiorities, and do equal benefit. Also, their agitation would doubtless draw into discussion yet further than at present, the question whether Christianity was not copied from their faith.

And then, too, it is well, while we hav any religion at all in the United States, to hav it of as many kinds as possible. One religion does not receive much contradiction, while many are perpetually counterspeaking and exposing one another. One religion can get control of the state and hav its oaths and holidays and tax exemptions established, but if half the Christians in America could be exchanged for Mohammedans and Buddhists and a few more breeds of delusionists, Infidels might make up with them a sufficient number of dissenters to topple Christian intolerance from its throne.

Editorial Notes.

A CHRISTIAN paper says Chaplain McCabe sent the following letter to Colonel Ingersoll:

"DEAR COLONEL; Ten years ago you made the following prediction: 'Ten years from this time two theaters will be built for one church.' The time is up. The Methodists are now building four churches every day—one every six hours. Please venture upon another prediction for the year 1900."

The Ladies' News comments thuswise:

"We do not suppose he will venture another prediction. He has seen the power of those who put their strength in the Lord. The Philistines may bring forth Goliaths, but there are Davids to-day who are strong and able to slay the enemies of God and the church. To do this, they must march boldly, trusting in his strength, and hearing constantly the words, 'Lo, I am with you always.'"

The substance of Chaplain McCabe's alleged letter was published in the Chicago Inter-Ocean. Colonel Ingersoll wrote to the editor of that paper:

"A clipping was shown me to-day from your paper, in which it is stated:

"1. That ten years ago I made a prediction that ten years from that time two theaters would be built for one church; and

"2. That Chaplain McCabe had written me a letter calling my attention to the prediction, and stating that the Methodists were building four churches a day.

"There are two mistakes in this article: First, I never made the prediction; and second, I never received any letter from Chaplain McCabe on the subject. With these exceptions the article is correct R. G. INGERSOLL."

Thus is the "truth of history" again illustrated!

HENRY M. TABER, a prominent merchant of this city, has forwarded the subjoined letter to Senator Frank Hiscock protesting against the enactment of the Breckinridge Sunday Rest bill into law. We hope that a great many more New Yorkers will follow the example, not forgetting Senator William M. Evarts and the representativs from the various districts of the state. Good representativs from this city to write to are Amos J. Cummings and Roswell P. Flower, who are men of influence:

"Dec. 10, '890.

"HON. FRANK HISCOCK, Dear Sir: I hav been asked to write to you with my opinion (which is important only as an integral part of the six millions of people which you are representing) of what is known as the Breckinridge Sunday Rest bill.

"I am opposed to it, for the reason that it is not in conformity with that principle of justice, which inheres in the political postulate—'no union of church and state'—which, though theoretically acknowledged throughout the country, is, I regret to say, far from being practiced.

"I maintain that Congress has no right to pass any law, in the interest of any religion, which makes it a penal offense for you or me to attend to any business that we may choose to attend to on any day. Pass laws making Sunday a holiday, if you will (same as January 1st, or July 4th), leaving it optional with citizens to employ the hours of such days as their own consciences may dictate. But there is not only evident a great injustice in any law of Congress which makes any day a holy day, but it certainly contravenes not only the spirit, but the letter, of the Constitution.

"The language of the bill in question is my warrant for saying that Congress is asked to pass a bill making the observance of a certain day a religious duty. True, the phrases used are so ingeniously wrought as not to make use of the words 'holy' or 'religious,' but the intent is, of course, apparent enough in the sentence 'conscientiously believe in and observe . . . as a day of rest.'

"Anyone who is familiar with the last fifteen hundred years of history of the intolerance, the bigotry, the bickerings, the persecutions, the cruelties, the untold millons of martyrs, whose ashes were scattered over, or whose blood has saturated, almost every portion of the soil of Europe—because the church persisted in fastening itself upon the state—cannot fail, it seems to me, to exert every effort possible to prevent even a semblance of church control in the affairs of state in this country.

"Yours truly, HENRY M. TABER."

A WELSH monk called Father Ignatius is at present making Christianity ridiculous in this city by conducting a revival in various halls and churches. In one of his sermons he revealed the depth of his religion by thundering forth: "God has a perfect right to cast me into eternal hell and to torture me with the flames forever if I do not accept the mercy he hath extended toward me. It would not be inconsistent with his justice to torture me. There must be a hell if a being endowed with a free will makes use of his freedom to trample the love of his savior under his feet, crucify him afresh, and put him to an open shame. My conscience tells me that hell is not bad enough for one who can do this; and the Holy Spirit who convinces me of this, of my guilt and of the justice of hell, convinces me of the infinit love of God in offering the perfect righteousness of his son for our redemption." In another sermon he showed his appreciation of the intelligence of his audience by telling this time-worn, moss-grown, worm-eaten, threadbare yarn: "I must tell you of the miracle which was performed through God's mercy in Chickering Hall on Sunday night. One of the congregation was an Infidel, a blasphemer, who had lived for twenty-one years in blasphemy and vice; he had often dared God to strike him dead. You remember how beautifully the Holy Ghost was poured out upon us that night. How we saw that the same almighty hand which guided the planets in their courses, tinged the violet and taught the bird now to seek its food; how we saw God everywhere and saw how he rendered all his creatures happy except the man who misused his free will to refuse the happiness offered him. Well, this man, who was the worst man I ever heard; whose sins I could not mention here they are so vile, this blasphemer for twenty-one years, found himself convinced of his enormous guilt, and, although that night he felt only that he would be damned forever, on Monday the walls of his despair and unbelief and sin fell down like those of Jericho, and he accepted Jesus. This desperate, blaspheming Infidel and debauchee, who for twenty-one years was dead in sin, has now the life of Jesus in his soul. This Lazarus has been resurrected from a moral death of twenty-one years, although he was stinking with sin."

THE American Sabbath Union congress, held in Philadelphia last week, was not a very harmonious body. Mr. Wilbur F. Crafts, the field secretary, was the disturbing element, and in the language of the politicians, he had it in for Elliott F. Shepard, the president of the organization. At the opening of the congress the delegates possessed circulars issued by Mr. Crafts headed, "First Pure, then Peaceable." The circular did not quote Mr. Vanderbilt's opinion of Mr. Shepard, but it opposed his reëlection as president, declaring that because he was rich and generous was not reason enough why he should hav a third term. It charged him with being too intensely identified with party politics, he having sent advertisments of his partisan papers and dodgers of the Grant monument fund throughout the South, thus killing the work of the Sabbath Union in the South. It protested against giving to the Mail and Express a monopoly of the publication of the literature of the union, but if the Mail and Express must be the organ of the society, then it should be free from such incongruities as liquor advertisments and racing "tips." Further indictments against Colonel Shepard as a president were "antagonism to the legislation of the last convention," "serious discourtesy to the convention in session, by incorporating the union in New York state within a month, and after notice had been sent that important changes in management would be proposed;" "that the general secretaries now in office hav acted with the president and linked themselvs in whatever mistakes he has made; that the executiv committee, whose attendance is seldom more than eight and often less, are most of them selected by the president and secretaries, and hav always seconded his wishes; that he [Mr. Crafts] was driven out of the American Sabbath Union because he would not submit to private ends." This circular had no effect whatever upon the aggregation of condemned idiots which the president is alleged to represent in his single person, for he went blithely on and packed the committees with his friends, winning all his points, but at the price of an alienation of the Western workers, who will now cease contributing to the society and labor independently of it. The treasurer reported that Mr. Shepard gave $7,500 to the union this year.

Letters from Friends.

WALLA WALLA, WASH., Nov. 21, 1890.

MR. EDITOR: Please find inclosed a clipping from the Portland Oregonian, which I hope you will find room for in our noble TRUTH SEEKER. I think if all our newspapers were to come out and print their true opinions on these subjects regardless of Mrs. Grundy, the reign of priestcraft would be very short. The Oregonian is setting a good example to the rest. Success to it. I remain, Yours for Universal Mental Liberty, ARTHUR VENN.

BUTLER, PA., Nov. 23, 1890.

MR. EDITOR: Inclosed please find $2, for which you will send me one more copy of Heston's holy pictures. One of my neighbors borrowed mine for a few days, and when I sent after it he thought he could not do without one, and so he gave me $2 to purchase one for him. Oh, if we could only hav one of those books in every school-room for the children to see! It would soon redeem the world from superstition. I know of no work that would be more prolific of human happiness than the selling of this "Freethinker's Pictorial Text-Book." Advertise for agents, and let this work be sold by the carload, that the dust and dirt of eighteen centuries may be washed from the eyes of Christendom. My pen weeps a word of cheer for the artist, the Editor, and all the readers of THE TRUTH SEEKER. SIMEON NIXON.

ODESSA, Nov. 22, 1890.

MR. EDITOR: I am under lifelong obligations to you for sending me the good old paper. It is the chief comfort of my life. Wherever and whenever I could I hav been sowing the seeds of Freethought, and though I am living in a very orthodox country, where the glorious sun of general literature and of science has attained only to a low point in the intellectual sky, where ignorance and superstition may be said still to brood over the people as a hen broodeth over her chickens, I hav the consolation of having good reason to believe that I hav sown a goodly quantity of seed in ground where it will eventually grow and bear fruit. I hav lately moved; my address now is Holden, Johnson Co., Mo. The folks at my new home are all unbelievers, but not readers. The father says he was born above the absurdities and superstitions of the Bible. I expect to find more Liberalism in Johnson county than I found in Lafayette, the county I hav moved from. All the old slave states I perceive are still courting Catholic favor, still ready to adopt any policy of the kind that will hav a tendency to keep alive old Southern principles. I hav been voting the Democratic ticket lately on account of the tariff issue, but I could not go the Democratic nominee for Congress in this district this fall, on account of his being a Catholic. I hav resolved that I will not vote for a man who belongs to a church which claims that the head of the church is above the head of the nation, or that its peculiar God is the rightful head of nations.

WM. L. WORLEY.

BLOOMDALE, O., Nov. 29, 1890.

MR. EDITOR: Of late I see numerous letters in your good paper calling on Liberals and Freethinkers to form into secret societies having some form of insurance or protectiv scheme embodied in them, and to connect them directly or indirectly with the American Secular Union. To all such propositions I would retort, Hands off the American Secular Union. Let the Nine Demands and any schemes which bear directly upon them be pushed to the utmost in the direction indicated by C. B. Reynolds, W. F. Jamieson, and Ida Craddock, as well as others, and success will yet perch on our banners without any outside or additional help. Secret societies, churches, creeds, and the like I view as relics of times when humanity was far down in the stages of knowledge, while the American Secular Union is a plant of but recent growth; and a right lusty plant it is, but it should not therefore be incumbered with ancient mold and musty clothes. When I see the ark of the covenant in the lodge-rooms, and the badges, In Hoc Signo Vinces, the motto of Constantine the Great (murderer) when he rode out on predatory excursions flourishing the banner of the cross and said, "In you I shall conquer"—when I see these it grinds me and I could cry out every time, "Oh, dense foolishness!" I belong to no secret society. I could not be induced to join should I hav to subscribe to such barbarisms. Besides, I hav too much individuality and independence in my make-up to crave the support of institutions, for to me they are all got up for power and profit, like their prototype, the church. It would be like uniting church and state, and that all know would be pernicious. Forever leave the American Secular Union free from all ancient incumbrances.

Yours, C. C. GERMANN.

NEWARK, N. J., Dec. 1, 1890.

MR. EDITOR: For nearly two thousand years priests hav preached that God occasionally gets crazy or mad at his children for their sinfulness, and to punish them sends plagues and disease to kill them; and that he offered up his son to be crucified to save sinners. Well, God has had a great deal of trouble with his ungrateful wretches. I think he has acted very strangely for the giver of all that is good and the father of all that is bad, for according to my way of thinking he could just as easily hav created us all perfect as imperfect. And of course God is the only one to blame for all our failings. He sends the storms, cyclones, and earthquakes. He poisons the very air to kill his children. He has created a demon with horns, tail, pitchfork, and cloven foot to torture two-thirds of his fallen offspring for their failings, and priests still assert that if we fail to pray to such a God we will surely be damned. Jack Short in his poem answers those priests that he will be damned if he will pray to such a God. So of course poor Jack is a gone sucker sure, and millions more like poor Jack. And then again, there are Pentecost and Father McGlynn, who a few years ago stood so very near God, but they too hav wandered far, far away from such a righteous and loving master lately. But as long as they stood by their blessed Lord he provided plenty of money for them. They were well clothed and fed, as the majority of priestly wolves are who liv off the earnings of the poor laboring man and woman. But there is a rumor going that Father McGlynn is to be restored. If so, the power will be again given him to locate and fumigate souls. It is a power worth having, for it brings in clean cash without any labor or strain of muscle. But where is the man or woman that would wish to keep company, or go to heaven to liv in idleness, with a lot of vagabonds, thieves, libertins, murderers, and hypocrits, who lived lives of debauchery on earth and whose spirits would be equally bad notwithstanding they had paid their price to the priests for fumigating their corrupted carcasses? I answer, no Freethinker would want to enter. But I suppose there are more heavens than one, for there is mention of a seventh heaven. There is where the aristocrats will go—the Astors, Vanderbilts, Goulds, and Rothschilds. Poor Jim Fisk of course will not go so high. If he gets to horse heaven he is lucky. The Anarchists are all booked for dog heaven, for of course they hav souls and gizzards, if they hav no hearts. And the Freethinkers will hav a heaven of their own and the great God of Nature for their king. Respectfully, W. W. MORRIS.

MR. EDITOR: I am more than interested in the articles upon secret Liberal organization, and I hope that all who favor the idea will at once take hold of the matter with such zeal and earnestness that success will be assured. I was favorably impressed with the ideas of Brother S. P. Benton, of Bowie, Tex., who in his communication to THE TRUTH SEEKER of November 1st givs his views upon this same subject, and also some interesting data from which it might be well to draw some inferences. I do not think anyone who is at all liberal-minded can object to an organization similarly established, with moral teachings drawn not from the Bible but from the history of the lives of the thousands who hav been martyrs in the cause of mental freedom, except he be one of those two-sided specimens of humanity who are always endeavoring to ride upon two horses at once, hypocrits in general. In conversation recently with a prominent member of one of the largest secret organizations, I ventured the remark that if there were a few changes in the ritual of his beloved order, I thought I knew men who would not hav to curb their conscientiousness to indorse the platform. When asked what changes I would suggest, I replied, "The expunging of the personal God idea totally and in its place the substitution of eulogies of men who through their liberal views and their regard for the welfare of their fellowmen made the order in its beginning." But his reply was only in accordance with many others whose conscience is so elastic that it can accommodate itself to any and all circumstances. Said he: "That is the only thing that holds it up. Take the word 'God' out of our ritual and the order could never survive." But every intelligent person knows that the order is self-sustaining; that among its numbers may be counted some of the best business men of the world, and among them are financiers who know that the fundamental principles underlying success are dependent more upon their strict business worth than all the interpolations of Gods and supreme beings which generally are thought to be the cause of such great success.

Let us not be discouraged. Let us continue to agitate this matter. Let us work and never be content until we as Liberals will hav started into existence one of the grandest institutions the world has ever known. As to name, Brother Brott suggests, Patrons of Science. Let me suggest the name of "Free Men and Women of the World," and let its rituals contain nothing but what would absolutely teach freedom in its grand meaning. Let the women be required to possess the same qualifications to be eligible to membership as the men, and let the principles inculcated within each new member be such as will cause him to realize the real import of the name of the institution.

Yours for absolute freedom, J. H. GUTHRIE.

MR. EDITOR: My response to Mr. Perry's last letter in THE TRUTH SEEKER, about two months ago, having evidently been consigned to your waste-basket, I will try again; and, being of the opinion that defamatory lying and quibbling in debate should be mercilessly defamed, Mr. Perry and his sympathizers notwithstanding, if THE TRUTH SEEKER has come to the rescue of defamatory lying and quibbling, it will be an unwelcome visitor at my residence and very likely be kicked out. Moreover, I hav promised that I shall endeavor to stay by Mr. Perry until he is satisfied that I can giv as good as I get and a liberal rate of interest, except of his lying and quibbling, which is lower than I shall "stoop to conquer," or hav occasion to, etc. Lying and quibbling appears to be his main reliance and principal stock in trade; if eliminated, nothing will remain that is worth combating. If I combat it and challenge him to name the date of your issue in which the statements he charges me with are published over my signature, he charges me with pitching into himself, personally, and trying to abuse him by saying that he is a liar, quibbler, and ruffian, to which he adds more lying and quibbling. I think he should know, if he knows anything at all, that nothing is more personal, insulting, and abusiv, than his defamatory lying and quibbling. And it is no more abusiv of those who practice lying and quibbling to call them liars, quibblers, and ruffians, than of a dog to call him a dog. I hav given much better than I hav received and more of it, yet he persistently comes for more. King Solomon would probably suspect him of being a brother to the horse-leeches' daughters.

He dashed at me on his outset like an infuriated bull at a red rag, and fastened upon me with defamatory lying and quibbling, and sticks tighter than a leech. I indulged a hope that he had some self-respect and would find it expedient to let go and drop off; but I now think it doubtful if a mule can kick hard enough to kick him off. I am sure that I can not, for I hav tried my "level best" to do so, and must, reluctantly and regretfully, acknowledge defeat on that point; for my defeat is anything but a reputable gain for Mr. Perry. It was evident to my view that he provoked a wrangle with me for the especial purpose of exhibiting his talent for defamatory lying and quibbling in debate; I hav obligingly given him rope, and he has hanged himself—I hope to his entire satisfaction, and that he will not offer to annoy me with any more of his absurd nonsense. For nothing is more absurd and nonsensical than undertaking to combat truth with defamatory lying and quibbling.

He affects not to hav intelligence enough to comprehend the import or importance of provisos and exceptions, and takes no note of them, therefore it were as unreasonable to expect him to make an entirely truthful statement as to make two elevations without a depression between. He has given us good reason to suspect that if he were a Christian and should, through carelessness, ignorance, or accident, make an entirely truthful statement and become aware of it, he would go down upon his knees and waste an hour or two in earnest prayer for God to forgiv him; but would not be likely to hav frequent occasion to waste his time in that way on account of such delinquency.

I applied the term ruffianism to his defamatory lying and quibbling that none but a ruffian should practice; and positivly asserted that I shall not practice it. He affects to misunderstand that to imply that I am a bigger ruffian than he is. I cannot account for such an absurd misunderstanding except on the presumption that he has been reading up in the Proverbs, and fancies that I hav answered a fool according to his folly and made myself appear somewhat like him; and, having an instinctiv proclivity to exaggerating, he endeavors to persuade us that I am more like the fool than the fool is like himself. To a careless and superficial observer, the foregoing will probably appear somewhat personal; but the logical investigator will perceive that I hav confined myself strictly to the discussion of an ethical, or unethical, principle of which Mr. Perry appears to be a voluntary representativ and champion, and takes to the vocation like a duck to water. And, as an act of simple justice, I hav obligingly taken occasion to giv him a character that he has fairly earned by his special talent and persevering industry, for which favor I shall expect him to be duly grateful. J. A. TUTTLE.

ST. ELMO, TENN., Dec. 2, 1890.

MR. EDITOR: It is no wonder that the Republicans were so overwhelmingly defeated in the late election when we consider the passage of the anti-lottery law and its villainous enforcement. That is the most outrageous and contemptible law since the passage of the fugitiv slave law, which reduced every liberty-loving man to the condition of a bloodhound, to hunt down and return a fugitiv to his unpaid toil. The United States obscenity law was bad enough in that it allowed irresponsible parties to invade the mails and destroy private correspondence. That was a stroke at the liberty of the individual—an outrage on the private citizen. But this anti-lottery law is a stroke at public liberty, at the right of free speech, at the liberty of the press. And every citizen that cares for the right, that cares for his country, that cares for the liberty of himself and his fellows, ought to denounce the law with all the force he is master of.

It is infamous to declare a thing a crime that has been in existence from prehistoric time, without giving the people some limit of time to conform to the law. A party that will enact such a law, and then make indecent haste to execute it, ought to be hurled down to eternal forgetfulness.

There is no one perhaps more opposed to the lottery than myself. I oppose it from its inception in the church—its wet nurse, its dry nurse, and its nursery—where a penny whistle is raffled for a dime, where young ladies dispose of kisses for twenty-five cents each, to be decided by the dice-box, and where no doubt more delicious favors could be had for a little higher price. I oppose it on its route through the state lotteries, up to booming towns and territories, and electing constables and presidents.

If the lottery is wrong, suppress the lottery, but let the newspaper alone. If the lottery is wrong and it advertises in a paper, that puts the bloodhounds of the law on its track, so as to harry it down.

What! Suppress a newspaper for publishing the locality of an outlaw? No, but rather giv it material aid, a bonus in cash for detecting the criminal.

When a people will tamely submit to hav their newspapers confiscated for that which has never been a crime, they are ready to accept any other infamy.

I am astonished at the apathy with which almost the entire press of the country let this phase of the law pass by. They ought to make it so red-hot for the country that President Harrison would ask Wanamaker to step down and out for his pusillanimous action in enforcing this odious enactment.

When a party will attempt to overthrow the liberty of the press, it is ready to overthrow the government; it is time the party was downed.

If the United States can find a pretext to disestablish the Mormon church and confiscate its property, without confiscating the newspapers, it can surely find some reason to break up the lottery without disturbing the newspapers.

This idea of making every petty postmaster a censor of the press, is revolting to the American mind, and a direct insult to every citizen in the land. What does America want of a censor anyway? Is not every man and woman a "consensus of the competent" to choose for themselvs what they want? Go to, then, with the censor of the press and the mails.

If the postmaster-general is going to find wit for the witless in lottery matters, how long before he will be trying to find it for them in the other avenues of life? How long before he will order his deputies to cast out of the mails all newspapers opposed to his party politics? It is only another step to furnish the stuffing, political and religious, that shall enter the papers at all. Down with the scheme. Down with the dictator. Down with the censor.

AN OPEN LETTER TO REV. JOB HARRAL, EURODA, MISS.

COALING, ALA., Nov. 24, 1890.

Dear Sir: Your letter in the November Pulpit emboldens me to address you through the columns of THE TRUTH SEEKER. I do not propose to meddle in yours and Mr. Shaw's discussion, but you seem to be frank and honest, and withal generous; and as I am desirous of knowing all I can, it is possible I can learn something from you. I was once a Baptist in faith, and thought all other sects were deluded or hypocrits. In some of your letters to Mr. Lawrence you said you would sooner be an Infidel than believe that those were Christians that committed all the persecutions that hav come down to us through history. You now say in your letter to Mr. Shaw, Christianity is a different thing. I turn to a lexicon and find it means a follower of, a believer in, Christ. All those said they were and did follow Christ. I was talking to a Baptist not long ago. He said I could talk to him, but if he was to catch me talking to his children he would kill me. A Baptist preacher said in the pulpit an Infidel was a fit subject for the asylum, a fit subject for hell, and ought to be run out of society. Would not these Baptists do all these cut-throat deeds if they had the power? And does not your definition narrow it down very fine, so fine that it might be termed a failure? You believe there are two powers, one for good and the other for evil. Now the power for good is being outgeneraled in every detail. Christ said the few would be saved and the many lost. Would not a general be cashiered if he should make such blunders? Mr. Harral, is not the Christian's faith based on a wrong premis? Will you tell me where your soul or spirit was before you were born? At what time did it enter your body? Did you receive it conjointly from each parent? If so, what becomes of the half-souls that are never developed? Or if you receive it with the first breath, why has not the puppy the same advantage? Will you please tell me why Christ made the mistake in placing the sensorium in the heart instead of the head? Will you tell me where heaven and hell are? Do not you know there is no such thing as up and down, only as apparent terms? In answering these questions, do not expand and contract language and reason, but giv both a showing. You know the Greeks were warring with Syracuse to no effect, and they sought the advice of the oracle; it was, they were to be crowned with victory only when the ocean washed the feet of the temple. You know how reason was expanded. Galen said, "We cannot bring the sea here, but we can dedicate all the land to the sea." Now, this is just the kind of logic the Christian uses to make the God idea agree with reason. You know your Christ said, "These are the signs that shall follow them that believe: In my name they shall cast out devils, heal the sick, and if they drink any deadly thing it shall not hurt them, or if bitten by a serpent it shall not hurt them." You say, Oh, well, we can't do that now, but away back yonder people were much better, more holy—they could. According to your logic we are yet going downhill, when it is just the reverse. You ask to be pointed to an Infidel nation. All nations were Infidels, only the Jews and nations that hav been proselyted since A.D., and as history is only made of a few individuals let me refer you to a few. Can you refer me to a better man than Socrates? Not outside of Bob Ingersoll. Can you giv me the name of a Christian that is peer to Cicero? These people were Infidels. Pagan religion is just as good as Christian, and I think better. Was not the Prometheus myth better than the Christ? The former was willing to suffer for all time to benefit the whole human family, the latter shrank to just die for a short time. Mr. Harral, I fail to see any great sacrifice Christ made. Men, women, and children die for one another, and know they can never come back; and they do that every day in the year somewhere. And then to save only a few and lose the many—what an admission! Let us look at that Texas murder law. Phrenology teaches that traits of character are stamped before birth and that the person is about as responsible for them as for birthmarks. And just so long as a state or commonwealth says there are crimes that deserve death, just so long we will hav murder. You know tyrannical parents raise tyrannical children, only as atavism interferes. It is just as much harm for twelve men or a thousand to murder one man, as it is for one. Two wrongs never made one right.

Mr. Harral, do not you think a God that would multiply the sorrows of woman in the most holy function of motherhood, would be a devil? Would you do it? His statue ought to be set up at every cross-road with that text, and "Execrable!" written against it. How was the anatomy of woman changed to produce that effect, and did the curse extend to all mammals? If not, why do they suffer? Do not you know that woman is better than man in every detail, notwithstanding that unholy curse? Mr. Harral, do not you think if you had filled your pulpit as a moral and scientific teacher instead of as a divine, you would hav done much more good than you hav? If you had taught that every transgression of moral and scientific law would be followed with its sure penalty right here, not over yonder, it would hav had better effect. We Infidels believe that when a black thought or a dirty act has once crossed the brain, even the blood of a God could not efface it. Remember the fable of the young man and his cat; though she was transformed into a beautiful woman, when she heard the mouse she was out of his arms and after it.

EAU CLAIRE, WIS., Dec. 1, 1890.

MR. EDITOR: I hav read with much attention Mr. Wakeman's criticism on Mr. Pentecost and Anarchists in general. Mr. Pentecost is doubtless able to defend himself, if he thinks it worth while, but possibly what he says may never appear in your columns. Hence "the spirit moveth me." Mr. Wakeman affects what seems to me an unbecoming contempt for the assumed ignorance of Anarchists—"if they knew a little about sociology, etc." Does Mr. Wakeman know more about sociology than such Anarchists as Karl Marx and Elisée Reclus? The question, though provoked, is, I fear, unkind; for to say yes would convict him of enormous egotism, and to say no, of gross (probably unintentional) misrepresentation. So it may remain unanswered. If the ignorant Anarchist had "the smallest smattering of the science of sociology, he would know that society is an organism." Well, now, it is just possible that the ignorant Anarchist may hav heard this observation, and deliberately labeled it "one of the many fallacies of Herbert Spencer"—a fanciful metaphysical writer whose relation to positiv science is little higher than that of a mere popularizer. Society is not an organism. An organism is an individual exhibiting during a part of its existence the phenomena of life, among which the most remarkable is this, that the parts cannot exist without the whole, or at best can only become similar wholes, while the whole is comparativly little injured by the amputation of a part. This is the reverse of what we see in society. All the progress and evolution of society is due to the influence of superior individuals. Society, with all that blind stupidity which belongs not to organisms but inert masses, perpetually squeezes these superior individuals beneath its Juggernaut wheels. If they fail to upset it and are forced out by it, like the Jews and Arabs from that society which is called Spain, the society itself begins to decay forthwith. But the individuals in such cases do not perish. They become the founders of better societies. Society, otherwise called the multitude and the mob, consists of monkeys not so much improved but what they are still governed by the imitativ instinct. It does not make the superior individuals, but they make it all it is beyond a troop of hairy, howling troglodytes. And as society deserves no credit for its own improvement, so the poor thing deserves no blame for its own backwardness. It cannot help being barbarous and stupid. There is not a more immoral cant than that which lays the blame of customary bad actions on its impersonal shoulders. Whatever Mr. Wakeman may say, it was Grover Cleveland and not Erie county who hanged that man. The worst that can be said of Erie county is that it was too much of a monkey to stop the individual simian called Cleveland when he set about doing what the anthropidæ always had done in such cases. Mr. Wakeman admits that government "in the current sense of the word is in most instances nothing but tyranny"—a large admission, surely. But "it was not so in the past, and will not be so in the future." Now will Mr. Wakeman please giv an instance of a government which was ever anything else than a tyranny? We ignorant Anarchists hope a man who knows something of sociology will not let us burst in ignorance. We are hungering and thirsting for an example of a government which was a "guide" instead of being altogether behind the age, a "protector" instead of an enslaver. Mr. Wakeman refers to the atrocious laws of Illinois in proof that Anarchism will bring slavery instead of liberty. Surely Mr. Wakeman knows enough of sociology to be aware that tyranny always rallies against every advance in freedom, and the fight between these opposits grows hotter, with the external advantage in favor of the former, till the tyrant overleaps the great simian law of following precedent, so that the very monkeys rise against him. Some contributors to the paper founded by D. M. Bennett spoke a word for the personal liberty of women, and lo! the Comstock law! Will Mr. Wakeman so stultify his record as to say the remedy is to plead for "our suffering sisters" nevermore? "Government of some kind or other is a necessity," says Mr. Wakeman. This is very dogmatical language to come from a cultivator of the science of sociology; but dogmatism is the whole stock in trade of all who believe in government. Mr. Wakeman is honorably distinguished as an opponent of wooden gods and ghost gods. May he continue to the end. But he is going the wrong way now. His actual "society" is a helpless wooden god, his coming "nation" an impossible ghost god. He is entirely mistaken in saying that Nationalism has a future. A thing of yesterday, the creature of a novel, it is already withering like the prophet's gourd. Anarchism, a tree of some fifty years' growth, has never been eradicated from any soil in which it once took root. Converted Socialists are numberless. There never was a converted Anarchist.

C. L. JAMES.

LEXINGTON, KY., Dec. 1, 1890.

MR. EDITOR: It is well known that Luther condemned the book of Esther, remarking that it should be cheerfully thrown into the Elbe. The book of Job is evidently a work of fiction, perhaps of Persian or Indian origin. Many other books are alluded to, casually, in the Old Testament, which are lost. Marcion, who was reverenced as a holy man by all Christians, set aside the whole of the Old Testament, as being too bloody and fierce for him and his disciples. Very little of the New Testament did he retain. The Jews think they can prove that the Pentateuch has never been altered. Perhaps it would be a better work if the pious men of the Middle Ages had tampered with it, as they did with the New Testament. In standard encyclopedias you will find the cool statement that Tertullian wrote the book of Thessalonians. Eusebius condemned the epistles of Peter in toto, the epistle to the Hebrews, Acts, and other inspired works. The Hebrew was a dead language in the time of Christ, who spoke Syrian Greek, and Hallam remarks that a Syrian grammar was not written until the seventh century.

No doubt correct Hebrew manuscripts are in existence, but they are of no use to the humble scholar or reader. The modern Jew uses the Christian Bible; Jewish children long ago were not permitted to read the sacred books until twenty-five years of age, according to Josephus. When Origen offered a translation of the Bible he used the works of Theodotian and other Asiatic scholars, not attempting a construction of his own. Mr. Longshore suggests the name of Elohim instead of God, which would read, "The Gods said, let there be light." If we advance backward, no doubt Siva will soon be worshiped by a respectable congregation.

Who will tell us something of the "Companion" to the revised edition?

With regard to the gentleman who could hear five miles: Our natural capabilities are sometimes greatly enlarged, which is only the faint dawn of that which the coming man shall certainly be under favorable circumstances. Perfect holiness and the study of pure science will conduct the human race to a sphere where these great powers will be daily exercised.

On a late Sunday I found all in confusion in the post-office, an hour not sufficient for business. Two gentlemen walked toward the money order office, but it was closed. Is this a free country?

Mr. Mills was a disappointment here. He seems to be stumping round the country as a professor of the black art of Christian magic, which infuriates its victims, and they murder as Abraham did, and lie and commit any crime with a good design. Perhaps his eloquence and the old tirade called orthodoxy, with the idea of the "only begotten son of God," would convert the Jews. Milton said "the oracles are dumb," but the ravings of a priestess drunk with nepenthe, catnip, ivy, or henbane, could not equal what we learn from pulpits and Bibles, quite unlike the ordinary philosophy taught in schools, where they hav not yet run completely crazy. And then such facts! A huge bedstead, a hueless, dead, Egyptian dolphin, to the disgust of Byron; a good assortment of pitchers and rams' horns, jawbones, foxes, mandrakes, and cucumbers; talk about these human beings created suddenly in a garden, a man marrying his own sister, a woman turned to salt; miracles by the dozen, in which the dead are full of life and twice as natural; so easy to obtain bread and fish and the frying-pan too. It is fearful to think of the "gospel preached to the poor" when not one of them is present in the gilded church. But I had forgotten Sapphira, the wife of Ananias, Communists. She was so harshly reproved that she scarcely knew her own hash-dish, that emblem of eternity, for what was left from to-day I heard she cooked with to-morrow's supply. Where she is now, she makes it of many horned things, and seasons it with brimstone and turpentine. Funnels can be placed in cheerful boarders' mouths, and they will not be allowed to refuse this delicacy. Black art indeed, when the hearts of converted Christians are crossed over with strings of steel. And if the soul is created jet-black by a wise God, will he justly hold them responsible for what they do? He hears their hard words; their coarse contempt for the poor they hav robbed he sees with indifference. Clothe a man with power, let him nearly ride upon the whirlwind as his chariot, place three crowns upon his head, with a king each side to hold his stirrup, and then ask him to be modest, humble, moderate, unselfish, and just!

But if religion is not a black art, but a healthful disciplin, what is the grand result of the ages under its tuition? What has it produced? A wave of desolation, crime, and corruption is passing over the world, unchecked by religion or morality, tainted by the same. The church has plunged the masses in a bloody sectarian strife for power.

The love of the church for power and money is at the root of every evil. The public schools, which ought to be sacred to science, are corrupted by the lying history whose artful, malicious assertions awaken all the fury of the human heart. The fingers of the church, coated with deadly poison, greedily clutch every enterprise, till all business meetings are opened with the withering, stifling prayer.

The Freethinkers need a Masonic association, which can receive the most timid within its borders. Millions will flock thither if one thing is done. Entrance money must be according to a person's ability, so that something can be drawn at once in the way of interest. What fraternal band could be stronger? The poorest will be helped a little.

Go to, ye pious rich, who are vultures preying upon the heart of society—a gang of banditti whose wealth would dry up if the blood of the poor was exhausted. Outlaws and robbers, who make a virtue of what was always called a crime, and snatch the morsel from the poor to fill yourselvs with luxuries, without shame, decency, or sense of honor! They must be your natural enemies who are crowded twelve in a room. Arise and giv them a better home. Dot the land with sacred portions of soil for their benefit, and thus avert a storm which may now be gathering.

In some way I receive kind and friendly letters from very wealthy gentlemen frequently who say that I am writing for their benefit. Something sent to Mr. Macdonald would soon reach me. He has been a kind friend and never forgets me in poverty. A registered letter is best in this post-office.

Children's Corner.

Edited by MISS SUSAN H. WIXON, Fall River, Mass., to whom all Communications for this Corner should be sent.

Between the dark and the daylight,
When the night is beginning to lower,
Comes a pause in the day's occupations
That is known as the Children's Hour."

A Boy's Soliloquy.

Now here is my new chest of tools,
And there's to be six long weeks' vacation,
I'm just going to make something in that time
That will astonish all creation.
'Tisn't going to be any slow-coach either,
But something that will go like fun,
And when I get it started once
It won't stop till it's had its run.

But no! I must fix it so as to manage it,
So I can stop or turn about—
Shan't always want to go straight ahead,
But take a different route.
Can't tell what I shall call it yet—
Engin, landship, or velocipede,
But one thing I've decided on,
It shan't be beat for speed.

I'll scoot up by the Widow Green's,
And show her smart son Chris
That his old dog-cart he bragged over
Is nothing compared to this.
And father will not hav it to say again
That everything I begin,
After all my big calculations,
Doesn't amount to a single pin.

I hav been thinking how I will start it,
With wind or steam or powder—
Powder is forbid, though, since my bombshell burst,
And blew the old teakettle to chowder.
I had lots of fun with that old thing
Until the cover split,
And half came whizzing close to my head,
Almost taking that along with it.

I should hav trembled in my boots
If I'd happened to hav them on,
But as I went barefooted those warm days,
I only just cut and run.
When father had come home that night
And saw the wreck I'd made,
It wasn't such a very soft grip he had,
Or such very soft words he said.

He told me if I ever used powder again,
In any shape or way,
He would shut me up and keep me there
Until my hair was gray.
Mercy! there goes the dinner bell,
And I've not done a thing,
Only to saw this board in two,
And bend this wire for a spring.

Beats all how fast the hours fly,
Four of them gone so soon,
And I promised to go a-fishing
The whole of this afternoon.
Guess I'll put away this "going-to-be" machine
Until I shall hav more time,
When I'll get my things together again,
Finish it and make it climb.

MRS. L. A. BUELL.

How Gertie Helped Shout.

A CHRISTMAS STORY.

Gertie Parton was a thirteen-year-old philosopher with a bright head on her shoulders, and several opinions of her own.

It was one of her father's maxims that "Children should learn to think for themselvs." That Gertie should learn to think reasonably and wisely he encouraged her to read sensible books, to ask sensible questions, to reason her faults into shamefacedness and to be honest with herself and the world. That was the way Gertie became a philosopher; because people who look at the world with honest, thoughtful eyes find so much interesting and inspiring that ordinary people do not see, that they generally become philosophers—for philosophy, you know, is love of wisdom, desire for truth.

This little philosopher who had several opinions of her own, came home from school the Friday night before Christmas with a big thought in her head, and somehow, after supper, around the evening lamp, the big thought jumped into words:

"Papa, Carrie Langdon in our class is going to hav a Christmas-tree at her church and she is learning a carol (a song, you know), about:

"Since Christ was born the ages thrill
With peace on earth, good will, good will.'

Then Gertie hesitated and her father looked at her questioningly and saw that she was very sober-faced.

"It isn't true," said Gertie. "All the children are going to sing it and it isn't true! Just as if the man who wrote it ever read history! Because since Christ was born everybody has been fighting everybody else about everybody's religion. And you know, Constantine the Great got converted and fought all over Europe and killed everybody that wouldn't be a Christian. I hav read 'Hypatia,' too; how the Christians killed her because she taught philosophy and arithmetic in Rome and would not believe as they did. And the Crusades to the Holy Land, as they called it, to kill the Turks. And the war of the Reformation, with the massacres of Smithfield and the St. Bartholomew's eve. Ever since Christ was born the Christians hav been quarreling and killing, and that Christian carol about 'peace and good will' isn't true."

How Gertie's eyes flashed! How earnest she was in her eager array of facts!

"Well, what shall we do about it?" asked Mr. Parton, looking grave and earnest too, though he smiled at the little girl's impetuosity.

"O papa! can't we do anything? Must they go on singing and preaching and writing what isn't true, just because they don't think or are afraid to think?

"The churches can't hav inquisitions and kill people any more, because it is against the law, and they would be punished for it, but they want to send everybody to hell forever and ever after they die, if they don't believe as the churches do, no matter how good and kind they may hav been. Of course they don't know there is such an awful place and it is all a frightening story, but some people believe it and feel bad about it.

"Little children who died without being baptized or believing would go into the burning lake, they said at the revival meeting last winter, when Carrie Langdon's little sister went into a fit and old Peter Jenkins got religion, because he thought he was going to die with the rheumatism, and then, as soon as he got well, went to drinking again.

"When at school we hav to read the Bible about miracles and visions, and it teaches the children to believe in ghosts and all sorts of nonsense about the world being made in seven days, when it took centuries and centuries——" Gertie had not finished her pleading, but she was out of breath.

"Then you want to be a missionary to educate these church-going 'heathens' in science and history and peace and good will?" interrogated her father with another smile, but just as much in earnest as before.

"O papa! you know I don't mean to be bold or to think I could teach grown people, because I don't begin to know enough even to be sure I am right in so many things. But I should like to hear somebody shout out the truth as loud and strong as they sing the Christmas carol at Carrie Langdon's church."

That was what Gertie said.

Then her father had a big thought, and when he told it to the little philosopher she clapped her hands and then threw them around his neck in an old-fashioned hug.

"But it will cost money. How much will you help shout?" asked her father.

"Whatever you were going to spend on my Christmas present, and the $2 in my bank," replied Gertie. Perhaps you think that was a queer answer, but her father thought it a very wise and generous one, for he went down the street and told it, and his big thought, to half a dozen large-minded gentlemen, and they promised to "help shout," too.

Then he sent a telegram, and when the answer came he hurried off to the printers. The next day it was in the newspapers, big, yellow posters about it decorated the sides of buildings, fences, and store windows, all over town, and everybody was talking of it. And this is what it was:

"FREETHOUGHT LECTURE.
FREE TO ALL.
COME."

And they did come. On Christmas eve they flocked to the town hall, the Browns, the Jones, and the Robinsons; Carrie Langdon's father and Gertie's school-teacher, and a great many more people that Gertie knew and did not know, and when all the seats were filled and Squire Ellery, the most looked-up-to, learned, and influential man in town, introduced the lecturer and quoted what Ingersoll has written about intellectual hospitality, and welcoming new thoughts, not like tramps to set the dogs on, but like guests to be entertained, and if they prove true and helpful, to be made friends of—when all this happened and the lecturer really began to "shout the truth out loud," and the audience applauded, Gertie was the happiest and proudest girl in all the world, she thought.

Over at Carrie Langdon's church they were singing the Christmas carol, but not a word of it was heard by the people in the town hall, and they heard something truer and better and wiser, instead; and when the lecture was ended and everybody was clapping and stamping and looking as if they meant every echo of praise, Gertie's papa, who sat by her, whispered:

"Hav we shouted the truth loud enough?" and Gertie said "Yes!" with sparkling eyes.

Rome was not built in a day, and of course the town did not become liberal-thoughted and forget its creeds and its prejudices all in one night. Some people even said that the lecture was "shocking!" They were the ones who did not hear it.

Those who did remembered it and reasoned over it, and grew broader and wiser through it, and with Gertie's help a "shout for truth" was given forth that Christmas eve whose echoes are widening and deepening and will never be silenced. M. A. W.

Chats with Correspondents.

JULIA B.—Christmas is a pagan institution fixed up and celebrated as a Christian festival. As observed by the pagans, it had some reasonable significance, but regarded as the birthday of Christ, it is of no importance, since no one knows when he was born, and many hav grave doubts whether such a being was ever born at all. The birth of American Independence has far more significance, and is, in every sense, more worthy of commemoration. In regard to spending Christmas, read the sensible story in another column.

J. A. F.—Always ask yourself before undertaking any new thing, Is this right? Shall I be benefited or injured on its account? Will my action bring happiness to others, or misery and trouble? Never be afraid of reason and calm judgment.

HENRY.—Sunday is as good as any other day. It is well to hav one day set apart for rest and recreation. We do not regard it wrong to play on Sunday, provided no one is injured thereby. In fact, Sunday, which is of human origin, should be kept as a holiday. The mistake is in making of it a holy day, instead. We should do no wrong on any day.

KATY R.—Mystery is but another name for ignorance. As soon as we understand a thing the mystery vanishes. Seek knowledge. Science is the real savior of the race.

A little boy wants to know, if "a fellow strikes" him, should he "hit back." Most boys will do that, but it is hard to tell what is the better thing to do without knowing the provocation of the first blow. It seems to us one would feel better not to strike back. Blows are often dangerous and lead to serious consequences. Our hands and arms are not fighting clubs, but are intended for useful employment. Disarm an angry foe by kind words and pleasant smiles.

Correspondence.

PHILADELPHIA, PA., Nov. 23, 1890.

DEAR MISS WIXON: As I hav never written to you before, I thought I would now take the opportunity. My sister has taken THE TRUTH SEEKER for seven months. We think it the best paper of the kind and we see we cannot do without it. The picture in the last paper makes me think of my teacher in the public school reading of David reminding Uriah of his feet, and telling him to go down to his house to wash them. As this is being read the boys turn up their noses, just as boys would do. Such things ought not to be spoken of in public schools; it makes me indignant every time I hear them.

I will close my letter, thinking I hav taken enough of the Corner. I remain,

Your friend, JOHN F. L. SCHULZE.

[We are of John's opinion, that the public schools should not be insulted by anyone reading in them such filthy matter as related above. Never mind. Our splendid corps of young Liberals, of which John is one, will right some wrongs by and by. Study, think, reflect, and write to the Corner, John, as often as inclination prompts.—ED. C. C.]

PHILADELPHIA, PA., Nov. 27, 1890.

DEAR MISS WIXON: As I am very much interested in the success of the Children's Corner, I wish to correct a mistaken idea of an Englishman about "Boys who do not play" in your issue of November 22d.

My experience as a German, raised in a boarding school, was quite different. As soon as we were through with our afternoon lessons we were permitted to go into the yard, where we amused ourselvs with games, such as ball, foot-ball, bat and ball, "catch, black man," "hide and seek," and numerous other games.

In summer time the teacher would take us to the country once a week, where we played games all the afternoon.

At the age of ten I went to the public school and found there a similar arrangement. Twice a week we had gymnastic exercises and games, while we amused ourselvs with games every day during recess.

In almost every German household you can find children, from two years up, playing games.

To prove the above statement I shall giv an extract from the report of Professor Hartwell, who was especially delegated by the government of the United States to report on the General Turnfest at Dresden in 1885. He says: "There exists a general, but erroneous, opinion among foreigners that German children do not play, though the history of the kindergarten system and of school turning affords abundant evidence to the contrary. Not only hav the Germans a great variety of national games for children and youth, but, in many cases, they hav made vigorous efforts to introduce and acclimatize foreign games, like cricket and foot-ball. Baseball and lacrosse are apparently unknown to them. In some cities, and notably in Berlin, Dresden, and Frankfort, special efforts are made by the school authorities, and various private associations, to secure public playgrounds for the children of all classes, and much has been accomplished in this direction. No one could witness the play of sixteen hundred school-girls, and twelve hundred school-boys, under the lead of the teachers, on the Dresden Festplatz, and deny that German children are gamesome as well as tractable. The girls played at catch, running races, ball, skipping-rope, etc., and the boys engaged in foot-ball, bat and ball, tug-of-war, and the like. As a rule, the German school and city authorities provide more generously and intelligently for the recreation of the children under their charge, than is the case in Great Britain or America."

Hoping you will giv the children of the Corner a correct idea about German boys and girls, I remain, with best wishes for your success, Yours for truth, A. ROLLE.

[It hardly seemed credible when we read the statement that German children did not play games like boys and girls of other nationalities, and we thank the writer of the foregoing for setting us right on the question. Nature compels activity in childhood, and this means growth and development. We would say to all healthy children, play, with all the strength and energy possible, activ out-door games, and then apply yourselvs to study with the same force and earnestness. Thus will you become good scholars.—ED. C. C.]

RED CLOUD, NEB., Nov. 21, 1890.

DEAR MISS WIXON: It has been a long time since I wrote to the Children's Corner. I am living in the town of Red Cloud, and attend school when I am well enough. I am disappointed when there are no letters in the Children's Corner. I want the little Freethinkers to wake up and tell us what they are doing. I hav been to Sunday-school twice this past summer. The children nearly all attend the Sunday-school. There are four or five Sunday-schools in town, and no churches. The children are taught that they must love Jesus, that they are made of dust, and God made everything. A minister called and gave us a very polite invitation to come to hear him preach. He asked if the little girl went to Sunday-school; he found out all about it. We prefer taking a ride in the country when the weather is pleasant. I had a party on my tenth birthday, and received presents too numerous to mention. I am taking music lessons. I will close, with love to the editor of the Corner.

Respectfully yours, MAUD A. OLMSTED.

[The editor of the Corner thanks Maud for the pretty motto picture inclosed, and hopes she will write again. May she and all our correspondents be faithful to the truth as it is revealed in nature.—ED. C. C.]

DONALD KENNEDY

Of Roxbury, Mass., says

I hav kept a SCRAP BOOK for a good many years of letters received from patients; some are long, too long to publish, some are short and good. Rainy days I sit down and read them, and hav learned a good deal about the human body from some poor, sickly woman or overstrained man. Here is one of them. I call it a good letter:

TRENTON, TEX., Sept. 28, 1886.

To Kennedy of the Medical Discovery, Roxbury, Mass. I am so proud of my recovery as to express my feelings in thanks to you. The RHEUMATISM has made me four legged for six years. At last I hav traded off two of them to Bell—druggist—for four bottles of Kennedy's Discovery. I am yours gratefully and unsolicited, J. B. IVY.

FOR HER DAILY BREAD.

A NINETEENTH CENTURY NOVEL.

Preface by R. G. INGERSOLL.

For Her Daily Bread is the story of two young girls and a younger brother who were left parentless, with little money, fair education, and much courage, to make their way through the world by going to Chicago. The author is also the heroin. The narrativ is, in the main, a history of a working girl's life and experience in the city of Chicago among bluff business men, kind-hearted folks, and disreputable hypocrits. It is just such a story of human life as we should expect Colonel Ingersoll to be interested in; and whatever he admires and appreciates is sure to be worth the attention of the rest of the world. Price 25 cents.

OR,

The Church of Practical Religion.

BY REPORTER.

This is the history of an attempt to found a church without superstition, and its success. Uncle Job Sawyer, the pastor, having established his pulpit, uses it to discuss all the vital questions of human concern, religious, political, and otherwise. The book is written in well-chosen language, and easily understood. There is just sufficient narrativ about it to interest the reader and hold his attention while the truth is being brought to his mind.

The penalty for profane swearing is sixty-seven cents for each oath, or, in default of payment, one day in jail for each oath.

THE Farmers' Alliance national convention demanded the supplanting of national banks by government sub-treasuries lending money at two per cent on non-perishable farm products and other securities; prohibition of alien ownership of land, and reclamation of land now wrongly held by corporations; removal of tariff on necessaries; a graduated income tax; just government supervision of means of transportation, or if this fails, government ownership.

KING HUMBERT of Italy proclaims that he has guaranteed religion its rights, but has not permitted it to invade his province of sovereign, as the civil is superior to the religious rule. Catholics deny this, saying: "The king who robbed the charities of Italy, destroyed the church properties, prohibited church processions, prevented bishops and priests from performing their duties, cut off the poor from the sacraments, and put the clergy below criminals in the dispensing of justice, . . . can hardly hav had enough respect for the rights of the church to hav secured them properly. There is nothing in King Humbert's character or in the party which supports him to prevent the destruction of St. Peter's to-morrow and the banishment or imprisonment of the prelates of Italy."

Gems of Thought.

CAN it be said that the conformation of animals is according to their necessities? What are those necessities? self-preservation and propagation. Now, is it astonishing that, of the infinit combinations produced by chance, those only hav subsisted which had organs adapted for their nourishment and the continuation of their species? Must not all others necessarily hav perished?—Lucretius.

THE modification of plants and animals in the course of generations is a fact. It happens even in the same external circumstances; while under alteration of circumstances, the changes become vastly greater. Now, if any means can be assigned whereby some of the modified forms are kept alive while all the others perish, the deviations are rendered permanent. Mr. Darwin provides an instrumentality of this nature in what he calls Natural Selection, or the preservation of the fittest in the struggle of life. It has been his endeavor to accumulate a vast multitude of facts showing the principle in operation, many of them inexplicable on any other supposition. Herbert Spencer, Huxley, Hooker, Wallace, and others, hav contributed to the support and elucidation of the hypothesis. . . . Properly speaking there is no rival hypothesis. The Special Creation view is a phrase that merely expresses our ignorance.—Bain's Logic.

WE want the inevitable news, be it sad or cheering, wherefore and by what means they are extant this new day. If they are well, let them whistle and dance; if they are dyspeptic, it is their duty to complain, that so they may in any case be entertaining.—Thoreau.

As I lay with my head in your lap camerado,
The confession I made I resume, what I said to you and the open air I resume,
I know I am restless and make others so,
I know my words are weapons full of danger, full of death,
For I confront peace, security, and all the settled laws, to unsettle them,
I am more resolute because all hav denied me than I could ever hav been had all accepted me,
I heed not and hav never heeded either experience, cautions, majorities nor ridicule,
And the threat of what is called hell is little or nothing to me,
And the lure of what is called heaven is little or nothing to me;
Dear camerado! I confess I hav urged you onward with me, and still urge you, without the least idea what is our destination,
Or whether we shall be victorious, or utterly quelled and defeated.—Walt Whitman.

To the World's Columbian Exposition Commission:

Learning that there is an organized movement among the more conservative church people—manipulated by a "Sabbath" organization—to induce your honorable body to close on Sundays the World's Fair, to be held in 1893 in Chicago, the undersigned respectfully put in this counter petition, and ask that the Fair may be open to the public on each Sunday of its continuance. We ask this for the following reasons:

1. That the American principle of separation of church and state may be maintained.

2. That public morality may be subserved by providing a substitute for the immoral places to which men may resort when no moral amusements are available.

3. As a matter of justice also to the people of Chicago who have given of their means to make the Fair possible, tens of thousands of whom can visit the Fair only on a general holiday; and as a matter of justice also to the visitors to the Fair, whose time or means may be limited, and who certainly are entitled to great consideration at your hands.

4. For the public good. The opening of the Fair on Sunday will be for the benefit not only of Chicago, but of the whole country. The rights of no one are infringed, the happiness of no one disturbed. Those who wish to attend can do so; those who do not can otherwise spend the day. This is a solely humanitarian question, a question of human relations and human welfare, and, therefore, the only standard by which you can decide is that of the public welfare.

5. It will benefit the Fair, attracting a much larger attendance, interesting more people in it, and increasing its receipts.

6. To the objection that Sunday opening of the Fair will destroy the day as a rest-day, we affirm that the tendency would be exactly the opposite. The more beautiful you make Sunday, the more attractive, the more noble and varied in its pleasures and instructions, the more difficult it will be to change its character, the less danger there is that employers will ever have the power to transfer it from its present position to the days of toil. With choice of Sunday occupation restricted to attending church or visiting a saloon, the average workingman would choose to keep on laboring.

7. Finally: Opening the World's Fair on Sunday will harm no one but the keepers of immoral places, while it will benefit the Fair itself, the people of Chicago, and the visitors to the Fair, thereby conducing to municipal prosperity, individual education, public morality, and the development and good of the whole country.

A JOURNAL OF FREETHOUGHT AND REFORM.

THE PAPAL PLAGUE THAT IS POLLUTING OUR ATMOSPHERE.

Notes and Clippings.

THE Minneapolis Journal reports a dispatch from Winnipeg, Manitoba, which says: "The most important judgment ever given in Manitoba was delivered by Judge Killam, November 24th, in the celebrated appeal of the Roman Catholics against an act passed by the last legislature abolishing separate schools. The decision is against the Catholics, but the case will be appealed to England, as the Catholics will not be satisfied until a decision is obtained there."

THE difference between "the ancient preacher" and his modern followers is thus stated by the Ensign, Uncasville, Conn.: "The ancient preacher said, 'Woe unto you that are rich.' The modern preacher fulminates against the little boys that smoke. The ancient preacher said, 'Judge not, that ye be not judged.' The modern preacher says, 'Hate those that we hate and vote as we direct or be called rummies and drunkard makers.' The ancient preacher was the friend of those he tried to save. The modern preacher stands aloof and calls them hard names. With the ancient preacher salary was nothing. With the modern preacher salary is everything and he sees the finger of providence pointing only where the pay is biggest."

A GENTLEMAN, of Alabama, recently wrote to the Albany Law Journal asking: "What legally-constituted tribunal ever decided that one day in the week was more 'holy' than another? If so, on what authority?" The question was called out by the remark of the Journal that a man who shaves on Sunday "cheats the Lord out of his time." The Journal responded: "We really are not competent to answer the inquiry, and we turn the inquirer over to the Independent, which is much better informed on the point than we are. The idea of the 'Lord's time' is simply a notion which we hold in common with a good many other superstitious people." The Independent also evidently felt unequal to the task of answering the question, for instead of discussing the query, it launched out upon a long justification of Sunday laws upon so-called civil grounds. Why not answer the question and tell the Alabama man where, when, and how Sunday was made holy?

GEORGE MACDONALD thus discusses the question of church taxation in California: "I am informed that church property in California is subject to taxation. The churches announce 'special collections to pay taxes;' the colored Baptist church on Powell street gave a Thanksgiving dinner for the benefit of the tax fund, and this office has several times been visited by sisters from the Convent of Unsatisfied Yearnings, who were taking contributions to meet the state's demand on Catholic church property. I do not know where the money they collected went to. As I gave them nothing I had no right to inquire, but it is generally understood that the city hall clerks got it. The assessors in San Francisco are to a certain extent Single-Taxers when church property is under consideration; that is, they assess the land, though usually at about half what it would sell for, and exempt the buildings on account of their moral and religious worth to the community. It may yet become necessary to abolish taxes altogether in order to get secular property on anything like an equal footing with that owned by ecclesiastical organizations. This method would be in a line with my scheme for doing away with corruption in office, namely, abolish the office and let the corrupt incumbent earn a living in the sweat of such relativs and friends as are willing to voluntarily contribute to his maintenance."

OF the trial of the Reformed Presbyterian preachers held recently the Freeman's Journal, Roman Catholic, says: "But it now appears that seven of their clergymen in Pennsylvania became so interested in the recent contest there that they actually voted despite the fact that the synod in May voted 129 to 17 against such a course. For this the seven clergymen are to be hauled over the coals. It looks like silly business for intelligent men to be engaged in, but there is no telling to what extremes man's mind will go when submitted to all the winds of perverse doctrin. These ministers hav apparently paid as little attention to the history of the instrument known as the Constitution of the United States as hav the Infidel followers of Colonel Ingersoll, who chippingly made the same assertion. But there is a clause in that Constitution guaranteeing freedom and protection to all forms of religion—with no such guarantee for irreligion—and that is tantamount to a declaration of a belief in God, since all religions center in a creator."

SAYS the Christian at Work: "We cannot as a people too strongly insist that religion in the public schools shall not be taught against the opposition of those who support the schools. We indeed hear not a little—and the plea went in the conference—about teaching 'non-sectarian Christianity,' as being the common law of the land. Touching this we remark, first, there is no such thing as non-sectarian Christianity; and secondly, Christianity is not the common law of the land. As to the first, reading a Protestant version of the Bible is sectarian as against the Douay or Roman Catholic version. As to the second, even in England, whence the common-law theory is derived and applied to this country by its advocates, Lord Coke declared 'the common law adapted itself to the religion of the country just so far as was necessary for the peace and safety of civil institutions, and only where by their inevitable effects they became offenses against man and his temporal security.' In like tenor was the decision of the Massachusetts supreme court [Commonwealth vs. Kneeland]; of Justice Clayton of Delaware [State vs. Chandler]; while the supreme court of Ohio [Bloom vs. Richards] declares, 'Neither Christianity nor any other system of religion is a part of the law of this state.' We could quote at greater length, but hav not the space. To conclude: We hav religion, but the state may not teach it. . . . We must keep our public schools as they are—that is, keep them from sectarian teaching. In this way alone will the state preserve the school against the assaults of the Roman Catholics who would disestablish the system if they could. It will be an evil day for the state that sees the downfall of the public school system through the machinations of the Roman Catholics, and that is the way its downfall will be compassed, if, indeed, it ever is, which God forbid."

Christianity Before the Court.—Concluded.

When all the atrocities recorded in the Bible are considered, is it any wonder that cranks and crazy enthusiasts should abound, when they hav been taught from their youth up that these cruel and unnatural acts were commanded of God?

Oh, I tell you, my friends, that somebody is wickedly responsible for teaching lessons which hav produced such fearful results! Jonathan Edwards said that he would glory in seeing his dearest friends in hell if it was the will of God. No man will harbor such feelings, or giv expression to such a sentiment, until the last vestige of manhood has been eradicated by the belief in a savage religion. Men who entertain such sentiments are the ones who persecute, torture, banish, or burn those who differ from them.

It was a fiendish Christian mob, imbued with this spirit, who set fire to the buildings of Dr. Priestley. Concealed a little way from the house, he saw his apparatus and valuable books and papers, the work of a lifetime, go up in flame. And what was his offense? He had published some books which Christians did not think were orthodox.

Following are some passages of scripture which put this spirit of hellish hatred into the minds of men: "Thus saith the Lord God of Israel, Put every man his sword by his side and go in and out from gate to gate, and slay every man his brother, and every man his companion, and every man his neighbor." "Kill every male among the little ones, and kill every woman who hath known man by lying with him." "And he put them under saws and under harrows of iron, and made them pass through the brick-kiln." "Slay both man and woman, infant and suckling." "Slay utterly old and young, both maids and little children."

Did God write that? Did he ever giv utterance to such savage commands? Did God ever command the killing of helpless children? If God gave these commands, what kind of a God do you worship, my Christian friend? Somebody has told you that the Bible is the word of God, and you hav believed it without thought or reflection. Can you believe that God is good and full of loving-kindness, and that his mercy endureth forever, and at the same time believe that he is guilty of such diabolical acts?

Is it any wonder that men hav been intolerant, and waged bloody wars and murdered their own children, when they believed that God commanded the murder of mothers and babes? Such belief fully entertained is calculated to turn the highest civilization back to a state of savagery and set men to worrying and devouring each other. In what light will these bloody commands appear when compared with the goodness and mercy of God?

The truth is, God never gave such commands, and every sensible man ought to know it. The people were savage, and they plundered each other and waged wars of extermination, and when their leaders wanted to urge on their hounds of destruction they commanded them in the name of God. It is all reasonable that military chieftains bent on murder and plunder should giv such commands; but to charge God with the butchery of little children ought to shame a savage. Marauding military monsters like David and Joshua gave their orders, and told their ignorant, bloodthirsty cohorts that the commands came from God, and they believed it, and that is all there is about it.

Some Christians claim that the O'd Testament was given in different times, for a different purpose, and to a people differing from us in thought, habit, and practice; and that it was well suited to their wants and condition; but the New Testament is the rule of our faith and practice, suited exactly to our spiritual wants, and strictly followed will lead us up to the highest state of civilization and develop the loftiest manhood. That is to say, that God had become more civilized when he wrote the New Testament than when he wrote the O'd.

But the New Testament is by no means the best nor yet the most perfect book which has ever been written. For in it is found a warrant for all the persecutions and wars which hav so much disgraced Christianity for hundreds of years, as the following passages will show: "I came not to send peace but a sword." "Suppose ye that I came to giv peace on earth? I tell you nay." "The brother shall deliver up the brother to death, the father the child, and the children shall rise up against their parents, and cause them to be put to death." "He that hath no sword, let him sell his garments and buy one." "If any man come unto me and hate not his father and mother and wife and children and brothers, yea, and his own life also, he cannot be my disciple." "If any man preach any other gospel unto you than that ye hav received, let him be accursed."

This is all New Testament doctrin, and everybody knows, the closer it is followed the worse it will be for the race.

Christ said he came to set parents against children and children against parents, and the father-in-law against the mother-in-law, and a man's enemies should be those of his own household. Is such doctrin calculated to bring peace on earth and good will to men? It is such teaching which has whetted the sword of persecution, and kindled the fires which hav crept over the quivering flesh of roasting heretics. This doctrin of hellish hate has caused the most bloody wars that ever stained the pages of history, and given men the savage disposition to tear helpless victims limb from limb, and visit every trembling nerve with an instrument of torture, and to practice acts of cruelty which a well-bred devil would be ashamed of.

What we want is a decent regard for the rights and feelings of others, good-fellowship, fraternity, equality, and the spirit of old-fashioned democracy which felt hurt when the humblest individual was injured. More care for the welfare of our living bodies and the present life, and less anxiety about the soul and the hereafter. Does anyone know that one will be happy and another eternally miserable after death, or that they will exist at all? Why worry about that which nobody knows anything about? This life is an actuality, our wants must be supplied, and to trifle with this life and turn all our attention to a visionary future is not a work of wisdom.

The Christian says, "Search the scriptures if you want light on any subject." Well, I wanted light on the subject of a future existence, and I did search the scripture and here is my finding:

"The dead know not anything, for there is no work, nor device, nor knowledge, nor wisdom in the grave whither thou goest. For that which befalleth the sons of men befalleth the beasts, as the one dieth so dieth the other. Yea, they hav all one breath, so that man hath no pre ëminence over a beast. As a tree falleth so it lieth; all go to one pl ce." If a man hath no pre ëminence over the beast, why all this anxiety about the hereafter? If all go to one place, how will the Christian fare better than the Infidel? Yet, with these passages of scripture staring him in the face, the Christian affects to be wonderfully exercised about the condition of the unbeliever. He is so filled with love and charity for the sinner that he weeps over his condition night and day. It is barely possible that the Christian is honest, but if so his honesty is made of very stretchy material. He would hav the world think that his love and charity, like a great mantle, would cover the whole human race. But let him get after an Infidel and his mantle contains a thousand scorpions.

I suppose when Christians burnt heretics and poured hot lead in their ears and bored out eyes, cropped ears and slit noses and whipped women, they did it all in the fear of God and with love and charity. To the Christians heaven is a delightful abode, hell an awful place, and it is such a terrible thing to incur the wrath of God. But let a man put himself in antagonism to the church, and the wrath of God is not fierce enough, hell is too far off; they are only too anxious to see the smoke of his torment. And although it is to ascend up forever and ever, yet they cannot wait, they want it to begin to ascend up now.

The promises of the New Testament are so precious to the Christian. He is to hav a crown and a harp and a white robe, and spend most of his time in a holy waltz over the golden pavements of the New Jerusalem. This is to be the portion of the Christian if he is only faithful to the end. Faith is a great thing. With "a full supply constantly on hand" nothing is to be impossible to the Christian. He is even to be given the power to remove mountains. Now, I would like to engage the services of one of these gospel mountain heavers. And to any holy heaver who can bring good references I will giv one hundred dollars a month with steady employment.

The political campaign is over. To-day in the village of Naples a religious campaign is to be opened against the devil and his doings. These gospel bummers are to keep open shop here, at great expense, for two or three weeks, marshaling their forces against the devil and his brimstone country.

Now, if some one could send me a Christian who is a good hand at casting out devils—and all genuin Christians are promised that power—it would not take him long to cast out the few devils lurking around Naples, and then these holy evangelists could depart to other fields to blow the gospel trump, and save thereby a great deal of wind.

I am getting advanced in years, and I want to do a great deal of good before I die. I am ambitious to found a hospital. I want another Christian who can lay hands on the sick and hav them recover. Money is no object. To anyone who can make it a success I will guarantee a salary of one thousand dollars per month.

We hav quite a German element in our vicinity, and many are desirous to learn the German language. A few are driving away at French, others are studying Greek and Latin, and if some Christian who can "speak with new tongues" would come here, he would find an open field with no opposition, and he would be well rewarded.

Then, for variety and a special entertainment, a few Christians who can handle snakes and drink deadly poisons and not be hurt would create quite a furor. Besides, they would do more to convince men of the truth of the Christian religion than all the revivalists who ever disgraced the rules of common sense by lying in the name of God.

I learn from a universal geography that there are about three hundred and eighty million Christians in the world. Out of this vast number can one be found who can perform the miracles mentioned above?

Read carefully Mark xvi, 16–19, then Matt. xvii, 20. If they cannot remove mountains, and perform all manner of impossible things, cast out devils, speak with new tongues, handle serpents, drink deadly poisons, lay hands on the sick and hav them recover, they are to be damned to a man, and there is no escape.

After all the agonizing and howling and groaning, after all the tears and wars and tortures and bloodshed, after all the prayers and prostrations, self-denials and expostulations, not one New Testament Christian in all the earth! Oh, my Christian friend, this is a sorry showing, but it is according to your heavenly guidebook and nails you as dead as a herring. You are only on a par with the poor Infidel whom you hav so long hated and despised. Paine, Voltaire, Ingersoll, all whom you hav so much traduced and lied about, are on the same level with yourselvs. Thev cannot perform these miracles, neither can you. You hav no "pre ëminence" over them, nor yet "over the beasts"—"as one dieth so dieth the other" (Eccl. ix, 5–10; iii, 19, 20).

"Whom the gods would destroy they first make mad." According to this legend, the destruction of the Christian must be near at hand, for no reason can reach him. He is mad with his own folly.

And after reading this article I expect he will become furious, so I will administer a little spiritual soothing syrup, just as they giv small doses of brandy to one on the verge of delirium tremens. The drippings from one of Sam Jones's sermons one would think would quiet the mind of a Christian like pouring oil on the troubled waters. I shall only giv extracts—to administer them in their full strength would prove dangerous. "A home should be blessed with plenty of children. When God gave a man nothing but a pale little wife and a canary bird, he hadn't done much for him. Whenever I see an old maid, I think some man hain't done his duty." "High license preachers won't be in hell five minutes before the devil will hav them saddled and bridled and be trotting them around." "Ingersoll is about the worst man of the nineteenth century. My idea of an Infidel is a great big blabbing mouth. I hav seen on one of Barnum's posters an animal with a mouth six feet wide and a tail three inches long—a good picture of an Infidel." "Some people don't like my slang, but it is the only thing I hav got a patent-right on." "Some women say they don't believe there is any harm in theaters. You're a fool. You say your pastor don't object. Then he isn't fit to be pastor of a litter of puppies." "Only one thing that has ever been said about me has hurt. Some jack-leg editor, after taking a drink from his demijohn, sat down on one ear and fanned himself with the other, and said I was ill-bred. It's a lie." "If you women will hold while I skin, we'll make hide fly." "I despise a man who is so narrow-minded that a fly can stand on his nose and paw out one eye and kick out the other—a man who can look through a keyhole with both eyes at once." "I would rather be a liberal gambler than a stingy Methodist." "If I had as much money and as little religion as some of you fellows, I would bring my knitting and sit up with this meeting." "It takes an expert to tell a man is dead, but when a woman stops talking you may know she's gone."

My friend, if you are not far gone with Christian rabies, I would like to ask you if you believe that God ever called such a mental stinkbug to preach? Will this theological loafer ever be permitted to belch his holy slush over the golden pavements of the New Jerusalem? Does anybody believe that this hypocritical lickspittle was thinking about Jesus or heaven or lost sinners, or anything except two hundred dollars per week, when he uttered that language? It is evident enough to any clear-sighted man that this soul-hustler would roll in slime and dirt for filthy lucre.

Oh, my deluded Christian friend, why will you not see that these heavenly brokers are selling you drafts on the world to come for cash down? How much solid cash do you want to pay for spiritual robes and crowns and harps? As long as these heavenly skylarks can sing songs and make prayers and wring from you your hard-earned money for golden blocks of pavement in the New Jerusalem, so long will they ply their dirty work. Remember, my Christian friends, you are all the time paying down, while you take their promises on trust. Would anybody but a lunatic transact business in that way? You always trust the minister, but never realize anything from his promises—he asks you to pay down. You read in your Bibles how Samson caught three hundred foxes and yoked them together by their tails, and how he tore a lion as easily as a Frenchman could a frog. Do you believe that? What a lion-tamer he would hav made, and he could hav collected a whole menagerie in a couple of days.

Then you read about blowing down solid walls of masonry with rams' horns. I think such rams' horns might hav been utilized and the breastworks and fortifications of the enemy blown to smithereens in time of the late "onpleasantness."

You read about a lot of holy bummers having a high old time and drinking up all the wine, and then turning water into wine and keeping right on with the jamboree.

How a man found a cosy retreat in a big fish's belly, and got in out of the wet.

How some Hebrew children danced a double rigadoon in a fiery furnace and didn't raise a sweat.

How some sleight-of-hand performers over in Egypt turned all the water into blood, and out of every grain of sand made a louse.

How a vast multitude commenced a feast without provisions enough for one course, but the more they stuffed the more the store increased.

How a man went under training with the devil among the tombs, and developed his muscle until no chains could hold him.

How a man was brought to life after he began to stink.

How God made a woman out of a man's rib and turned out a fancy job.

How a lot of men jumped out of their graves and rattled their dry bones for the edification of the people.

How a girl got to fooling with a ghost and "brought one more into the family for the old man to support."

How men, in defiance of the law of gravitation, mounted up among the clouds; how a wife and mother was turned to salt for looking back at the old home; how old Lot got boosy and sustained the double relation of father and grandfather to his daughter's children; how Dalilah got Samson where his hair was short; how David appropriated Uriah's wife, and then killed Uriah to prevent a fuss in the family;

> Wi mair o' horrible and awful,
> Which ev'n to name wad be unlawful.

Oh, my Christian friends, will you continue to hav such balderdash rammed down your throats as the word of God by a lot of scheming ministers who hav no other object than to get your money, and liv upon your unpaid toil? If you hav the courage of men throw off the ecclesiastical yoke, and bring your spinal columns to a perpendicular. Say to the seventy thousand theological drones in this country, "If you want to teach others to be honest, first be honest yourselvs and earn your own bread. Set an example before the world which will make the world the better by being followed. Stop fooling with future soap bubbles, and angels, and saviors, and turn your attention to the best methods of improving the human race." And may the Great Whangdoodle add his blessing. Amen. "Accuracy of Statement," vs. "Quibbles."

In THE TRUTH SEEKER for Aug. 30, 1890, appeared an editorial criticism which needs fixing. It was sufficiently answered in September 13th and 27th, by Burr. But as he was not conversant with all the facts, and as I am the person under editorial indictment, some of my friends think I ought to be heard in my own defense. I care nothing for self in the matter; but I do care for the truth, and I agree with the Editor in his expressed desire for "accuracy of statement."

The first line in this editorial criticism contains an inaccuracy. I challenge the Editor to find any such letter of mine "to W. E. Reid's Spiritual Instructor." This inaccuracy is repeated in the editorial reply to Burr, September 13th, and there made use of to hold me responsible for words quoted from Mr. Reid! Thus, "In indorsing Mr. Reid in his letter to the Spiritual Instructor, Mr. Howe made Mr. Reid's statement to private sitters his own."

Since I never wrote any such letter to the Spiritual Instructor, the responsibility is changed. In writing of Mr. Reid to the Better Way I quoted his words, and they were copied into the Spiritual Instructor, and credited to that paper. THE TRUTH SEEKER's transposition of my quoted and misquoted words is also misleading. Assuming what no statement of mine justifies, the Editor so transposes and misquotes my words as to make it appear that I had claimed in November, 1889, that I had received personal messages in private sittings with W. E. Reed. Whereas, I had nowhere stated that I had even had a sitting with him until my letter appeared in the Progressiv Thinker in August, 1890. The first and only published letter in which I ever referred to my sittings with Reid was the one of Aug. 16, 1890, in which I stated they were all total failures. But my failure to get messages in no way disqualified the testimony of others, which had been so corroborated by observed facts as to satisfy me that Mr. Reid was a remarkable medium. Quoting from my quotation, the Editor of THE TRUTH SEEKER misquotes in a way to mislead his readers by clearly implying that I had reported a personal experience with Reid in 1889, and that "the slates were all filled with writing."

In his original criticism the Editor politely suggests that "a liar ought to hav a good memory." This may express TRUTH SEEKER etiquet; but as the only evidence of lying in this case is found in the inaccuracies, misquotations, transpositions, and unwarranted assumptions of my critic, I would mildly suggest for the sake of "accuracy of statement" that Freethought editors "ought to hav a good memory" or else consult the records before publishing such charges and inferentially branding a Spiritualist as a liar with a poor memory. The editorial error in the first line of his criticism is twice repeated without correction.

When called to account by Burr for substituting "were all" for "are" the Editor claims it "in no wise changes the matter." This seems to me an unfortunate assumption coming from an Editor who empha sizes the importance of "accuracy of statement."

It must be clear to any critical reader that the change of the one word "are" to "were" and interpolating "all," and then ascribing the language to me, which was quoted from Reid, and marked as a quotation, entirely changes the significance, and if "the public was deceived," these misrepresentations are responsible for the deception.

I find nothing in my letter to the Better Way, from which these quotations were taken, to retract or correct. I hav never claimed to hav received personal messages or independent slate-writings in any sitting with Walter E. Reid. The only evidence of any inaccuracy or self contradiction in my published statements is to be found in the loose and garbled extracts and editorial "quibbles" and misrepresentations of my letter in THE TRUTH SEEKER criticism. Yours for "accuracy of statement,"

LYMAN C. HOWE.

A Bird's-Eye View.

Taking a bird's-eye view of the Secular field we are led to the conclusion that the past has not been fought in vain, that the present presents new openings, and that the future remains to reveal golden and unhoped-for successes. Proud are we of the past and confident of the future.

The last congress did a good work. It struck superstition and priestcraft a severe blow, which will resound in coming years; from which, in fact, full and complete recovery cannot be expected. The holding of the congress at Portsmouth was a step in the right direction and at the right time. It opened up the great central region, set the people resident therein to reading their Bibles as they never did before, and also to giving serious thought and reflection to the fundamental principles of our government and how to maintain them.

The next congress (in 1891) can do a better work if held in the right place. That place, by great odds, is Des Moines, Ia. Franklin Steiner, the energetic president of the Secular Union of that city, writes that he is working for it, and that already Dr. Lespinasse has subscribed $100. With such a start as that and almost a year to go on, the necessary capital to clear expenses can be stated as "assured." For these reasons the Portsmouth Secular Union has withdrawn its application and gratuitous offer to again entertain the congress, in favor of the beautiful city of Iowa. There are many reasons why our annual gatherings should be held for the next three years in the West, and strong ones indeed why it should go to Des Moines in 1891.

In the mean time the state of Wisconsin should not be lost sight of. That is the state we should capture in whole and not in part. It presents a splendid opening and no time should be lost in taking advantage of the same. The result of the late election there, how it was brought about, etc., speaks no uncertain sound. Shall we heed it? Shall we get to work before it is too late—while "the gates are yet ajar?" Of course our national leaders can do but little when there is little to do with. What they need is to be backed up with the "$5 000 Guarantee Fund" authorized at the late congress, recently published, and to which only a few as yet hav subscribed. The full $5 000 should be raised without delay, and with that amount in the treasury a warfare can be carried on that will win us Wisconsin and giv us an option of the remainder of the great Northwest. By putting a "field" secretary into Wisconsin, equipped with circulars, pamphlets, and other Secular paraphernalia, auxiliaries could be organized in almost every city, town, and village of said state. But this "field" secretary should be a picked individual—that is to say, should possess certain characteristics and qualities; should be possessed of wisdom, of goodness, and of power; should be boiling over with energy, mild and calm in disposition, winning and captivating in manners, and logical and forcible in conversation. It is not necessary to be an orator in order to be an organizer—in fact, I think the greatest organizers of the past hav been, and those of the present are, the poorest orators. The true organizer lays the foundation, builds the pedestal, as it were, upon which the orator, great in eloquence and wit, stands and proclaims his sentiments and his thoughts.

With Wisconsin thoroughly organized, and by the efforts of "the right man in the right place," Madison or Milwaukee will in 1892 open wide its gates and bid our sixteenth congress welcome. Whether the state is thus organized or not, I think there are several strong reasons of a political nature why in 1892 our annual gathering should go to Wisconsin, which reasons space forbids me to mention at this writing. In 1893, the year of the World's Fair, a grand international congress should be arranged. This, of course, should be held in the wonderful city of Chicago. All nations and climes could be represented; Freethinkers even from the "isles of the sea" would be present. Can anyone fail to see the strength arising from such an affair? Could the value to the world of such a gathering be overestimated? By taking time by the forelock, this and the other things I hav mentioned can be accomplished. So let's all join hands and dance to the tune, "We are the people! we are bound to get there!"

Portsmouth, O. WILL S. ANDRES.

At D. M. Bennett's Grave.

On one of those lovely days of last summer I paid a visit to the quiet retreats and sylvan shades of Greenwood cemetery. During my stroll among the grand old trees and rich foliage which border the little winding foot-paths, I came upon the monument erected to the memory of that martyr to Freethought, D. M. Bennett. And, as your magazine numbers among its readers so many recruits to the noble army of Freethought, it occurred to me that perhaps a short description of this monument would prove interesting to them. The sentiments expressed in its inscriptions are so pure, ennobling, and free from cant and superstition, that a perusal of them cannot fail to hav an inspiring effect upon the mind. The monument is easily found, being the first on the left from the Fourth avenue entrance. It is inclosed in a neat little plot, thickly covered with velvety grass, which on the day when I saw it was in its brightest and loveliest livery of green. An ornamental iron fence encircles the plot, while a bench of the same material has been placed invitingly inside. The monument, which is composed of granit, highly polished, stands about fifteen feet high. On the front, across the shaft, in large, raised capital letters, is the following inscription: "Erected by one thousand friends." Below is a bronze bust of Mr. Bennett in bas-relief. It shows a prominent forehead and a kindly face. Further below, in deeply cut capital letters, is the following:

D. M. Bennett, the founder of THE TRUTH SEEKER: the defender of liberty, and its martyr; the editor, tireless and fearless; the enemy of superstition and of ignorance, its mother; the teacher of multitudes; the friend, faithful and kind; the man, honest and true, rests here. Though dead, he still speaks to us, and asks that we continue the work he left unfinished. When the innocent is convicted the court is condemned.

On the remaining three sides, below the heading, "His Words," are the following quotations:

I believe in the eternal powers of nature, in the superiority of good lives, in acts of kindness toward our fellow-beings, and in efforts to spread the light of truth over the dark spots of the earth. Each person must be responsible for the good or ill he does. Here is our duty; here is our allegiance, and not in the sky above us. We must make our heaven on the earth, and not in the air. The object of our lives should be to make this world as beautiful, and ourselvs and our fellows as happy, as is in our power. I can hardly yield my consent that this is the last of our individuality, and I fondly think that Father and Mother Nature are able to accomplish the best, greatest, and most desirable of all problems—a continued existence. But I am borrowing no trouble about it. Demonstrated science may be regarded as the only true science of knowledge. What is called revelation is a snare, a delusion, a falsehood. Those who claim to speak for the gods simply speak their own thought. The gods do not speak; they are dumb as the rocks; they are as speechless as the grave. With nature it is not so; to know her is to know the truth, and to study her is to be wise.

On the footstone the following is cut: "Born, December 23, 1818; died, December 8, 1882." It is unadorned with crosses, angels, "beautiful gates ajar," or other relics of barbarism, but stands forth in its bold, grand, sublime simplicity, a fit tribute to the noble and fearless thinker to whose memory it was erected.—H. J. Clark in Twentieth Century.

CHRISTIAN persecuted Christian, often for differences all but imperceptible, except to the faith-opened eyes of religious lunatics. A keen and rancorous dispute raged for years as to whether it was lawful to baptize with sand, instead of water; and to the learned and devout such problems were ever presenting themselvs as the double procession of the Holy Ghost, the exact nature of the transfiguration light upon Mount Tabor, and the existence in Christ of two coincident but perfectly independent wills. Want of soundness on such insane subtleties was sufficient to hav the unsound one burnt to a cinder. —Saladin.

Jesus Talks Again.

It was my fortune, whether good or bad, to listen to a funeral discourse by Gec. J. Schweinfurth, the messiah of the nineteenth century, on Saturday last. The man over whom the remarks were made was J. P. Smith, an old settler of Byron township, a good man and an honored citizen. He was a man of whom it might be said that the world was better for his having lived. His was the home at which all were welcome, he a man that lived to do good. He died on Friday, December 12th, and the services were held the next afternoon, Saturday, at 1 o'clock. At that hour I started for the residence at which the services were to be held. The deceased had formally been of the Methodist persuasion, and quite a few uncomplimentary remarks were made by our citizens on allowing the address to be made by this blasphemous man, as he is called. On my arrival there I was received by a young man, a member of the Church Triumphant, and a brother of Mary of "Immaculate Conception" fame, and received very polite attention. I was ushered into a cosy sitting room and given a good seat. I was not surprised at the company around me. Only two or three persons besides members of their church were there. I looked at the company carefully. There they sat—many with gray hairs streaming down to their shoulders, with sad, earnest faces; others in the very prime of life with the frame of health and strength, with physique unmarked by passion or sensuality. They sat in silence. No grief was visible on their faces; their faith was too strong to permit emotions of sorrow. Perhaps fifty persons were present, and in the center of the group, near where the folding doors opened from one room to another, sat the man of them all—The Perfect Man, The One who has been, who was, and now is, the man with all the attributes of God, the only and inimitable Geo. J. Schweinfurth. His whole appearance was perfect—the large, brainy head, with its strong animal development; the dark hair carefully combed; the magnetic eyes; the gold-colored whiskers carefully cared for; the small, white hand; the perfect fitting clothes of the clerical cut, while the whole carriage and demeanor of the man bespoke the gentleman. His self-control is remarkable, and the man is always cool and in possession of his faculties. But the services open; the choir, an excellent one, sings a gospel hymn with remarkable sweetness, and the great Impersonator rises to speak. He reads a few extracts from the Bible, and another song is sung, and his prayer follows. He prays direct to God and does not ask Jesus's intercession. This finished, he again turns to the Bible, and says, "On such an occasion as this a great many thoughts center in the mind." A few thoughts centered in my mind also. I thought of the deceased years ago when this cursed hallucination had not been started. I saw the happy family, and they were indeed a happy one. I saw their bright young daughter just home from school, and the happy, loving wife, the pleasant, genial husband, and their many friends. I thought of the present desolation—wife joining the Church Triumphant, leaving home to join the colony in "Heaven," of her death. I thought of that intelligent young daughter; of her acceptance of the vile creed, of reason partially dethroned, and of her sad death the past summer. I thought of the father holding out against this home-breaking, blasphemous creed; of the anguish of his mind when he saw his home broken up and himself left desolate, and then the succumbing of this strong mind to grief, its gradual breaking, and then the entire surrender to this magnetic, mesmeric ministerial shark. My heart ached, but I listened, and our attention was called to the third chapter of Genesis. The fable of the serpent and the woman was taken up and explained to them in a new light. "And it shall bruise thy heel, and thou shalt crush its head," was explained as not to be taken in a literal sense, but symbolical of the warfare waged between vile, sensual, imperious man and weaker woman, in which man was the serpent, and finally the woman shall crush its head and achieve her complete victory. He told the story of the young betrothed that dreamed of seeing a dreadful serpent, disgusting, loathsome, and in place of the head of the serpent were the features of her lover. Not being superstitious, she regarded it not, but found after marriage that her husband was a veritable monster and that the dream was a timely warning of a kind providence and not to be disregarded. The dream perhaps might hav been of himself, for all we know, and with propriety. Taken altogether, it was the most plausible apology for free love that I ever heard expressed. Again, he said, "There is no animal that wallows in the mire so depraved as man, be it hog, glutton, or any other vile creature. He is dressed, perfumed, to cover his ugliness, and is a veritable wolf in sheep's clothing. And women, like the children of old, are as ready to worship any image that he sets up, as they did the image that Nebuchadnezzar erected." Again, he says, "Jesus was all right, he taught a pure doctrin, he taught the perfect man, but at the time of his death there was a gradual drifting away from his high standard. Paul could not keep the people in the narrow path that Jesus kept them in, and since his death there has been a gradual drifting away from that standard, until to-day, instead of the world being in the church, the church is in the world. The world has captured the church." He then went on to lay the whip of small cords on the backs of modern mankind, as his Grand Example did nearly nineteen hundred years ago. He said that the "generation of vipers," and a great many other vile names, described modern man very well. "The great trouble with reformers is that they try to reach the great masses of men, instead of preaching the perfection of morality, and living up to that high, perfect standard, be it only one or two. Principle is sacrificed for popularity. The Church Triumphant has not made this mistake—it started right. It started weak and small, but with the right principles, and to-day God has blessed it."

Again, he said, "If I were to mention the great reformers that hav made the world better, that hav illuminated this dark world with gleams of righteousness, I would mention Joseph, Abraham, Isaac, and Daniel." In that catalog he forgot to place Christ, and it seemed to me that away down in the darkest depths of his hideous, mesmeric heart there was a secret jealousy of the one that he now attempts to supersede, his elder brother. His discourse was rambling from this time on. Still the audience kept their eyes fastened on him as a bird keeps its eyes on the snake that destroys it. Among other things he said, "Anyone that loves right loves the Church Triumphant. Anyone that hates wrong is in sympathy with us. No one but a lover of sin need be afraid of the Church Triumphant. No one but a retainer of infernal goods and ideas need tremble."

In conclusion he said, "And now may all praise and honor be ascribed throughout all lands under the sun, to him that has been, that was, and now is again, throughout all time, amen." His manner seemed plainly to say, "I mean myself." His disciples and apostles evidently agreed with him here, as evinced by their reverential groans and hearty amens. He then spoke of the deceased, told how he had been brought up in "the church of the world, the church that teaches falsehood, that tells lies, whose doctrins are those of hell." He told how the man had held out against his power at first, influenced by his early teachings. He spoke of the gradual leaning toward the new religion—that he was less hostil and bitter in his attitude to it, until he was quite friendly to the new belief. Said that the deceased had been a warm friend of his for the last five years, during which time he partially accepted the new faith. He spoke of a visit to him two months before his death, when his mind was still clear and he was yet quick to perceive an argument, but that "memory had so failed him that he could hold to no one thought longer than five minutes." He told of his last visit with him and that the man took his hand and with tears in his eyes thanked him for showing him the light. I could not but think of a devil of destruction boasting of his work, a broken home and shattered minds, and the words of my friend, "No corner of hell is too deep or dark for him who breaks up the home of a fellow-man."

The language of the address was eloquent throughout and he held his audience with the closest attention. He spoke in low, quiet tones, with a remarkable self-possession. I hav not done the address justice. It is better—for its kind—than here sketched. The services at the house were closed by singing, "Watchman, tell me of the morning," and the procession moved to the beautiful Byron cemetery, where the exercises were short, but impressiv. Thus ends the sacrilege. The new messiah rides away in a fine carriage, behind blooded horses, for "Heaven," and the mourners go about the street.

All is quiet in "Heaven" now, no rumors disturb its inmates. A sister of his now resides there and takes down her brother's utterances with a view of preparing a new and better Bible, for they sadly feel its need. She is an expert stenographer, and an intelligent, attractiv little lady, and evidently admires her brother. The messiah has another brother in Ohio—Findlay, I think—a saloon-keeper. He wishes Jake to giv up this angel racket, as he terms it, and come to him and earn an honest living. As to the effects of the doctrin here, I can say that it drove one woman insane, and confined her in the Elgin asylum for the insane. It seized an old settler here and he mistook himself for John the Baptist, and begged the neighbors to behead him. The chief priests and scribes of the new faith were brought up before the Winnebago county grand jury, a short time ago, and, like Paul before Agrippa, made a strong impression on the honest jurors, who, however much they wished to convict, could not on account of the nature of the evidence. Mary, the mother of the infant child, testified to her sinless condition and gloried in it. The said infant child is now at "Heaven," and is growing in grace and in stature and in favor with the faithful.

The whole affair has quieted over here, and the great Impersonator—he impersonates a great man—said that the persecution only made them the stronger, and made whiter the persecuted. What will be the outcome of all this I know not. Saying nothing of motivs, we hav here in this enlightened community, enacted under our eyes, all the scenes, save one, of nineteen hundred years ago. The one exception is the crucifixion and resurrection. He seems to entirely ignore that point, and perhaps thinks it a useless act in the drama.

Curious Messianic Parallels.

TO THE EDITOR OF THE TRUTH SEEKER, Sir: It givs me great pleasure to see the Liberal stand your paper has lately taken. When, some years ago, the late D. M. Bennett published "Ecce Diabolus" in THE TRUTH SEEKER, he was taken to task (for publishing accounts of dead and gone superstitions) by some of the intolerant Freethinkers who were satisfied with a simple denial of everything that pertained to religions and creeds of the past. They did not think it worth while to analyze the basic ideals from which these creeds sprung, or to detect the gross perversions of these ideals which are peddled out to humanity as infallible religion—by which all may be saved from the wrath to come. I am glad to see that the Infidels are less intolerant than they used to be.

I read with pleasure an article in this week's issue, "A Period for Messiahs," by Ida C. Craddock, and would like to add a few remarks to it. While stress is laid upon particular periods by the medicin men, or magicians, of the natural religion, some are more significant than others. Ages ago the medicin men learned to read the great astronomical clock, and to be able to foretell, by constantly recurring coincidences, what to expect at certain periods. These facts hav been preserved in the folk-lore of the tribes, and it is not in the colleges nor among the wise and learned that the messiah periods hav been brought forth, but among the wild tribes who study nature's books.

The Indians, Arabs, and negroes, who rise before the dawn to gaze on the eastern horizon, read the signs in the constellations, not from the almanacs where a zodiacal sign is an arbitrary division of the terrestrial ecliptic, and not a constellation of stars which hav a definit meaning to the savage star-gazer.

It is lamentable to think that the wise and learned schoolmen can giv no better religious ideal to the people than the crude fetichism of savages who read from nature's book—children in thought preserving the childish ideas by which they solved the motions and actions of the sun, moon, stars, and earth, and the laws of sex. The sexual relation, birth and death, were familar phenomena to them, and these were to them the solution of the laws that governed the heavenly host. The sun died at the winter solstice, and was born again on the third day. The moon was the queen of heaven. The sun was a Bull or a Ram at the vernal equinox, and at that time married the earth, and made her fruitful, and Virgo (the constellation) at that time was setting in the west and receiving the benefit of his radiance, or spirit, or Holy Ghost. When she came to the east at dawn—the sun going to bed at the west at the same time—she came with her cornucopia full of the fruits of the soil. Nine months from the vernal equinox—the period of human gestation—the new sun was born for next year, and so on indefinitly.

Now as to solar periods. Thirty-three years is the first period—one-third of a century. When Jesus was about thirty years old he began to preach, at thirty-three he had finished his mission. The astral law holds that this is a critical period in every man's life, during which some great change or conviction takes place.

The vernal colure fell in Aquarius in 1839 or thereabouts, thirty-three years after the papacy was deprived of its temporal power.

The next period is fifty-two years, 1-480th part of the great precessional cycle and the basic ideal of the troy ounce of 480 grains.

This period applies particularly in the calendar of the Aztecs and nativ nomads of this country; and all through the land the Inca, Aztec, Indian, and voodoo are expecting the new messiah. Where is he to come from? The Hindoo messiahs are indigenous to the soil. The Arab avatars are born in the neighborhood of the Red sea. But at the present time we are more interested with the Indian messiah and the reasons underlying the movement.

Centuries ago a band of white-robed priests of the astro-theological or bardic order landed at Palenque, in Yucatan. They brought civilization with them and taught the arts and sciences to the people, built temples and cities, and generally improved the conditions of life to the nativs (see America, Enc. Britannica). The chief of this band was Cukulcan, or as he was called later, Quetzalcohuatl. After a while he sailed away to the east to the land he came from, but promised to return again. The Aztecs hav been expecting him at every great six-hundred-year period or cycle of the zodiac. He was represented as clad in armor, with a crest of feathers like the Indian war bonnet. Montezuma made the great mistake of believing that the armor clad Spaniards were Cukulcan and his retinue coming back to Mexico to inaugurate the golden age. Now, this being the fifty-second solstice since 1839, the minds of the Indians, Aztecs, and others are excited by the medicin men with expectation. Sitting Bull has been the leader in this excitement and has been summarily put down and out of existence. Whether this will stop it or inflame it is a question. In the blood of the martyrs is the seed of the church. Mr. Bull is the first martyr.

By a series of very curious coincidences he becomes the central figure of a first-class solar myth, which will grow and enwrap his personality with a halo of divinity, as the story is told in the folk-lore of the tribes in future time.

As the Black Saturn, he was slain just about the winter solstice.

As the decapitated sun, Red Tomahawk had a hand in the killing.

As the bald shorn Samson devoted to the infernal powers, Shave Head assisted and died with him.

For a Latin soldier in command we hav Miles instead of Pontius Pilate.

He was slain by his own people, the (Sioux) Shues (Jews), upon the principle that it was better that one man should die than that the whole nation should suffer.

His Indian name was Setanta Tatanka. By referring to the article "Celtic Literature," we find that Cuchullin, the Celtic solar hero, came to this country and returned to Ireland again. In the "Foray of Queen Meane" we find one of his names is Setanta, and he is the champion or representativ of a famous Bull Tatanka.

When these incidents are related in future years it is not improbable that Sitting Bull will figure as a savior, and be canonized as the red man who comes from Edom, all his garments stained with blood, victorious over his enemies, whom he had trodden out in the winepress of his wrath, but was at last slain by his own people.

Mr. Editor, it is high time that the people should be taught to read the astronomical clock for themselvs, and not be led by the nose any longer by magicians, medicin men, or priestly jugglers whose sole aim and end is to cultivate a God and devil fearing majority, so that they, an Infidel, immoral minority, may thrive and fatten on the labor of said simple-minded majority. IWAN MORION,

Author of "Ecce Diabolus."

What Is Poetry?

At the dinner of the Goethe Society, last week, Colonel Ingersoll was introduced as "the prose poet of America," to respond to "What the Poet Has Done." As a sentiment he was given these words of Shakspere:

> And, as imagination bodies forth
> The forms of things unknown, the poet's pen
> Turns them to shapes, and gives to airy nothings
> A local habitation and a name.

With this sentiment Colonel Ingersoll took issue, saying: "I don't know that I agree with Shakspere in his definition of poetry. I don't think the poet gives to airy nothings a local habitation. The real poet does not make something out of nothing. He makes more out of everything that he finds. He is not one who livs in the world of fancy. The real poet livs in the world of absolute fact. Only fools liv in the world of fancy. It is the stupid man who thinks he can create something better than exists.

"What is poetry? This thing that you and I speak of as 'I' is an invisible inhabitant of its own individual world. Each of our lives is a separate little existence, and none of us can penetrate into this individual existence of the others. All these separate invisible lives form a constellation that we call humanity. Now, the individual citizen of one world tries to convey to the individual citizens of other worlds something of what is transpiring in his world. The man who can do that the best, the man who has the greatest picture gallery in his mind, is the greatest poet. The greatest poet is the one who livs in the greatest world and is able to convey by the most apt symbols to people of other worlds what transpires in his own world.

"What is the real and the true poetry? It is the poetry born of experience. Let a man who has never lost a child, who has never dropped tears on the earth covering a loved one, read a poem written by a man who has never known bereavement, and he will think it a good poem, but when he shall lose a child or a dear one, that poem will not satisfy him. Let him read a poem then written by one who has suffered as he has suffered, and he will come to a full realization of what poetry is.

"You hav to tell of the happenings in this invisible world by appealing to something in the visible world. The man who knows how to giv you his thought, and who makes a vehicle of thought of the sky, the changes of seasons, and all those things of nature, is the man who gives you the best understanding of what is going on in his life. The idea is that the greatest poet is the one who livs in the greatest world and who has the ingenuity to take the symbols that best will convey the history of that world to you.

"For the consolation of our poor selvs let us say that those who cannot write poetry can act it. Every self-denying act adds to the poetry of the world. What hav the poets done? They hav always been in favor of liberty. There never was a decent poem written in favor of caste or slavery. The poets hav sowed the seeds of liberty in every age. More than that, they hav been great civilizers through the beauty they hav taught us. I believe the time is coming when the whole world will be filled with joy, and if that time comes it means that we shall hav realized the dreams of the poets."

The Hermit.

The pipe of the quail from tangle and hill,
The russet hills of those autumn days,
And the drowsy murmur of sleepy rill,
And the mountains dim in their purple haze,
Invite us, weary of dusty ways,
And the noise of the streets, and the clamor of men,
To the peace that dwells in the grove and glen.

And what could be better, it seems to me,
Than a cabin well shaded by mighty trees;
Somewhere, not remote from the voice of the seas,
Which should mingle at night with the voice of the breeze,
And sing the hermit's lullaby?

Stream, and woodland, and ocean tide,
Some orchard trees and patch of grain,
The hermit's table would well provide;
A tiny vineyard, for not without wine
Would I hav my true philosopher dine.

No records of war should disturb his rest,
No annals of murder his soul distress,
As close to beneficent Nature's heart
(His love for that mother his life confessed)
He nestles in perfect peacefulness.

Love and ambition, anger and hate,
Would never pass through my hermit's gate,
But the birds of the forest would feed from his hand,
And the demon of murder should ne'er assail
The spirit of love in the hermit's vale.

In the sough of the wind, in the sob of the seas,
Purged of all passion, he'd clearly read
Grand lessons of wonderful mysteries;
The tale of the tree and the tale of the seed,
And why the flower, and why the weed,
And the nuptials made by the patient breeze,
Who to the wild rose desolate
On his pinions carries the love of her mate.

Would not this be better than making life,
Life which was meant for enjoyment and good,
One endless struggle, one noisy strife?
And for what? for shelter, for clothing and food.

Washington Secular Union.

I solicit the patience and kind forbearance of friends and correspondents, for my seeming neglect by failure to answer letters and attend to my multifarious duties as secretary of the Washington Secular Union.

Mr. George M. Boman, of Seattle, residence Lake Union, a director and the treasurer of the Washington Secular Union; as earnest, zealous, and influential a Liberal as can be found on the Pacific coast; one of our most loved and reliable counselors and co-workers, whose time, means, and influence hav never been asked in vain or grudgingly bestowed, has been confined to his bed for eight weeks, bearing the most severe suffering with heroic fortitude. For six weeks he was the victim of ignorance and malpractice on the part of regular physicians. Three of them, after several examinations and solemn consultations, confessed ignorance of the cause or seat of his malady, yet drugged him to salivation. It was only the unceasing skilful nursing and gentle ministrations of his most devoted wife and loving friends that saved him from the icy clutch of the fell destroyer.

Dr. Reinhart, of Ballard, who is now attending him, at once pronounced the case abscess of the liver.

The most earnest sympathy and interest is manifested in his recovery by all classes from the poorest to the most wealthy. The tremulous voice and the tearful eye at learning how small is our hope of his recovery testify how he is beloved. His loss would be keenly felt in Seattle and vicinity, for his public spirit, energy, and enterprise hav done much to advance the prosperity of Seattle and its suburbs. His sterling integrity, clear judgment, and liberal dealing hav placed him in the front rank of Seattle's most successful business men. The sole architect of his own fortune, wealth has only developed and given opportunity for more extended exercise of his benevolent nature.

His wife, who is in every sense his most loyal and efficient helpmate, rejoices with him in quiet acts of benevolence, and they both evince such a spirit of sympathy with the unfortunate or sorrowing that the recipients of their bounty are impressed that it is Mr. and Mrs. Boman who are the gratified ones. Few are so highly respected, none more genuinly loved.

To the Liberal cause Mr. Boman's loss would be a dire calamity, for to his influence, tact, and persistent efforts, more than to the merits of any other one man, we are indebted for the state law taxing at full valuation all church, hospital, and private school property.

During sessions of our state constitutional convention he had photographs made of THE TRUTH SEEKER'S cartoon, "Taxation of Church Property," and a copy placed on the desk of every delegate.

On the assembling of the legislature at Olympia, at his sole expense he engaged Watson Heston to design an original cartoon on "Exemption of Church Property from Taxation." He had five thousand copies printed and accompanied by a sharp, telling statement of facts, and had them mailed to Liberals in all parts of the state with requests that Liberals send copies, and personal letters urging taxation of church property, to their members of the legislature in both houses.

When the question came up in committee of the Hughes revenue bill, containing a clause exempting all church property from taxation, it was through Geo. M. Boman's influence and means that able and influential advocates appeared before the committee and the exemption clause was stricken out, and the present just and equitable law substituted.

In opposition to enforcement of Sunday laws and religious exercises in our public schools, he has proved a wise counselor, a fearless, consistent, outspoken Liberal, ever opposing all union of church and state, ever self-sacrificingly doing battle to keep our flag above the cross.

I am doing what little I can to help his nurses in their nightly cares for his comfort. All that the loving devotion of his wife and affectionate friends can do to alleviate his sufferings, is being done. Despite the dark, almost hopeless outlook, there is no diminution of watchful care. Until the issue is decided, I can only entreat indulgence for seeming neglect of other duties. C. B. REYNOLDS,

Sec. Washington Secular Union.

Professor Tyndall on General Booth's Scheme.

Professor Tyndall has addressed the following letter to the editor of the Llangollen Advertiser with reference to a series of articles in that journal on "Darkest England:"

HINDHEAD HOUSE, HASLEMERE, December 4th.

DEAR SIR: I am very much obliged to you for the newspaper which you hav been good enough to send me, and I hav read your account of your visit to the slums of London. Your description, being that of an eye-witness, is particularly vivid and interesting. I hav no doubt that what you say regarding the present action of the Salvation Army is a perfectly accurate record of what you witnessed, but the permanence of the action cannot be ascertained or deduced from a flying visit of a few hours. During the lifetime of General Booth matters may move smoothly, but there is not the slightest guarantee that they will continue so to move after he is gone. The engin he has evoked might, in the hands of less scrupulous successors, prove to be a curse instead of a blessing to humanity. Two or three days ago two letters appeared in the Times criticising the scheme of General Booth. The one was from Professor Huxley, the other from Mr. Loch, secretary to the Charity Organization Society. Those letters ought, in my opinion, to make any sensible man pause before committing himself to the scheme of General Booth. I end as I began, thanking you for your friendly remembrance of, yours faithfully,

JOHN TYNDALL.

The Nine Demands; What Do They Imply?

The rapid progress within the last few years of Secular principles on this continent makes it more than ever necessary that those engaged in the public advocacy of our views should hav a clear and intelligent conception of the policy to be adopted in their work. The question requiring serious consideration now is, how far is an aggressiv policy desirable? While not in any way disapproving of destructiv effort, the early exponents of Secularism did not make that their primary aim. Of course, every new truth taught must destroy the error which it seeks to supplant; but it is one thing to replace error with truth, and quite another to crush the error and leave the spot which it occupied a blank. Many persons think that the time has arrived when the conditions are favorable for the existence of an organization more positiv and more practical in its operations than was possible in the past.

In Canada the question of propagandist policy has been settled for the present by the acceptance of six Secular principles (printed in another column) as the basis of and guide in our advocacy. In the United States, however, such a settlement appears not to hav been reached. In connection with the American Secular Union there are two principal lines of policy advocated by its members. The one is that the work of the Union shall be confined to the effort of securing the entire separation of church and state, or in more explicit language, the Secularization of the state. The other policy suggested is, that allied with the above effort an aggressiv warfare should be carried on against theology in general. Now, the question is, which of the two policies is the better? And further, is it not possible to blend the two so as to realize the advantage of each without having the drawbacks which are alleged to be associated with both? Frankly, I do not personally regard the two as being necessarily antagonistic, so far as the operations of the Union are concerned. The idea that they are so has doubtless arisen through a misconception as to their mutual relations.

The basis of the Union's operations is acknowledged to be the Nine Demands. Let us, therefore, ascertain what these logically imply. Consistent adherence to the teaching of these Demands requires that it should be shown: 1. That the church has exceeded its legitimate function, made itself an unjust burden to the state, and an incubus upon the people. 2. That public education is fettered with theological teachings and marred in its nature through the false idea that the Bible is a necessity in our schools. 3. That Sunday is not a divine institution and that its observance should not be enforced by law. 4. That it is wrong for the public funds to be used for religious purposes. 5. That fast days and religious festivals should hav no official sanction from the government. 6. That affirmation should be substituted for judicial oaths, and that a person's belief or disbelief should be no impediment to his or her liberty in the exercise of political and social rights.

Such, briefly, in my opinion, is what the Nine Demands fairly imply, and the work they provide for those who undertake their promulgation. Now, I am forced to admit that I fail to see how such work can be properly and efficiently done without dealing in some way with the claims of theology. For instance, to justify the Demands from a reasonable standpoint, it must be demonstrated that the church is not a necessity to the state; that the Bible is not a suitable book to be taught in the public schools; that Sunday has no other than an ecclesiastical sanction; that morality is possible without theology; and that the obligation to do right is not confined to a supernatural religion. Will it not be apparent even to the ordinary mind that to take the course here indicated makes a resort to the anti-theological policy a logical necessity?

But, then, it should be remembered that to condemn theological encroachments need not mean a reckless onslaught on the truth of religion in general, which is a question that the Union has nothing to do with. To expound the Nine Demands does not render it necessary to allege that all religion is false, or that Materialism is superior to supernaturalism, and that Christian doctrins are absurd. It may or may not be so, but to decide whether or not it is, does not, at least in my opinion, come within the province of the exponent of the Nine Demands. The common ground for the advocates of the Union to take is to protest against the church interfering in secular matters and the enforcement of religious forms upon any member of the community. Mental liberty is our watchword, and to demand that it should be faithfully carried out in all sections—religious and non-religious—of society is the duty of the Union.

Of course it is right to welcome the coöperation of "advanced believers." They constitute a very numerous class, and, if we do not utilize their efforts, we shall prove ourselvs guilty of a great want of wisdom. For, so far as all positiv work is concerned in resisting the authority of the church, most of them are at one with us, having similar aims, and differing but slightly, if at all, as to the methods by which the results sought for should be attained. With these we desire to find a common basis of action, and our united efforts will certainly do more to oust the general foe from his position than either they or we could accomplish single-handed. The churches are honeycombed with men who hav long ceased to believe in the traditions of their faith. They remain in the fold, not because the mental atmosphere is congenial to their taste, but because they are the victims either of custom, of fashion, or of necessity, or of the three combined. Let the principles of the American Secular Union become more thoroughly understood and its exchequer be well filled, and then an exodus from the churches will in all probability be witnessed the equal of which has not been seen during the present generation. It is necessary, however, to distinguish between these "advanced believers" and the old orthodox theologians, with whom we can hav no part; they are our avowed enemies, and to ecquet with them would be worse than a mistake—it would be a crime against the ancestral glories of our cause. My experience, however, forbids me to expect much assistance from any Christian organization as a body, let it proclaim itself ever so liberal. The aid gained from such a source will be more individually than collectivly, and this I think can be secured by a judicious and dignified advocacy upon the part of the exponents of the Nine Demands. It can be proved that the attitude of the church in relation to the state and the people is wrong without indulging in extravagant invectivs against all religious teachings. To plead for a free Sunday does not require that all Sunday observances should be destroyed. To understand the correct method of conducting a conflict is an important element in securing a victory. No one can question the usefulness of destructiv labor; but, serviceable as it has been, it could only prepare the way for something better. Each worker who thought of future results must hav foreseen that the time would arrive, sooner or later, when the conductors of these scattered forces would feel the necessity of uniting together, taking as a basis for their operations some point or points upon which they were all agreed, and thus presenting a bold front to the common enemy.

Thus, in response to an invitation to giv my opinion upon the two methods of advocacy contended for by the Liberals of the United States, I hav stated how I think it possible for both parties to work together. The most persistent opponent of theology can help the Union because it seeks to resist extravagant and unjust theological claims, while all who deserve the name of Liberals can support an organization whose object is to secure a just and an equally balanced national taxation; to insist that those who require religious instruction shall be alone responsible for the expense of its teaching; to abolish all government patronage of any and all religious forms; to substitute affirmation in our legal practice for the present absurd custom of swearing; to obtain the repeal of all laws that interfere with the free and intellectual use of Sunday; to show that high-toned morality is not confined to the church or to any faith, but that it is allied with the humanity of man; and finally, to protest against advantages being shown to a professor of religion that are denied to a Secularist. This is a platform sufficiently broad for all who are willing to do good practical work.

CHARLES WATTS.

Funerals.

How to perform the last offices of affection over the dead; how to lay them away tenderly, respectfully, decently, without vulgar show or vain parade, without cant and drivel or the mock solemnity of a superstitious ceremony, is a question which many hav asked and few hav answered. The parsons and priests hav long had their way in this matter; they hav made merchandise of our miseries—made death serve them as a means of advertising their business and sanctifying their ignorant assumptions. When the "black angel" enters the household he leaves the door open to a company of harpies who gather like buzzards wherever there is a corpse, and they commonly find the strong shorn of their strength by weariness and grief and the weak utterly prostrated. A man is not in a mood to war with custom or its creatures over the open grave of one whom he has loved and lost.

The multitude who love to look at fresh wounds; the neighborly women whose tears are always on tap; people who wish to air their vanity with their clothes by proclaiming an assumed intimacy with the family of the deceased; the fashionable relativs; the good and pious old folks; the idle tattlers, and that vile tribe who fatten on melancholy as other folk on mirth—these people, backed by the church and the iron-bound customs of all Christendom, will hav a "holy show," whatever the outrage on the dead or insult to the living. The man who in his normal state protests yields now to this horde, feeling himself above the hollowness that pleases them. He says to parson, priest, and parasite, "Thy will, not mine, be done." It is the easy way to pacify them, and their will is done.

The cast-off garment of the departed spirit, the vacant tenement of the arisen soul, is dressed for exhibition; the house is thrown open to the public and filled with people, some of whom come dutifully as an evidence of respect, the rest for the reasons above stated. And after a season of vacant staring at each other in the house, or flippant gossip in the yard outside, the minister, in a voice that is meant to be impressiv and to seem as if issuing from the portals of the tomb, prays and preaches to them in the manner of his sect, regardless of the past opinions of the deceased. There is no great variety in these funeral sermons. Like songs of a nation they are pitched in one key and move in one mood—a wretched key and an unhealthy, because dispiriting, mood. They are not songs of liberty, light, and love; they are moans from the "dark valley of the shadow of death." The preachers tell the people how God in his infinit wisdom has seen fit to afflict this household; he labors to convict his deity of crimes which would and should send any man to the gallows, and thanks Jehovah for his "tender mercies;" he rambles about in the field of physical resurrection, sometimes seeming to believe in the body, sometimes in the soul, but never failing to advertise the business of his craft. He talks about God and God's purposes with a familiarity born of ignorance and impudence; he mouths the cant phrases of his profession, scattering over the throng the ashes of his burnt-out theology. And he never forgets to warn everybody to prepare for death—"preparation for death" being his euphemism for "Come to my meeting-house and help support the parson."

After the preaching comes the second act of the drama, calculated to relieve the legs of the listeners, but in no other way to be commended. By an arrangement of open doors which enables the people to follow each other leisurely around the chimney and get themselvs out of the house without injury to the furniture or themselvs, the corpse is exposed to the gaze of the rabble. The friends are invited to "view the remains," i.e., to pass in procession by the coffin and feast their eyes on its pallid occupant. It suits the purpose of those who thrive on theology and terror to hav people carry with them through life memories, not of the lighted living face of him who is prostrate before them, not of beauty, vigor, grace, or strength, but of death, the grave, and the awful impotence of that pulseless clay; of salvation, eternal Sabbaths, lantern-jawed piety, God, and other hideous things.

The third act finishes the performance with a sort of circus parade in which the strictest rites of precedence prevail. It would send a cold shudder down the spine of respectability if the second cousins of the corpse were to ride or walk in advance of the first cousins in this procession. After the gravedigger, with the towering indifference of a professional, has performed his perfunctory part of the ceremony by three times rattling some stones over the bones (ashes to ashes, earth to earth, dust to dust), after the graveyard has been ransacked for quaint epitaphs to be covered with comments ad libitum, after the last straggler has satisfied his curiosity and gone his way, Mrs. Grundy pulls back the drapery from her sallow face and consoles herself with the reflection that this stronghold of her supremacy (the funeral) is yet unshaken, and that she has given the dead a Christian burial.

My purpose in writing is to herald the fact that here in Connecticut custom has been defied, the parson and his tribe hav been kept at bay, and burial has taken place without any of the indignities of Christian burial. An aged lady, loved for her graces of mind and person, a benevolent woman of wealth and high social standing, died a short time since in the village of Winsted, near which place I liv. She was a member in good standing of the Congregational church, and died unshaken in her faith in the borrowed ethics of Christianity, though not in the fundamental principles of the Christian religion—principles like the fall of man, salvation by vicarious sacrifice, the sulphurous pit, personal devil, personal God, and so on. But her fine appreciation of the fitness of things and her instinctiv delicacy long ago revealed to her the hollowness, hypocrisy, and bad taste of our mortuary conventionalities and the horror of the charnel-house exhibitions which seem to be inseparable from Christian burial. She therefore left special instructions with her son regarding her funeral, and he was charged to protect her from outrage at the hands of the graveyard gentry. A stalwart Freethinker, free doer, free speaker, and free writer, a cosmopolitan in mind and manners, and personal associate of America's best thinkers, writers, and reformers, he might hav driven off the harpies without other prompting than that of his own convictions, but the wishes of a mother who was idolized by him as he by her fortified him against every possible temptation of indolence, acquiescent good nature, or public applause. He nipped in the bud all plans for a public invasion of his premises by printing in the local paper on the day following his mother's death a notice to the effect that only those who received individual invitations would be expected to attend the funeral. Thus disturbed in his ancient, solitary reign, the chronic funeral follower, like the owl in the elegy, did to the moon complain, but the notices preserved the peace and quiet of the bereaved household. The four friends selected as pall-bearers were notified of the precise hour on the day of burial at which a carriage would call for them at their homes, and punctually the carriage called, conveying them to the home of the deceased. They found four persons there to receive them—the son above mentioned, two ladies, and a young granddaughter. They sat together for a few moments until the undertaker in another room had finished all preparations, and then the casket was placed in the hearse and taken to the cemetery, followed by the "procession" of two carriages. The grave was lined with white muslin, and the body was gently lowered to its place without blasphemy of prayer or preaching. No word was spoken. Silence hath voice beyond the power of utterance. A moment thus, and the son, stepping forward from the ladies, addressed the bearers: "Gentlemen, I thank you gratefully for your kindly services." The party then left the grounds as quietly as it had entered them. This was the sweet and simple burial of one who, lacking neither wealth, high social standing, nor the good will of the people, could hav had half the town following her, with a tremendous flutter of millinery and all the fatuous formalities of her church.

The clergy hav made the burial of the dead a means to magnify the importance of their office, and make their support seem a necessity. Trading on the miseries of mankind they hav made the unwritten law by which funerals add terrors to death, deplete the purses of the poor, put monstrous profits into the hands of as cold-blooded a class of mercenaries (the undertakers) as ever walked the earth and bring fresh victims into the steeple-topped temples where theologians make market of their worthless wares and fasten the fetters of humbug on the human mind. People who profess to believe that the spirit is permanent and the body but an instrument for temporary use, and laid aside at death for something better, make sorry practice of their professions in the sepulchral farrago of Christian burial. They mean to be respectful, but are painfully conscious that at any point, by slight accident in speech or act, the mock sublimity may become ridiculous. The sigh of relief when it is over, the thankfulness if, in the perilous complications of coming and going, sitting, standing, crying, and posturing, all has gone smoothly and well—this sigh and thanksgiving are significant.

I do not deal in unmeasured censure of the people. I am one of the people. If blame there is, it rests with their religious teachers and leaders, the preachers of old theology, but even these preachers are victims largely of their own evil education, and the wretched position in which they are publicly placed. Their conduct is not consistent with their professed belief in conscious immortality of the spirit; it is the outcome of a greed shameless enough to make a business of advertising the rags and old junk of the church at a friend's funeral! Death should not be made doleful by the glamour of artificial gloom, and memories of the departed should not be memories of graves and ghastly ceremonials. We should be impressed with thoughts of the living as they lived, rather than of the dead as they died. And

> Why should memory, veiled in gloom,
> And like a sorrowing mourner craped,
> Sit weeping o'er an empty tomb
> Whose captivs hav escaped?

Thousands who hav outgrown the old superstitious fear of death, gods, devils, and preachers, and who, therefore, feel an aversion to the common funeral rites, follow in the beaten track because they do not well know how to lead elsewhere. For them especially I write. HARVEY W. PINNEY.

Professor Huxley on Mr. Booth's Scheme.

From the London Times.

SIR: A short time ago a generous and philanthropic friend wrote to me, placing at my disposal a large sum of money for the furtherance of the vast scheme which the general of the Salvation Army has propounded, if I thought it worthy of support. The responsibility of advising my benevolent correspondent has weighed heavily upon me; but I felt that it would be cowardly, as well as ungracious, to refuse to accept it. I hav, therefore, studied Mr. Booth's book with some care, for the purpose of separating the essential from the accessory features of his project, and I hav based my judgment—I am sorry to say an unfavorable one—upon the data thus obtained. Before communicating my conclusions to my friend, however, I am desirous to know what there may be to be said in arrest of that judgment; and the matter is of such vast public importance that I trust you will aid me by publishing this letter, notwithstanding its length.

There are one or two points upon which I imagin all thinking men hav arrived at the same convictions as those from which Mr. Booth starts. It is certain that there is an immense amount of remediable misery among us; that, in addition to the poverty, disease, and degradation which are the consequences of causes beyond human control, there is a vast, probably a very much larger, quantity of misery which is the result of individual ignorance or misconduct and of faulty social arrangements. Further, I think it is not to be doubted that, unless this remediable misery is effectually dealt with, the hordes of vice and pauperism will destroy modern civilization as effectually as uncivilized tribes of another kind destroyed the great social organization which preceded ours. Moreover, I think all will agree that no reforms and improvements will go to the root of the evil unless they attack it in its ultimate source—namely, the motivs of the individual man. Honest, industrious, and self-restraining men will make a very bad social organization prosper; while vicious, idle, and reckless citizens will bring to ruin the best that ever was, or ever will be invented.

The leading propositions which are peculiar to Mr. Booth I take to be these:

(1) That the only adequate means to such reformation of the individual man is the adoption of that form of somewhat corybantic Christianity of which the soldiers of the Salvation Army are the militant missionaries. This implies the belief that the excitement of the religious emotions (largely by processes described by their employers as "rousing" and "convivial") is a desirable and trustworthy method of permanently amending the conduct of mankind.

I demur to these propositions. I am of opinion that the testimony of history, no less than the cool observation of that which lies within the personal experience of many of us, is wholly adverse to it.

(2) That the appropriate instrument for the propagation and maintenance of this peculiar sacramental enthusiasm is the Salvation Army—a body of devotees, drilled and disciplined as a military organization, and provided with a numerous hierarchy of officers, every one of whom is pledged to blind and unhesitating obedience to the "general," who frankly tells us that the first condition of the service is "implicit, unquestioning obedience." "A telegram from me will send any of them to the uttermost parts of the earth;" every one "has taken service on the express condition that he or she will obey, without questioning or gainsaying, the orders from headquarters" (In Darkest England, page 243).

This proposition seems to me to be indisputable. History confirms it. Francis of Assisi and Ignatius Loyola made their great experiments on the same principle. Nothing is more certain than that a body of religious enthusiasts (perhaps we may even say fanatics) pledged to blind obedience to their chief is one of the most efficient instruments for effecting any purpose that the wit of man has yet succeeded in devising. And I can but admire the insight into human nature which has led Mr. Booth to leave his unquestioning and unhesitating instruments unbound by vows. A volunteer slave is worth ten sworn bondsmen.

(3) That the success of the Salvation Army, with its present force of 9 416 officers "wholly engaged in the work," its capital of three-quarters of a million, its income of the same amount, its 1,375 corps at home and 1,499 in the colonies and foreign countries (Appendix, pages 3, 4), is a proof that divine assistance has been vouchsafed to its efforts.

Here I am not able to agree with the sanguin commander-in-chief of the new model, whose labors in creating it hav probably interfered with his acquisition of information respecting the fate of previous enterprises of like kind.

It does not appear to me that his success is in any degree more remarkable than that of Francis of Assisi, or that of Ignatius Loyola, than that of George Fox, or even than that of the Mormons, in our own time. When I observe the discrepancies of the doctrinal foundations from which each of these great movements set out, I find it difficult to suppose that supernatural aid has been given to all of them; still more that Mr. Booth's smaller measure of success is evidence that it has been granted to him.

But what became of the Franciscan experiment? If there was one rule rather than another on which the founder laid stress, it was that his army of friars should be absolute mendicants, keeping themselvs sternly apart from all worldly entanglements. Yet even before the death of Francis, in 1226, a strong party, headed by Elias of Cortona, the deputy of his own appointment, began to hanker after these very things; and within thirty years of that time the Franciscans had become one of the most powerful, wealthy, and worldly corporations in Christendom, with their fingers in every sink of political and social corruption, if so be profit for the order could be fished out of it, their principal interest being to fight their rivals, the Dominicans, and to persecute such of their own brethren as were honest enough to try to carry out their founder's plainest injunctions.

We also know what has become of Loyola's experiment. For two centuries the Jesuits hav been the hope of the enemies of the papacy, for whenever it becomes too prosperous they are sure to bring about a catastrophe by their corrupt use of the political and social influence which their organization and their wealth secure. With these examples of that which may happen to institutions founded by noble men, with high aims, in the hands of successors of a different stamp, armed with despotic authority, before me, common prudence surely requires that, before advising the handing over of a large sum of money to the general of a new order of mendicants, I should ask what guarantee there is that, thirty years hence, the "general" who then autocratically controls the action, say, of 100 000 officers pledged to blind obedience, distributed through the whole length and breadth of the poorer classes, and each with his finger on the trigger of a mine charged with discontent and religious fanaticism; with the absolute control, say, of eight or ten millions sterling of capital, and as many of income; with barracks in every town, with estates scattered over the country, and with settlements in the colonies—will exercise his enormous powers, not merely honestly, but wisely? What shadow of security is there that the person who wields this uncontroled authority over many thousands of men shall use it solely for those philanthropic and religious objects which, I do not doubt, are alone in the mind of Mr. Booth? Who is to say that the Salvation Army, in the year of 1920, shall not be a replica of what the Franciscan order had become in the year 1260?

The personal character and the intentions of the founders of such organizations as we are considering count for very little in the formation of a forecast of their future, and, if they did, it is no disrespect to Mr. Booth to say that he is not the peer of Francis of Assisi; but, if Francis's judgment of men was so imperfect as to permit him to appoint an ambitious intriguer of the stamp of Brother Elias his successor, we hav no right to be sanguin about the perspicacity of Mr. Booth in a like matter.

Adding to all these considerations the fact that Mr. Llewelyn Davies, the warmth of whose philanthropy is beyond question, and in whose competency and fairness I, for one, place implicit reliance, flatly denies the boasted success of the Salvation Army in its professed mission, I hav arrived at the conclusion that, as at present advised, I cannot be the instrument of carrying out my friend's proposal.

Mr. Booth has pithily characterized benevolent schemes as doing sixpennyworth of good and a shilling's worth of harm. I grieve to say that, in my opinion, the definition exactly fits his own project. Few social evils are of greater magnitude than uninstructed and unchastened religious fanaticism; no personal habit more surely degrades the conscience and the intellect than blind and unhesitating obedience to unlimited authority. Undoubtedly, harlotry and intemperance are sore evils, and starvation is hard to bear, or even to know of; but the prostitution of the mind, the soddening of the conscience, the dwarfing of manhood, are worse calamities. It is a greater evil to hav the intellect of a nation put down by organized fanaticism, to see its political and industrial affairs at the mercy of a despot whose chief thought is to make that fanaticism prevail; to watch the degradation of men, who should feel themselvs individually responsible for their own and their country's fates, to mere brute instruments ready to the hand of a master for any use to which he may put them.

But that is the end to which, in my opinion, all such organizations as that to which kindly people, who do not look to the consequences of their acts, are now giving their thousands, inevitably tend. Unless clear proof that I am wrong is furnished, another thousand shall not be added by my instrumentality. I am, sir, your obedient servant,

Eastbourne, November 27th. T. H. HUXLEY.

IT cannot be denied that the modern Abolition movement received very little sympathy from the church and clergy of this country as a whole. It is a pregnant and striking fact that American slavery was never afraid of American religion. The solemn meeting could be held in safety in the neighborhood of a slave-auction. Neither had any quarrel with the other. They were, in fact, upon friendly terms, for men were sold to build churches, and babes to buy Bibles, and women to support missionaries; and few refused the price of blood when it was offered at the treasury of the sanctuary. In fact, a man so careful and so religious as was the late James G. Birney, himself a repentant slaveholder, and who at great sacrifice emancipated his slaves, was compelled to admit that the American church was the bulwark of American slavery. It opposed the antislavery movement by silence, and by holding aloof from it at the North, and by open and direct advocacy of slavery at the South. Books were, however, written, printed, and circulated by eminent divines both North and South, to prove slavery to be, like the church itself, a divine institution, and denouncing all opposition to it as Infidelity.—Frederick Douglas.

Work for Liberals.

We hope THE TRUTH SEEKER readers hav all written to their national Senators and Representativs at Washington protesting against the enactment of the Breckinridge Sunday Rest bill. If any hav not already done so, they should lose no time in doing it now.

Then, when that is done, they should write another letter to the same lawmakers about the World's Fair. December 19th bills were introduced in both houses of Congress at the instigation of the Sabbatarians providing that no exhibition for which a national appropriation is made shall be kept open on Sunday. Write at once, and write emphatically, against these bills.

This question of whether the Fair shall be kept open or not on Sundays promises to be a very prominent one, and at the present writing the Anti-Sabbatarians are ahead. The president is required by law to satisfy himself before issuing the proclamation that the city of Chicago is legally bound for the payment of a fund of $10 000,000. This sum has been subscribed, $5,000,000 by the city council of Chicago, secured by the bonds of the World's Fair commissioners, and $5,000,000 in small subscriptions to stock by the citizens. The bulk of the smaller subscribers, however, who hav pledged themselvs, though without paying up, is composed of the German and foreign element, who threaten to withhold their subscriptions if the plan now proposed to close the Fair on Sunday is carried out. As long as this contingency exists the president cannot issue his proclamation, and it is being withheld in consequence.

The longest petition we hav yet received for the opening of the Fair was procured by Wm. Ulrich, of Waumandee, Wis., and contains one hundred and fifty-seven names. We want everyone to procure as long a list as possible, to influence the Commission. There are several forces at work in this direction, and the prospect of success is by no means dim. Besides the Germans of Chicago, who threaten to withhold their subscriptions if the Fair be not opened, the press of the city is on the same side, and has afforded the citizens an opportunity to express their opinions. The Evening Post's ballot resulted in a two to one choice for an open Fair. The National Religious Liberty Association (Seventh Day Adventist) is also working for the open fair, and claims the credit for the Post's coöperation. In his report for the year the corresponding secretary of that organization says:

"During the discussion of the site of the World's Fair in Chicago the question of opening the Exposition on Sunday has been agitating religious circles throughout the country, but especially the clergy of Chicago. The association, deeming this an excellent opportunity to do good work in behalf of true principles, sent the assistant secretary, about the first of October last, to that city to engage in the work there. They also associated with him Mr. Allen Moon, of Minnesota. The work done there, through these representativs of the association, has been most highly gratifying to the executiv committee. They succeeded in interesting the editors of a number of the dailies on the subject, until one of the papers (the Evening Post) opened a department, in which everyone who wished could vote his preference on the subject of the Sunday closing of the Fair. A circular letter was then sent to the leading workers of the association in the various states, urging them to subscribe for that paper for one month, which would giv them an opportunity, as readers of the paper, to write short articles in behalf of religious liberty. This plan was very successful, and in looking over the articles in that department, it was found that the majority of them were written by members of the National Religious Liberty Association."

Our brotherly contemporary, Freethought, of San Francisco, is activly pushing the petition, and reports good lists. We should like to see the Investigator, Independent Pulpit, Twentieth Century, and the Ironclad Age do likewise; and Secular Thought also might well ask its readers in the States to circulate the petition, as might the Spiritualist journals without doing violence to their principles. Let the Liberals of the country do something practical for their Cause.

And do not forget to write at once to your national senators and representativs protesting against the bills refusing national aid to exhibitions which may be kept open on Sundays.

The American Secular Union's Policy.

With that lucidity which always distinguishes his utterances, Mr. Charles Watts tells us this week what, in his opinion, the Nine Demands of Liberalism imply. He has taken a good look at both sides of the shield, and, like the accurate advocate he is, has made no statement which by itself is not most reasonable. Still, he has left his readers encircled by a haze which renders clear seeing on the main question exceedingly difficult. That main question is, Shall the American Secular Union pitch into the Christian religion or not? We say Christian religion and not Christian theology advisedly, for without its messiah craze back of its theology Christian theology would be soon recognized as a string of untenable, unreasonable, and impossible propositions. It is the firm belief in a God, a messiah and the supernatural, which givs Christianity its vitality. So for all practical purposes there is no need of distinguishing between Christian religion and Christian theology.

The principles of the Canadian Secular Union to which Mr. Watts refers, adopted as the propagandist policy of that Union, show that the two Unions are not working on parallel lines. The Canadian Union's principles are but abstract statements, the Nine Demands of the American Secular Union are concrete—that is, one is a statement of general principles of opinion, the other a formulation of some political demands. The Canadian Secular Union says:

"1. That the present life being the only one of which we hav any knowledge, its concerns claim our earnest attention.

"2. That reason, aided by experience, is the best guide for human conduct.

"3. That to endeavor to promote the individual and general well-being of society to the best of our ability, is our highest and immediate duty.

"4. That the only means upon which we can rely for the accomplishment of this object is human effort, based upon knowledge and justice.

"5. We judge conduct by its results only—what conduces to the general well-being is right; what has the opposit tendency is wrong.

"6. That science and its application is our providence or provider, and upon it we rely in preference to aught else in time of need."

The American Secular Union says: Tax the churches; abolish public chaplaincies; repeal Sunday laws; take religion out of the schools; giv no public funds to religious institutions; appoint no fast days or days of religious observance; abolish religious oaths; take no cognizance of a person's faith or unfaith in performing public duties. It will be seen from this, then, that the two Unions hav different sets of principles, and what is good for one may not be good for the other. To accomplish its work the Canadian Union ought to oppose Christianity sturdily—for its principles are contradictions of that system—while the American Union need not oppose it at all. There are Christians who accept every one of the Nine Demands and yet are Christians still. But no one can accept the principles of the Canadian Union and remain a Christian. So on this question of the American Union's opposing or not opposing Christianity the Secular philosophy must be left out.

To get back to the main issue then. The American Secular Union is formed to accomplish certain purposes. Logically there is not the slightest need for any reference to religion in their advocacy. But, and this but is a mighty big one, practically how can these purposes be achieved? and by whom? The How? is of course by the will of the people. What people? That's the question! An orthodox, or evangelical, Christian, replies to an advocate of the Demands that the present system is all right, that the churches and chaplains and religious institutions and holy days are moral agencies, and should be fostered by the state. So he will not help. A "Liberal Christian" says some of the Demands are well enough; others are too radical—they about balance, and he doesn't quite know if the church isn't a good thing—and so he won't help. The Freethinker says Yes, confound them! they ought to be square and pay their taxes and quit stealing public money to run their institutions and pay their preachers; and he says Go ahead! to the American Secular Union, and chips in, and attends congresses, and distributes the Union's literature.

Now, if this view of the matter be correct, what does it imply? Clearly that the Freethinker is the only man with a sense of justice sufficiently keen to urge political measures to insure that justice. Then what does common sense say the Union should do? It's plain enough—make more Freethinkers! How? Why, show up the absurdity of Christianity—its unhistorical character, its wrong moral basis, its false assumptions, its idiotic theology (the Athanasian creed for example), the cruelty it has committed in propagating its doctrins, its unprovable supernatural theories, and so on. Dr. Westbrook, the president, took a good course in his lecture against the Bible in the schools. The effect of the lecture was to convince people that the Bible is unworthy of belief. This conviction makes Freethinkers and so helps the Union.

Mr. Watts's experience that Christian bodies will do very little to aid such organizations as the American Secular Union is paralleled by the experience of about all reformers. It is exceedingly difficult to get a Christian to be just. This is not surprising, as the Christian scheme is founded on injustice; and a man who accepts it wholly must almost necessarily be deficient in the ability to comprehend fairness and justice. If he is willing that Christ should pay his debt of sin, he naturally is willing that some one else should pay his debts for procuring that salvation. Probably there isn't a Methodist in Toronto who can see the injustice of forcing Mr. Watts to pay part of the tax necessary to protect the Methodist churches.

We believe in the policy adopted by Dr. Westbrook at the Portsmouth Congress. Pitch into the Bible, make Freethinkers, and so obtain a constituency to support the Secular Union. Any other policy would soon see the Union stranded on a lee shore.

Acquiring Knowledge.

The police of this city do not take kindly to Dr. Gunn's "Society for the Enforcement of Criminal Law," and consequently the agent, Mr. Joseph Britton, is getting into trouble. When we first called attention to this society it was in a case of attempted suppression of some literature published by a news company of this city—a close imitation of Comstock's methods—and we remarked that if the publishers did not oppose the society they would all be at the mercy of bigots and blackmailers. But that raid did not turn out well, and Britton, Dr. Gunn's agent, turned his attention to the liquor saloons and disreputable resorts. In these he has found just as much opposition, and has besides found his society branded as a blackmailing scheme in the affidavit of a police justice. It came about through the attempt of an agent of the society to obtain warrants from

Judge Hogan to raid an alleged disorderly house. The judge refused to giv him a warrant until he knew what the society was, and the society's counsel thereupon sought to obtain a mandamus compelling the issuance of the warrants. At the hearing before the judge from whom the mandamus was sought, Judge Hogan, as respondent, submitted this affidavit:

"The respondent, upon information and belief, avers that said Society for the Prevention of Crime is a device of one Britton and others, claiming to act as agents of said alleged society, to enable them to extort money from divers persons by threatening them with the terrors of criminal prosecution, and that they hav, as a matter of fact, on numerous occasions, made use of the process of the criminal courts for the purpose of extortion."

Justice Hogan further set forth that before the society's agent made application for the warrants he had been led to believe that the society and its alleged agents were in the habit of using processes out of the criminal courts in unlawful ways for extortion and blackmail; that Justice Duffy and court officers of the Tombs had recently told him that Britton and his men had failed to support a similar charge made against a disorderly house because the court officer, Sergeant Cahill, who had the warrant issued on affidavits of the "agents," had refused to let Britton and his men precede the police to the house and be there when the warrant should be served.

Besides these charges against the agents employed by the society there were others, equally interesting, made by various persons. Their affidavits, condensed, are like this:

"The affidavits of William Martin and Detectiv Mullane set forth that Churchley [agent of the society] is the man who asked them to help him recover some money which he said he had been robbed of while drunk in a disorderly house he visited.

"Simon Steingul swears that John Fink, an 'agent of the society,' told him that he could make $20,000 a year as its agent.

"Dr. Marcus Markiewics swears that Fink is the man who professed to obtain for the doctor practice in houses of ill fame if the doctor would divide the fees with him.

'Charles Krumm, saloon-keeper, of 167 Chrystie street, swears that James E. McGinness, who calls himself an agent of the society, demanded $25 of him to suppress an alleged complaint for violation of the excise law.

"Albon Wiborn, of 29 Bowery, swears that he paid one Chris Miller $100 on October 7th last (Miller claiming to represent Britton), to square an excise complaint.

"Frank Whittacker, of 108 Christie street, swears that Agent Fink said to him: 'I had 102 Canal street pulled. I did it out of revenge, and I will hav revenge for the money that Julius Whittacker beat me out of, and I will make him spend $100 for each dollar he beat me out of in the commission on the sale of a house.'

"Julius Whittacker, of 102 Canal street, swore that his brother Frank was sent to state prison for three years for grand larceny; that Seldner offered to get Frank out in thirty days for $500, that the witness put up $450 with William Ward, and paid Seldner $50 on account; that Seldner did not get Frank out, and refused to giv back the $50 until he had been pressed several times, when he said: 'By ——, I'll get even with you for that if it takes me ten years;' that Seldner, afterward appearing as counsel for Britton's society, accused Whittacker of keeping a disorderly house, and that Justice Duffy dismissed the complaint. William Ward corroborates the stakeholding part of this affidavit.

"Bernard Wintemeyer, of 15 Bowery, makes affidavit that a complaint against him was lodged with the excise board, and that when he went to see Britton about it (Britton and he being members of Zerubbabel Chapter, R. A. M.), Britton said to him: 'Barney, I didn't know that it was your place, or I would not hav made any complaint against it. I am going to make a complaint at the police court, and either you or your barkeeper will be arrested. Ask to be tried at special sessions, but nothing will come of it.' Deponent asked Britton if there was anything to pay, and Britton said: 'No; you are a member of my lodge. I hav my agents going around attending to that part of the business for me.'"

We regret to say that the president of the society employing agents with characters as above alleged is Dr. R. A. Gunn, a member of the Manhattan Liberal Club, and it seems to us he ought to leave the society or the club. Private societies like this, modeled as it is upon Comstock's, and as agent of which Britton learned the trade, can only produce evil and injustice. Their charters ought to be taken away and the law under which they were obtained ought to be repealed. We are glad that the courts are acquiring some new views in this matter, and if they can squelch Dr. Gunn's society and could then destroy Comstock's organization public morals and personal justice would be strongly conserved. Britton was the same kind of a man when he was Comstock's and Colgate's chief fugleman that he is now as chief agent of his own society of which Dr. Gunn is president.

Romanism and the Public Welfare.

That the Catholics are ready to proceed to extremities in their fight for a share of the public school funds becomes more apparent daily. East and West, in almost every state—in every one in which a fair percentage of the people are victims of their church—they are working with all their great power to this end. Separate schools, run by the sects, and all supported by the government—that is the scheme which the American people hav to oppose!

The latest place to feel the Catholic influence in this is New Haven, Conn. Two years ago the city voted to supply free books to school-children. The sum of $30,000 was appropriated, and it was understood then that about $10,000 annually would be needed to continue the practice. That sum was appropriated last year without trouble, but the voting upon it this year at a special town meeting was conducted amid violent animosities and rioting. The priests of St. John's and St. Francis's Roman Catholic churches demanded that the children in the parochial schools connected with their churches be furnished with free text-books, the same as children attending the public schools. These two clergymen had addressed their congregations from the altar on Sunday, arguing that though the parochial schools were under the supervision of the church they were just as public as the secular schools, inasmuch as all who desired could attend them; that the Catholics of the town were paying taxes to support the schools and they should reap some of the benefits which they were paying for. As a result, over one thousand men crowded the place of meeting on the 16th instant. The opposition retorted that an appropriation to the parochial schools was expressly prohibited in the state constitution, which declares that "no preference shall be given to any Christian sect or mode of worship." They claimed that the Catholic schools were not public schools in the general acceptance of the word, because they were not under the control of the board of education.

The Protestants had the chairman of the meeting with them, and when the motion to include the parochial schools in the appropriation was made he promptly declared it out of order. Then the Catholics pitched in. "Gray-haired men," say the reports, "struggled to gain the attention of the chair, while the younger ones crowded them into seats in the most unceremonious manner. Hats were knocked off and clothing torn in the frantic effort to gain a hearing. The priests made themselvs heard in passionate speeches, while the Protestants shouted that the people were priest-ridden and that the Catholic pastors should be put out. By a division of the house it was decided that the amendment was lost, and the question came up on the original motion. A division was again called for, and the chairman decided that the motion had been carried. A detail of policemen finally quieted what promised to be a riot. Friends of the parochial schools are very angry, and intend to protest against the decision."

Undoubtedly the Catholics are angry at their defeat, and of course they will try it again. They will keep up the fight and they will win in those places where they hav the votes. That is what they are here for.

Because of this attempt to establish here the system prevailing in other countries where Catholics control the education of children, it is not amiss to cite the results of such sectarian education as seen in the number of graduates from these schools incarcerated in jails. A writer in a Canadian journal furnishes this information for Ontario for last year, as follows:

"Prisoners committed: Roman Catholics, 4,544, 1 in 70; Church of England, 3,876, 1 in 94; Presbyterians, 1,610, 1 in 254; Methodists, 1,682, 1 in 350.

"The committals in 1889 to the Central prison (Ontario), were 242 Church of England in a population of 366,539; 263 Roman Catholics in a population of 320,000 (in this number were over 100,000 French, of whom very few were committed); 87 Presbyterians in a population of 417,747; and 100 Methodists in a population of nearly 600,000."

In Massachusetts, a recent report by a chaplain of the state prison shows that of five hundred and sixty convicts there four hundred were Roman Catholics, chiefly Irish, more than five times their due proportion; of two hundred and fifty women convicts at Sherburne, seven-tenths were Roman Catholics; at Deer Island, seventy-five per cent; at Cambridge House of Correction, ninety per cent were foreigners, nearly all of whom were Roman Catholics. Massachusetts parochial schools are not so numerous as the church will yet make them, but they seem to be doing pretty well considering.

But the Roman church in Canada is not merely a system of religion; it is a political despotism as well, and a despotism possible to be continued only by the complete control of the voters by the church. In the November Forum, W. Blackburn Harte, a newspaper writer of Canada, has an article on "French Canada and the Dominion," in which some surprising, not to say startling, statements are made relativ to the attitude of the French Catholics toward the Dominion government. The avowed purpose of the French Catholic leaders, including the clergy, says the article, is to establish a Catholic French state within the Dominion boundaries that will be independent of the civil government. To such an extent has this sentiment developed that a race war is impending in the province of Quebec.

The Roman Catholic church in Canada, says Mr. Harte, is only nominally a religious institution. Its chief function appears to be political, and while the English-speaking Canadians hav no quarrel with the Catholic church as a religious body, they demand that it shall not become a militant system of politics. If the French Catholics were loyal to the government, and worked in harmony with the inhabitants of the other provinces for the general good, the existing bad feeling between the races would not hav been engendered. But, says Mr. Harte, the French Canadians are entirely ignorant of their duty to the commonwealth. In this respect, he says, they hav no principle whatever. The church dictates in what direction they shall vote, and they vote with the Liberals in the provincial elections, and with the Conservativs in the Dominion elections. The extent to which clerical influence is exercised was shown in 1889, when the question of granting $400,000 to the Jesuits was before parliament. M. Mercier, the premier, publicly threatened the Roman Catholic members of the legislature with the pains and penalties of the church if they should refuse to vote for the measure.

In the province of Quebec, Mr. Harte says, there are a few thousands more than a million of Catholics, yet there are seven thousand five hundred persons, not including bishops, engaged in the service of the church, and the church property of the province has a value of $120,000,000. Thus there is one clergyman to every one hundred and thirty Catholics, and the church holds untaxed property to the amount of $120 for each Catholic. "The state collects the church's tithes and assessments," says Mr. Harte, "allows her to handle directly and indirectly about one-fifth of the provincial revenue, and gives her the absolute control of public education, but is not permitted to inquire into her financial concerns, or to interfere in the conduct of the schools."

These are facts about the church that is endeavoring to gain control of this country which should be pondered over by the people. It is easy to say there is no danger of Romanism gaining its object, but it would not be easy to prove such assertion. On the contrary, the Roman church is making steady progress, and feels now so confident in herself that she no longer conceals her policy. In scores of towns and counties she has already closed public schools and established her own, and for one defeat suffered by her she can record at least twenty victories. In Iowa, Wisconsin, Minnesota, Kansas, Nebraska, and in the larger cities like Chicago and New York, she is doing remarkably well. Ten years from now Romanism will be a dangerous menace to the prosperity and peace of the whole country.

Liberty Threatened in Oregon.

We hope the Freethinkers of Oregon will look out for the interest of the cause in that state. A letter from Salem to the American Sentinel says that Mr. Crafts, field secretary of the American Sabbath Union, has arranged to hav a Sunday bill introduced into the legislature of that state at its next session, which begins Jan. 12, 1891.

The Oregon Secular Union has a chance now to do some effectiv practical work in defeating the bill.

Letters from Friends.

GOLDEN, IA., Nov. 18, 1890.

MR. EDITOR: Inclosed find $3 from two new converts to the principles of Freethought, whose names I inclose. I trust that if you lead them six months on the broad, bright road of truth and right, they will renew the subscription and be firm friends of the radical TRUTH SEEKER.

Respectfully yours, R. N. HOWE.

IDAHO SPRINGS, COL., Dec. 8, 1890.

MR. EDITOR: Inclosed please find $2 50 for the "Freethinkers' Pictorial Text-Book" in cloth. We all read THE TRUTH SEEKER. It is our family Bible. Its topics are discussed morning, noon, and night. I am in love with your paper; but like it much better with than without the pictures. God bless Heston and the pictures—if there is a God.

H. MCGOWAN.

FENTONVILLE, Nov. 30, 1890.

MR. EDITOR: Please find inclosed $1, for which send me the new book, "A Thoughtless Yes," by Helen H. Gardener. I received the picture book. I think it is fine. I take a great pleasure in showing it to all my friends. I hav taken THE TRUTH SEEKER for a long time, and I think now that I shall continue as long as I liv. I hav never said anything about the pictures, but please continue them as long as possible.

S. H. ELLINWOOD.

WEST SUPERIOR, WIS., Dec. 8, 1890.

MR. EDITOR: Our book came at last. It is simply immense. The pictures are full of original, thought-provoking spirit, whose subtleties elude the most deep or learned writer. The quotations, references, etc., are a whole library in themselvs. I inclose $1, for which send "Common Sense" and the "Age of Reason," by Paine; "Orthodoxy," by Ingersoll, and others as per list. M. M. ROSECRANS.

URBANA, O., Dec. 3, 1890.

MR. EDITOR: You will find inclosed $6. Two dollars send to Heston, the man that makes Irish angels for THE TRUTH SEEKER. Giv us more of them. Three dollars is to continue the paper; one dollar to the American Secular Union. The signs of the times look more favorable for our cause. I am in favor of the Bible pictures. I think they are as near the right thing as anyone can get. I like Heston's way of putting an expression. W. N. BAXTER.

LACEYVILLE, PA., Dec. 15, 1890.

MR. EDITOR: The stigma of church ignorance is apparent from the fact that the hardshell Baptists of this place will not consent to let the citizens occupy their "house of God" for Bible readings, inasmuch as it might upset their version of the dogma. The dominie, let it be remembered, was not the last man to denounce it, but from him the most glaring deceptions emanated to his blind followers' stifled intellect. He declared to the world, "We must hav ignorance with which to save mankind"—the true translation of which reads, "to rob mankind." C. A. DARROW.

NATIONAL SOLDIERS' HOME, WIS., Nov. 28, A.S. 290.

MR. EDITOR: I will match the "india-rubber God" with an india-rubber school-teacher. About the close of the late war, while strolling through the wilds of Texas I fell in with a school-teacher, hunting a job, he said. At the next settlement they wanted a teacher, and he was asked how he would teach regarding the earth's form, round or flat. "Why, flat, of course," said he, "according to divine astronomy laid down in the Bible." The interrogator shook his head. "Hold on thar!" cried the teacher, "if you unbelievin' folks want round, I've l'arnt to teach that too, though it may come a trifle higher." NELSON HUNT.

Dec. 7, 1890.

MR. EDITOR: I received your ANNUALS by mail, and your "Text-Book" by the American Express, in good order. To tell you that I am pleased with it would be a very limited way of expressing myself, and thanking you and all concerned in the publication for your grand effort in support of Freethought and reform. I can tell you that it creates a great deal of comment among my fellow-workmen, a goodly part of whom are Catholics and hav me doomed to a far warmer clime than Michigan in the sweet by and by. But with a little cool-headedness, and the aid of your "Text-Book," and reason, I am able to cope with all of them. And now I must close, wishing you and all connected with THE TRUTH SEEKER long life and happiness. ALBERT BROOK.

LOS ANGELES, CAL., Nov. 21, 1890.

MR. EDITOR: Hon. J. E. Remsburg lectured here last night at the hall of the Assembly of Progress, to a large and enthusiastic audience, mostly composed of Freethinkers. I doubt very much if there were any sinners (Christians) present, as the enthusiasm and applause over the salient points made by the lecturer were so general among the audience that there appeared to be no dissenting voices, and I concluded therefore that the ancient-minded orthodox were conspicuously absent. Mr. Remsburg's clear, cool, logical manner of presenting historical facts showing the absurdity of the false claims of the orthodox churches, was so sound and convincing as to reach the mind of the most stupid bigot. Mr. Remsburg is now lecturing through other parts of southern California, but we hope he will soon visit our coast again, and remain with us longer.

J. M. VOSS.

PAINT ROCK, TENN., Nov. 17, 1890.

MR. EDITOR: The "Freethinker's Pictorial Text-Book" is all that can be desired. In fact, it is unique, and stands easily at the head of the whole list of Liberal literature with which I am acquainted, both in the matter and manner of illustration, and the merciless incisivness of the text devoted to the destruction of the dragon of Christian Religious Superstition. No Liberal's library is more than half complete without it; and if I had the means, I would try to place it in every public library, lyceum, and reading-room in this country. Long liv Heston! His cartoons in THE TRUTH SEEKER cover the whole ground. He pierces the bubbles of humbug as fast as the clergy can inflate them. The pictures appeal to the eye, induce investigation, open the mind, as it were, to the reception of the seeds of truth. I vote for the pictures every time. W. H. M.

POCATELLO, IDA., Dec. 9, 1890.

MR. EDITOR: I hav had the pictorial book some months. My friends, who are many, hav had the privilege to look at it and comment on it. I am satisfied with the result, but some of my friends are not. I cannot help it. They come here and show me the Bible, open the leaves and read to me from the same. How they do get left when they undertake to show me religion out of that book! If I was to pen the words I read out of the Bible to a few of my male friends last night you would not publish it, and if you did I hav no doubt but you would get five years for blasphemy, and I say you ought to get it. I am no writer, but I am a talker from away back. I hav never had a chance—work, work, all the time, no time for schooling, no education, but work. And what do I work for? To make m llions for others and nothing but crusts for myself and my family. If we did not hav to work so many hours, and got a little more for the time we do work, we could hav time to read and hav something to buy literature for and educate ourselvs. The Union Pacific Railway Company has reduced the working hours, but the pay accordingly. Hence there is hardly enough to pay living expenses, let alone buying a book. All of my Scandinavian brothers and sisters hav their old Bible. I would advise them to read it from first to last chapter, and I vouch they will hav a different opinion of God than they hav now. Kindest wishes for your venture, in the name of liberty, justice, and humanity. C. PAULSON.

KEMATIN, ONT., Nov. 24, 1890.

MR. EDITOR: I inclose $9, for which you will please send two "Pictorial Text-Books," and apply the remainder on subscription. Now, dear Editor, I liv in a country where Freethinkers are like angels' visits, and in arguments with Christians I often hav cast at me the old arguments that Infidels never die in unbelief. Of course I always adduce every argument I can to the contrary, but I hav no positiv proof but the columns of your paper; but they will not accept such proof. Now, I am confident that many who are almost convinced that Christianity is false, are led to stop by the above false argument. We know that when our loved ones are at death's door we do not want the inquisitiv to gaze on the sorrowful scene, but I think it would be a good idea, when the dying one is willing, to call in one or more sky-pilots, who would be honest enough not to lie about it, to witness the death of Infidels who do not recant; and at the same time, in order that they be compelled to tell the truth about the event, the addition of two or more good moral men or women who are not professing Christians would do no harm. Then hav the death published not only in the Freethought papers but in the local papers where the death took place, and if possible obtain the signatures of all present that the death occurred as represented. I am sure every one will agree with me that this assertion of all Freethinkers recanting before death is as powerful as it is false, and all fair means should be taken to refute it as soon as possible I should like to hear from some of the friends on the subject.

Yours fraternally, I. T. JOHNSON.

BARRE, MASS, Nov. 26, 1890.

MR. EDITOR: C. L. James does himself great injustice in THE TRUTH SEEKER of November 8th, where he assumes that "present ignorance about ghosts" is the prime cause of unbelief. If by "ghosts" he means modern Spiritualism, I shall not "confess present ignorance," nor "promis future ignorance," and yet I am an unbeliever. I hav been under this influence, or that has been instructing me, for thirty-eight years, yes, all my life, seventy years, and yet I do not believe the phenomena caused by "ghosts" or spirits. Of course, I am speaking of the genuin psychic power, not the false that is assumed or produced by trickery; for much of this kind is known to be the result of preconceived and predetermined effort and deception on the part of the self-styled mediums.

But there is an intelligent force equivalent to that which has evoluted all things from all things, possessed by some of us, who do not deny its presence and usefulness when properly directed, but who deny the agency of spirits in producing and controling it.

We are not as ignorant as our accusers suppose, we who hav been conversant with this mysterious power all our lives, greatly to our benefit and our consolation.

Let me say to those who fancy they "hav broader and more humane views" than myself, because they are "Spiritualists," that nearly forty years ago I was where they are now, and think I "hav broader and more humane views" now than then; but this is only a matter of opinion.

I hav endeavored in this brief letter to qualify and define what I hav written, and hope no one will attempt to misrepresent it to their, or my, disadvantage. ELLA E. GIBSON.

RANDOLPH, N. Y., Dec. 8, 1890.

MR. EDITOR: Being recently in the village of Youngsville, Warren county, Pa., I was asked by some local Freethinkers to remain over the Sunday and giv them two lectures. I very gladly consented to do so. The proprietor of the Opera House at first consented to let that building for the purpose, but on the Saturday night informed me that he had reconsidered the matter, and found that it might injure his business with his God-fearing neighbors. On the Sunday several Liberal thinkers who had been invited to hear a little speaking on behalf of the cause arrived in the town, some ladies driving over nine miles to be present. The loss of the Opera House did not prevent my addressing them, as a stanch old Liberal, Mr. Green, who owns a billiard hall, kindly gave the use of it for the purpose. Some Christians had previously promised opposition, one particularly declaring that no Infidel could talk before him for twenty minutes. I spoke in his presence and that of other Theists for some sixty minutes in the afternoon, but my appeal for speakers on the other side remained unanswered. In the evening I spoke again in the same place, but on that occasion there were, so far as I could discover, no Christians present. Mr. Green thought they had heard too much truth in the afternoon. At the conclusion of the lecture I received three unsolicited promises of subscriptions to THE TRUTH SEEKER. Others told me that they had formerly been subscribers but had become too poor to continue. If the promises materialize I may hope that the little seeds of thonght I sowed that day may receive sufficient watering to bear good fruit. So, to change the simile, I cast my bread upon the waters, and hope THE TRUTH SEEKER may find it before many days.

SANQUOIT, N. Y., Dec. 8, 1890.

MR. EDITOR: I profess no religion in the popular sense of the word. But I hav learned from the stern realities of life that fire will burn me if I come into close contact with it, hence it pays me to obey a physical law of my being and keep out of the fire, whether there is a hereafter or not. As Glorious Bob says, "One world at a time." I will do the best I can under the present almighty controling circumstances, or environments, for this is my religion. Now, brother, I do want that "Pictorial Text-Book." I shall try hard to get some subscribers for your paper and books.

By the way, there is a big revival just now among the Methodists. I was in at a prayer-meeting. A revival gun was ranged on myself. The minister asked me if I did not want salvation. I replied, "No, I am not aware of being lost." "Well," said he, "you are lost in sin!" "Very well," said I, "then all the saving I need is to stop sinning, or cease to trespass on the laws, or law of my being—physical, intellectual, social, moral, and spiritual. And, in my case at least, there is nothing for your blessed Jesus to do, for I carry the key to the kingdom of heaven in my own nature, and if I fail to enter the fault is not in the kingdom but in myself. Remove the cause and the effect will disappear, or cease to do evil and learn to do well and I am saved from the sequence of sin in the future. As for being saved from the legitimate consequence of wrong acts already done, there is no truth in that doctrin, from the fact (as in the burning of fire) that the principle of punishment is incorporated in our very natures. Hence there can be no forgivness of sins already committed, through the loophole of repentance, faith, and belief in blessed Jesus, or any other priestly salvation trick. Cause and consequence exist in the eternal order of progression of mind and matter."

Yours respectfully, JOSEPH PLUM SMITH.

OLIVE BRANCH, MISS., Dec. 14, E.M. 290.

MR. EDITOR: Christmas will hav come and gone, and Christians will hav again shown their barbaric origin by drunken revelry in honor of their alleged savior's birth. Perhaps another year will hav been laid aside as a vesture well worn and numbered with those of the misty past, and a new year, with a new hope and a new resolution, been ushered in. So then, while yet it is not too late, standing alone in a whole county in this King Cotton's kingdom, I lift my voice to the lovers of mental liberty from Maine to California, yes, from Alaska to Mexico, and send an honest ringing shout to all. "Happy New Year" to those who hav me indebted to them in their kind attention to my plea for books. Foremost of these is Mr. A. Galjin, of Wisconsin; then Mr. Archibald, of Massachusetts; Mrs. Finch, of Nebraska; Mrs. Tillotson, of New Jersey; Mrs. Slenker, of Virginia; Colonel Kelso, of Colorado; Mr. Elliot, of Illinois. Many others responded in less degree, but for each I hav equal gratefulness. Last week two holy Baptist deacons on their rounds for money hunted me up and wanted me to help on the minister's salary. "Well, gentlemen," said I, "out in Kansas is a dear old brother Freethinker in needy circumstances, whom I should like to help, but hav thus far been unable. He is a good and worthy man. Will you not each of you giv me fifty cents to send him? You cannot imagin ——" "For an Infidel? No, not we!" they cried, and in a rage rode away from me. As they turned to go I said, "Professor Cook [for him I meant] will be cared for without your aid, my friends. I only wished to test Christian charity. I hav done so, and found it won't stand the test."

In a trial in my town a short while ago I was summoned as a juror. When my time came to swear and kiss the book, I stood up and addressing the court said: "Your honor, I am an Atheist. I believe a dead man is as dead as a dead horse. I believe that the book you ask me to swear by contains more falsehoods and fables than any book of its size in the world; that the God you call on me to acknowledge is a man-made myth rocked in the cradle of ignorant credulity, and wafted to the shores of civilization on seas of human gore." I concluded among mingled hisses and cheers, and the court said I might affirm. But when he came to the words, "So help me God," I arose and said, "Will the court pardon my bluntness in saying that I do not need any God to help me tell the truth?" So I got on that jury scot-free of any Christian oath. But my language shocked one of the lawyers so much that he objected to and excused me, much to my own gratification. The papers and pamphlets I hav been circulating are telling. The preachers hav commenced to howl about the dead heroes, Paine and Voltaire, from the same pulpits where eight months ago I heard them say they supposed there was not a skeptic under the sound of their voices. I hav by my own effort in the last six months converted three men and two young ladies to outspoken skepticism, while many privately agree with me. And I will continue to storm the fort. "GRAY."

INDIAN CREEK, KAN., Dec. 10, 1890.

MR. EDITOR: I send this obituary notice: Died, at his home on Indian Creek, Kan., Oct. 21, 1890, Prof. Pleasant Van Hyatt. He was born in Randolph county, Ind., April 16, 1830, of Quaker parentage. He grew up in the faith, and became a minister of note in the church. Being of an inquiring and Liberal mind, he frequently caused the fathers in the society some anxiety. He came to Kansas about 1867. From there he went to California, where he fell in with the Liberal minds there, among them John R. Kelso, for whom he formed a warm friendship. They debated, they wrote, and criticised each other's thoughts. Returning to Indiana in 1875, he turned his mind to scientific investigation; spent one year in traveling and lecturing before Liberal societies, wrote and had published in pamphlet form "Man before Adam," and "Christ a Myth." He was also the author of several other works, "Ancient Geography," and "Earthquakes." He at different times contributed largely to the Ironclad Age, the Independent Pulpit, and THE TRUTH SEEKER. He was known wherever the English language is spoken. Returning to Kansas in the autumn of 1876, he turned his attention to teaching—which takes us back to his early life. He entered the profession of teaching at the age of eighteen; was elected county superintendent, which office he filled for seven years. Coming to Kansas in 1867 he organized and held at Eudora, Douglas county, Kan., the first Teachers' Normal Institute held in Kansas. He followed teaching for about thirty-five years. One year ago his health failed. In January he had congestion of the right lung, or la grippe, which settled in his head. He partially recovered, was able to ride out; delivered an oration at Fall River on the Fourth of July. It proved to be his last. A few days after, he was taken with severe pains in his back and head. He was confined to his bed for three months before death released him from his suffering. He lived and died an Agnostic. He had no fear of death. He called in his friend, Samuel Clogston, and requested him to deliver an oration over his body. He leaves a wife, one son, and three daughters to mourn his loss. A MOURNER.

BINGHAMTON, N. Y., Dec. 7, E.M. 290.

MR. EDITOR: Could you send me a few sample copies to be used for soliciting subscriptions with? I think I can get one or two subscribers. I keep all my papers, for there is excellent reading in them that I wish to preserve, therefore I cannot use them to canvass with. I hav a continuous file from the first number I read until the last date.

This is a city of thirty-five thousand inhabitants, and we hav about thirteen or fourteen churches, with two Young Men's Christian Associations, to say nothing of three or four Catholic aldermen, and a Catholic recorder in the person of Frank W. Downs. Liberals are very scarce here. The board of supervisors of Brown county are in session here. They paid $156 of the people's money for religious services at the county-house for the past year. When their report is ready for distribution I will send you one, if you wish, to show you how much the county is compelled to pay to the St. Mary's Home for educating young Catholics. They do not pay the Susquehanna Valley Home as much as they do the St. Mary's. The Susquehanna Valley Home is not Catholic. Inclosed find a clipping from the Binghamton Daily Herald, describing the supervisors' visit to the St. Mary's Home. How they flatter the Catholics!

The members of the board of supervisors paid their annual visit to the St. Mary's Orphan's Home yesterday afternoon. They were accompanied by Judge Downs, Overseer of the Poor Dodge, George F O'Neil, Chief of Police Mead, School Commissioner Lusk, and the members of the press. Rev. Fathers Hourrigan and Quinn were also present. Upon arrival they were escorted into a commodious and handsomely furnished parlor. Cigars and a brand of cider of the vintage of 1890 were served. . . . Upon the opposit side of the hall from the reception room is the chapel. It is an impressivly appointed room, containing figures of the Virgin and saints. The rooms on the second floor at the north end are divided into sleeping apartments which are occupied by the sisters. . . . After inspecting the building a choice lunch was served. Judge Downs was called upon for remarks and he responded by giving a brief history of the institution. The property, which includes the building and about thirteen acres of land, was purchased a few years ago for $23,500, and the property to-day is worth $75,000. There are sixteen attendants, all of whom are Sisters, who do not receive any compensation for their services. Remarks were made by the venerable Rev. Father Hourrigan, in which he took occasion to thank the board for what they had done for the institution in the past. Each member also made remarks eulogistic of the institution and Father Hourrigan. The occasion was the source of much pleasure to those who attended. The institution is a model of its kind, and it is conducted on thoroughly business principles. The Catholic church and our citizens generally may well feel proud of the St. Mary's Orphan's Home.

I should like to hav you send me the names of all your subscribers in this city, that I might try and induce them to form an association or Liberal league. I think that in time we could hav a good strong league here in Binghamton.

Yours truly for Universal Mental Liberty,

FRED. F. SLATER.

SOLDIERS' AND SAILORS' HOME, QUINCY, ILL., Dec. 1, 1890.

MR. EDITOR: I wish to announce through your valuable paper some interesting phenomena: First, our Spiritual meetings; second, our dangerous position in the Home, and third, the books published at THE TRUTH SEEKER office. At Merick's Hall in Quincy is held each Sabbath or Lord's day a Spiritual meeting, presided over by a widow, the owner of the building, who does not claim to be a medium, but claims to believe in spirits and claims to be an Infidel. She will sometimes read from some Radical Spiritual paper foolish and extravagant accounts of materialization of spirits, and then read Victor Hugo's "Eulogy on Voltaire," talk in favor of Paine, etc. Then others will be controled and giv lengthy harangs as orthodox as ever were heard from any sky-pilot. So we hav the benefit each Sabbath of both tweedledum and tweedledee. I hav recently aroused the animosity of both orthodox and ignorant Catholics by asserting that the Bible is an enemy of our government. The assertion elicited the condemnation of a Protestant. He said I "had no right to talk so;" that a man could be religious and not believe as I did, with other like illogical, insignificant statements, to which I answered: "Talk to the point. What I said I'll stick to;" and repeated my first statement, telling him he set up a man of straw and commenced to fight it, instead of attacking my proposition. Then said I, "There is not a word in the Bible about a republican government." He said, "Yes, it speaks of sinners and republicans." I offered to bet a V and he assented, but when I drew my pocket-book he drew back. But, he said, if he only had a Bible he'd show me. I handed him one, urging him to stake the money. He declined. I told him I could find the words he had reference to. He said he would hunt it up that evening. So I gave him the book, but he soon laid it down and went away, and I did not see him until bed-time. I took the book and found two places where publicans were spoken of in the Bible. So next morning I pointed him to them. He acknowledged his error, and thus ended that.

The next morning, I think it was, I made a statement about the priest and his confessional, which raised the holy anger of comrade Austerhouse, who said I should not talk so; if I did not want to be religious I should keep my mouth shut; and he would report me to the commanding officer. I told him I should be glad if he would, and that I had a right to tell what I knew. Said I, "You'd like to burn people, would you, as you used to?" The aforesaid orthodox took sides with the Catholic, as hypocrits invariably do, but I was more than a match for both of them. Then after about an hour one of my comrades who had previously shown marked respect for me called me and said he wished to giv me good advice, and I said, "All right, sir." He said, "You must keep still or you will hav to leave, for they will report you sure." He had been put out once, and he knew how it was to be discharged from the Home. I said, "If that is the advice you hav, it was not worth while to trouble about it." I am yet in the Home. Whether I was reported or not I know not. I almost wish I could be brought before the commanding officer to test the result of free speech, as it is questioned whether we hav a right to it or not.

I hav recently read "The Godly Women of the Bible, by An Ungodly Woman." It is superb. I am now engaged on "The Eye-Opener." It is masterly, thorough, and convincing. The Truth Seeker Company is a world-saving institution. EX-REV. J. N. MAXEY.

MAKANDA, ILL., Dec. 20, 1890.

MR. EDITOR: I hav received quite a number of sample copies of papers and magazines, and many circulars, for which, through your columns, I should be glad to return my thanks. I had not supposed that the Lone Star state could support so able and radical a paper as is Brother Shaw's Independent Pulpit. I am not surprised, but very glad, that the West supports Freethought. The many other more or less Radical papers that publish Freethought literature, with the apparent approval of their patrons, show a cheering aspect of the signs of the times. We are evidently nearing the "impending crisis." The threats, outrages, and constant aggression of the religious bigots, both Catholic and Protestant, will, I hope, arouse the Liberal element of our country, and press them into a combination that will successfully meet these pious enemies of liberty and frustrate their wicked plots and schemes.

I hav received from friends several copies of the constitution of the Brotherhood of Moralists, with an invitation to become a member of that order. This request I cannot comply with. It requires its members "to eradicate from the minds of as many as possible all belief in so-called spirit manifestations as vain delusions of superstition," etc. This I cannot consistently do. I am not fully convinced of the truth of Spiritualism. I am an Agnostic on that subject. I do not know. I wait for the light. I hav repeatedly, in my own home, when only my daughter and another lady were present with me, seen a table tip and move over the floor and stop at a designated spot on the carpet, in apparently intelligent response to requests and questions both oral and mental, and I know positivly that the movement was not produced by any of the persons present, but by some invisible power. The easiest, most plausible, and apparently the most logical explanation of the phenomena, was to attribute them to spirit agency, as it was claimed to be, but still some other force may possibly be found to account for it, though so far it has not been found. One of our party believed it to be the work of spirits, and I certainly did not think it a demoralizing faith, neither could I say it was a "vain delusion," or "superstition," or "source of sectarian hatred," without assumption, and illogically begging the question. As Mr. William Lloyd Garrison said, Spiritualism is a question to be settled by evidence or testimony, and while some seekers hav, like Prof. Wm. Denton and many others with whom I hav conversed, obtained evidence so satisfactory that they could say they "know that there is an after-life," others, like yourself and Mrs. Slenker, saw nothing but what seemed humbug. That these manifestations do take place it would seem impossible to doubt. Thousands of living, truthful, intelligent, unimpeachable witnesses, testify that they hav personally witnessed them, just as I can testify that I saw the table move, when, to allow it to reach the spot designated on the carpet, two or three feet distant, I had to move out of the way. It was no more a delusion or superstition than is the present movement of my pen. These manifestations—excluding the many frauds and bogus performances—are actual facts, and the only rational and scientific way of treating the subject is to recognize them as such, and then account for them. They cannot be jeered down or ignored. They indicate something. And science and common sense ask, what is it? That, so far as this question is concerned, is the important matter.

Fifty years ago we were in the midst of an era that "tried men's souls." Under the lead of religious and political bullies and demagogs, mob law as against the Abolitionists was the order of the day, with its usual infamous outrages. Lovejoy was murdered at Alton, and his and other printing-presses demolished. A mob of "Christian gentlemen, of property and standing," led Garrison with a rope around his neck through the streets of Boston, then he was thrown into prison by the mayor. A similar mob burnt Pennsylvania Hall at Philadelphia, and others mobbed Pillsbury, Foster, and others, in New England, and their antislavery coadjutors elsewhere, all over the country, without regard to station, age, or sex. I remember with pleasure that I took an activ part in those trying scenes. My father's house was a union depot on the underground railroad, and I was conductor, and I hav ridden many hundreds of miles, in the dead of the darkest nights, conveying fugitiv slaves toward liberty, knowing that if detected I was liable to a fine of $500, and imprisonment for six months; and though they tried to wreck my trains, I never lost a passenger. Being in full sympathy with the leaders of the antislavery movement, and knowing the sacrifices they were constantly and cheerfully making, I came to think, as I still do, that they were among the best, purest, and noblest characters in human history. Now, this Brotherhood of Moralists repudiates such of these immortal moral heroes as Wm. Lloyd Garrison and H. C. Wright among the dead, and Parker Pillsbury and A. B. Bradford among the living, as unworthy of membership in their moral order, because they happen to hav evidence sufficient to satisfy them of the truth of the after-life. I hav nothing to say against the morality of any of the members of the Brotherhood. I trust they are all as pure as they profess to be, and they may feel that their assumption of superior morality to such men as I hav named is all right, but to me it seems like an absurd and ridiculous assumption of superiority.

It is claimed that the order has a right to call itself by what name, and exclude from its membership whom, it pleases. Certainly it has. But for an association of professed moralists and Liberals to exclude from fellowship men and women who are at least their equals in morals, intellect, devotion to truth and human advancement, and everything else desirable, and say to them, "Stand off, I am holier than thou," and all for a difference of opinion as to the duration of human existence, is absurd and silly.

Some years ago, T. Winter, in one of his characteristic letters in THE TRUTH SEEKER, said,

> There is no life beyond the grave,
> And none will preach it but a knave.

Now, every intelligent person knows that that statement was untrue, and a gross slander on many of the best and purest men and women, both living and dead, our race has produced. So grossly untrue and slanderous was the statement, that I was surprised to see it in my favorit paper, and I waited for some of your Materialistic, moral correspondents to rebuke the writer, but I waited in vain. On the contrary, several wrote and said they "liked the spirit of T. Winter." If of such is the kingdom of the Brotherhood of Moralists, I am decidedly unadapted to the association. It is no time now to quarrel about trifles, and pull apart like ill-grained oxen, instead of pulling unitedly at the load. The land trembles under the tread of the trained and united hosts of superstition and tyranny. They hav already stolen millions of our money, and in many places overthrown our free schools, and threaten the total destruction of our liberties, and we are stupidly quarreling over tweedledum and tweedledee. The church is pursuing the directly opposit course. Instead of magnifying trifling differences, as in former times, and disintegrating and dividing her forces, she is consolidating them for the final struggle against us. Some years ago, three or four of the small Calvinistic Presbyterian churches, having very similar creeds, yet who often opposed each other with much warmth, concluded to giv up their quarrel and unite their forces in one church, and now in their stead we hav the United Presbyterian church. It teaches that if you sing God's praise in any other psalms or hymns than those written by that pious, lecherous miscreant David, you will be damned. It believes in the plenary inspiration of the entire Bible, and of course is a tyrant. It thinks it a duty to compel everyone to honor its creed, and conform their lives to its code of morals. That church furnishes the leaders and many of the rank and file of the God-in-the-Constitution party, and by union and persistence in her infamous projects has become, next to the Catholics, the most dangerous enemy of liberty on this continent. Let us learn from our enemies.

I received the "Pictorial Text-Book" all right, and am much pleased with it. I think it may be made a powerful aid to our cause. W. W. WALKER.

Children's Corner.

Edited by MISS SUSAN H. WIXON, Fall River, Mass., to whom all Communications for this Corner should be sent.

Between the dark and the daylight.
When the night is beginning to lower,
Comes a pause in the day's occupations
That is known as the Children's Hour."

East and West.

Though in the East the sun may rise,
Thence take its course along the skies,
And to the West then make its way
To belt the world with circling day,
Yet not the East should proudly boast
The thronement of the shining host,
Or strive to sit in judgment on
The doings of the West's late one.

Where'er the sun may throw its beam,
At morn or noon or evening gleam,
That spot is gloried by the ray
And equal shares the orb of day;
While every place in honor lies
Which does good work beneath the skies,
And by that sign abides each one
Lit by the sun as it rolls on.

If in the East first flashed the mind
Which lit a path for human kind,
And to the West his feet made way
To gird the earth with civil day,
Then to the West is due full claim
For bearing high the guiding flame,
And to his praise sing loudest song
Who swiftest bears Truth's torch along.

When all the circles of the globe
The spreading light shall gaily robe,
The Eve shall to the Morning say,
"I am the better half of Day;"
The West a new-made East shines on,
The East becomes the Western one.
So round the earth the truth and light
Dispel the phantoms of the night.

JOHN P. GUILD.

A Story of Christmas Night.

It was Christmas night. The snow blew and drifted in heaps on the doorsteps. Nobody ventured out unless obliged to do so. And as pedestrians hurried along past a brilliantly lighted mansion the words of a beautiful song reached their ears, "the sweet old song of long ago." They who were fortunate enough to hav lighted hearths of their own would hurry along with a heartfelt thanksgiving. A little beggar girl sank down on a marble doorstep. She was not a handsome child—no, far from that—but her large dark eyes and her face, though emaciated, expressed nobility of character. Presently she rose, and going to the back door, she asked for something to eat. But the cook was cross and on the point of ordering her away when the housemaid appeared.

"Kate," she said to the cook, "Miss Evelyn wants more ices."

"Miss Evelyn," grumbled the cook, "thinks no one has anything to do but wait on her. Go away, girl. I havn't anything to giv you. Sure, I'm nothing but a beggar myself, or worse, a slave."

Thus dismissed, the poor, hungry, tired child walked away and rested on the doorstep once more. "I feel as though I'm going to die," she murmured, "and I suppose I might as well. No one loves me."

Down, down in the snow she sank, lured to that fatal sleep by Miss Evelyn's beautiful voice singing, "Come unto me, all ye that labor and are heavy laden, and I will giv ye rest."

"I will giv ye rest," she murmured sleepily. "I—will—giv—you—rest."

. . . . . .

Next morning, when the coachman, John, was clearing the doorsteps of the drifts, he was horrified on discovering the dead body of a child. The master of the mansion, Miss Evelyn's father, notified the coroner, and the cook identified her as the beggar of the night before. And Miss Evelyn, the beautiful singer, was horrified. "Why, the idea!" she exclaimed to her father, "of that child dying on our doorsteps! How terrible!" And almost unconsciously she hummed the tune of the night before, "Come unto me, all ye that labor, and are heavy laden, and I will giv ye rest." And a peaceful smile illumined her face as she arranged the silken folds of the curtain. IDA A. BALLOU.

An Inspiring Little Mind.

A quaint speech was that made one day by the little daughter of Lord Roseberry. Her nurse told her that if she would think less in the day, she would dream less in the night. "But I can't help thinking," answered my lady, "for you know I can't make my mind sit down."

Corner Gospel.

THE SANTA CLAUS FICTION.

Thousands and thousands of children will go to sleep on the night of the 24th of December believing a lie—a lie told them by their parents, friends, and guardians. They will be told that some time during the night Old Santa Claus, a big red-faced man with snow-white beard and hair, will come riding through the air in a team loaded down with toys and candy, that his back will be burdened and his pockets bulging with dolls, toy horses, engins, carts, locomotivs, sets of dishes, books, slates, skates, bicyles, and everything else that delights the hearts of boys and girls—that this burly man will creep cautiously down the chimney, and fill the innocent stockings in the corner with a number of these good things, and then mysteriously disappear up the chimney, and away to some other house, where he will go through the same performances.

But if the children be bad, he will leave, instead, a bundle of sticks and a club. Hence the children are pretty sure to be very good for a few days, at least, before the 25th of December.

Now, these fancy tales about Santa Claus are unmitigated falsehoods, and everyone who tells the same to a child who sits in wide-mouthed wonder, is guilty of blackening his lips with lies, and blighting the mind of the child with falsehood.

An innocent falsehood? No. There are no innocent falsehoods when we know their nature.

The children are pleased with the fanciful tale, it is urged. Much more would they be delighted with the simple truth.

No child likes a make-believe story. How often do children inquire when listening to recitals by their elders, "Is it a truly story?" And does it enhance the value of gifts and good will to think that they come from some strange and unfamiliar source? How much rather would a child prefer presents from papa and mamma, uncle and auntie, than from some mythical nobody represented as prowling about only in night time.

Gifts may be unexpected, or be made to appear suddenly in the night-time, but it is wrong, unkind, and wicked to impose upon the credulity of the recipient, to deceive by illusion and fraud, but a child or grown person will value the gift far more knowing from whence and from whom it came, as the following well illustrates:

A party of gentlemen were discussing Kris Kringle and the day's events at the Auditorium dispensary. All or nearly all were relating experiences of the night before or that morning with the little folks. "Boys," said one of the party, a big furniture man on Wabash avenue, "I want to tell you what my little youngster said when he saw the Christmas tree. He is the baby of the house and has taken a most absorbing fancy to his papa. I seem to be to his babyish fancy the be-all and end-all of humanity. My wife and I fixed up the tree last night, and this morning we opened her up just a little after daylight. Three pair of eyes were all ablaze, but the fourth little pair seemed to be missing something. The little ones of course understood that Santa Claus had brought everything, and as Santa Claus had been very liberal older heads marveled somewhat at the indifference of the baby boy to his gifts. Pretty soon the little fellow laid his toys away with a kind of bored expression, and climbing on my knee he lisped, 'Papa, did Thanta Claus bring dose sings?' I said, 'Yes, dear,' repeating the conventional lie. The little chap put his mouth to my ear and whispered, 'Papa, I don't care for Thanta Claus—what is oo doin' to div me?' Boys, maybe I didn't go off and buy that baby something, and giv it to him out of my own hand. Sometimes I think the Santa Claus fable ought to be relegated to the top shelf. That little boy cared nothing for Santa Claus or for his gifts. He did love his papa and wanted him to remember him."—Chicago Herald.

In closing, we would say: Let us avoid fiction in dealing with children, or anybody else. If we tell something not absolutely true to illustrate a point, we should be sure to state the fact.

Truth is incomparably richer and grander than aught else. It is the solid gold. It is the real beauty and the highest wisdom.

As to giving gifts, the time for them should not be marked by the calendar or clock, but whenever we feel like it. Do not hold back good things till "Christmas time," that has no more real meaning than has "Santa Claus." The friend you love and wish to remember may be dead and gone before that time. The poor you intend to make happy may be starving now. You yourself may be stricken ere the close of the year. So it is best to do that you hav to do while the hour is passing. S. H. W.

Correspondence.

GLENS FALLS, N. Y., Nov. 17, 1890.

DEAR MISS WIXON: I will try my first letter for the Corner. I am thirteen years old, and my father has taken THE TRUTH SEEKER for twelve years. He thinks it an excellent paper, and I like the Corner. Our school is located in the center of the village. It is a beautiful Union school. My studies are geography, arithmetic, grammar, spelling, drawing, history, and reading. To-morrow we will hav examination in spelling. The teachers from all the states meet here during the vacation months. It is a very beautiful place.

I hav three brothers. My letter is getting tiresome, so I will bring it to a close. I send my regards to all the Freethinker friends.

Your Liberal friend, BELLE LEWIS.

LISBON, IA., Nov. 24, 1890.

DEAR MISS WIXON: I thought I would write a few lines to you this evening.

I go to Lisbon high school and am in the A grade. I expect to graduate next June. I study algebra, geometry, physics, and bookkeeping.

We liv two and a half miles from town. I walk back and forth night and morning. I like THE TRUTH SEEKER and Boston Investigator very much, especially Heston's pictures. We had a debate in school two weeks ago, in which a girl and I were affirmativ. Question: "Resolved, that Women Should Hav the Right of Suffrage." The affirmativ gained the day.

Lisbon is a town of one thousand inhabitants and six churches. There are not many Liberals here. As I think I now ought to commence studying my lesson for to-morrow, I must soon close.

Your friend, EDWIN A. SAILOR.

P. S.—I would like to correspond with some of the girls and boys of the Corner. I am sixteen years of age. E. A. S.

GRAND MOUND, IA., Oct. 14, 1890.

DEAR MISS WIXON: I thought I would write again and send a little piece to you. I thought maybe that some of the readers of the Corner would like it. This is a very little letter but I guess it will do, and so I will close as, Your little friend,

GOLDIE MAY DUTTON.

THE ANCIENT KRISS KRINGLE.

The ancient Kriss Kringle
Was wondering one night,
What he could get for the boys and girls
To fill them with delight.

His reindeers were hitched up,
And then off he went,
A-frisking and a-jumping,
To his mirth to giv vent.

He peeped down many chimneys that night,
Each stocking he filled that hung on the wall,
And he looked in each bed where the little ones slept;
He kissed each little cheek, he kissed one and all.

But soon it would be bright daylight now,
And to his northern home he must speed,
So good-bye to the children, they will hav happy hours,
By the kindness and good of his deeds.

EDGEWATER, CHICAGO, ILL., Dec. 1, 1890.

DEAR MISS WIXON: We are three little brothers who are "persecuted for opinion's sake," for we are known in our school as the only "horrid Infidels" in attendance. One of our schoolmates ran to her teacher, excitedly exclaiming, "Oh, Miss L., Leon doesn't believe in a God!" and from thence this little maid has proved to even little boys that the spirit of the Inquisition is still perpetuated. We just commenced our attendance at this school this year, and we determined to keep perfectly quiet regarding our misfortune, i.e., our inability to "believe" without evidence, but now that the cat is out of the bag, we are going to trim our lamps and let our light shine, especially if you will help us. We hav thought you would because you are so helpful to so many boys and girls in the Corner. We hav a question-box—that is, the teacher has—into which we, the pupils, put eight or ten questions each week, and then answer them on Friday. Now we want you to giv us some telling Secular questions and their answers in your Children's Corner, if you can conveniently. Our last question was, When and by whom was the Golden Rule first written?

Your loving and grateful friends,
ROY, LEON, AND CHARLIE STILES
(Aged respectivly, 12, 10, and 7 years).

REMARKS.—We all deeply sympathize with these three little boys, Roy, Leon, and Charley. We know what it is to be frowned upon for our opinions. Some may think it of little consequence that a child is made to suffer for its candid opinions. But it is hard and cruel for a child to be hurt. The trials of children are very real, as we know from experience. Roy, Leon, and Charley must be brave, not aggressiv—that is, they must not try to provoke ill feelings, but they must stand firm in that which they hav reason to believe is right. We know they will be truthful, kind, and gentle toward those who deride or disdain them. They will show by their conduct that they are little gentlemen, with honest hearts and good intentions. Some day these same bright boys will show the world the value of real men, who know how to think properly for themselvs, and who will make the great world better by their having lived in it.

"Infidel" is a proud title. It has been borne by some of the greatest and noblest men and women that ever lived.

Here are a few questions for the question-box: What is the age of our earth? Its age is unknown. It is probably more than a hundred thousand years old. Does the Genesis account of creation agree with the geological history? No. Which shall we believe, Genesis or geology? Geology, because it brings proof of all its assertions, while Genesis does not. Which is the better guide, reason or revelation? Reason, because reason insists upon evidence, revelation does not. Who burnt a man at the stake for not believing in three Gods? John Calvin (Servetus). How many leading religions are there in the world? Ten. Which religion has caused most suffering, wars, murders, and ills to mankind? The Christian religion. Who said, "The world is my country; to do good my religion?" Thomas Paine, an Infidel. Who said, "Man can hold no property in man?" Thomas Paine, an Infidel. Who said, "If ever you find yourself in any difficulty, and doubt how to extricate yourself, do what is right, and you will find it the easiest way out of the difficulty?" Thomas Jefferson, an Infidel. To whom is the world indebted for its various reforms and progressiv ways? To Infidels. What happened to Giordano Bruno for establishing a new era of science? He was burnt to death by Christians.—ED. C. C.]

By VALERIAN GRIBAYEDOFF.

With a map and numerous illustrations by well-known artists. Handsomely bound in silk cloth. Ink and gold side stamps. Price, $1 50.

The present volume is an effort to rescue from comparative oblivion one of the many extraordinary episodes of the great French revolutionary war. . . . It points a moral that amidst republican institutions like ours, will not fail to receive appreciation. It shows, on one hand, the elevating influence of newly acquired ambition, . . . and on the other the debasing effects of Religious and Political intolerance both on the tyrant and the victim. Contains a heretofore unpublished letter of Thomas Paine to the French Directory.

DONALD KENNEDY

Of Roxbury, Mass., says

I hav kept a SCRAP BOOK for a good many years of letters received from patients; some are long, too long to publish, some are short and good. Rainy days I sit down and read them, and hav learned a good deal about the human body from some poor, sickly woman or overstrained man. Here is one of them. I call it a good letter:

TRENTON, TEX., Sept. 28, 1886.

To Kennedy of the Medical Discovery, Roxbury, Mass. I am so proud of my recovery as to express my feelings in thanks to you. The RHEUMATISM has made me four legged for six years. At last I hav traded off two of them to Bell—druggist—for four bottles of Kennedy's Discovery. I am yours. gratefully and unsolicited. J. B. IVY.

J. D. SHAW'S PAMPHLETS.

The Bible—What Is It? A pamphlet containing eight chapters in refutation of the assumption that the Bible is a divine book of pure thought, and correct in all its utterances. Price, 25 cents.

Studies in Theology. A clear exposition of the biblical story of man's creation and curse, theologically denominated "the fall." Price, 10 cents.

Liberalism. Treating the subject from a negativ and affirmativ standpoint, showing what it is not and what it is. Price, 5 cents.

FOR HER DAILY BREAD.

A NINETEENTH CENTURY NOVEL.

Preface by R. G. INGERSOLL.

For Her Daily Bread is the story of two young girls and a younger brother who were left parentless, with little money, fair education, and much courage, to make their way through the world by going to Chicago. The author is also the heroin. The narrativ is, in the main, a history of a working girl's life and experience in the city of Chicago among bluff business men, kind hearted folks, and disreputable hypocrits. It is just such a story of human life as we should expect Colonel Ingersoll to be interested in; and whatever he admires and appreciates is sure to be worth the attention of the rest of the world. Price 25 cents.

The Church of Practical Religion.

BY REPORTER.

This is the history of an attempt to found a church without superstituon, and its success. Uncle Job Sawyer, the pastor, having established his pulpit, uses it to discuss all the vital questions of human concern, religious, political, and otherwise. The book is written in well-chosen language, and easily understood. There is just sufficient narrativ about it to interest the reader and hold his attention while the truth is being brought to his mind.

A negro at Kansas City, Mo., named Reuben Carter, is heading a religious craze patterned after the Indian one. He claims to be a messiah of his race, and says the white race will be destroyed next spring. He urges his kind to leave the whites or they will perish with them. In the spring, he says, he will lead his followers to Oklahoma, which is the promised land, and he will then exhibit miraculous power. Cities will rise in a night for his followers. He describes these cities, and they are in detail like the cities of Revelation. Carter has gone into retirement until New Year's day, and some of his disciples say he will then appear with signs and miracles. His converts hold nightly "ghost dances" and orgies, and are growing so wild that trouble is feared.

Gems of Thought.

Not only physical but also psychical energies inhere in matter, and the latter always become manifest wherever the necessary conditions are found; or wherever matter is arranged in a certain manner and moved in a certain way in the brain or the nervous system, the phenomena of sensation and thought are produced, in similar fashion as those of attraction and repulsion are under other conditions. "If matter can fall to the ground, then it can also think" (Schopenhauer). In the form of a stone it falls to the ground; in the form of muscle it contracts; in the form of living nerve-substance it becomes capable of feeling and of thinking, or rises into self-consciousness. —Buchner.

To-day, we know with as much certainty as we need to know anything, that force is not independent of matter, and that the activities or manifestations of brain substance, which we call mind, are not only inseparable from the brain, but modified by every varying shade of development or susceptibility in the cerebral organization. All this is more than proved by phrenology; hence it follows that the laws of organic matter are as invariable as those of inorganic matter, and that mental phenomena are but links in the eternal chain of cause and effect, which are as mechanically necessary as the expressions of the grossest substance.—Edgar C. Beall.

In the last forty years, criminal convictions in England hav decreased fully one-half, while church attendance has declined. It is therefore not religion that has wrought the reform.—Robt. C. Adams.

Man has found that those who are the most religious are not always the kindest, and that those who hav been and are the worshipers of God enslave their fellow men. He has found that there is no necessary connection between religion and morality. Morality needs no supernatural assistance—needs neither miracle nor pretense. It has nothing to do with awe, reverence, credulity, or blind, unreasoning faith. Morality is the highway perceived by the soul, the direct road, leading to success, honor, and happiness. The best thing to do under the circumstances is moral. The highest possible standard is human. We put ourselvs in the places of others. We are made happy by the kindness of others, and we feel that a fair exchange of good actions is the wisest and best commerce. We know that others can make us miserable by acts of hatred and injustice, and we shrink from inflicting the pain upon others that we hav felt ourselvs: this is the foundation of conscience. If man could not suffer, the words right and wrong could never hav been spoken. The Agnostic, the Infidel, clearly perceives the true basis of morals, and so perceiving, he knows that the religious man, . . . caring more for God than for his fellows, will sacrifice his fellows at the supposed command of his God.—Ingersoll.

To the World's Columbian Exposition Commission:

Learning that there is an organized movement among the more conservative church people—manipulated by a "Sabbath" organization—to induce your honorable body to close on Sundays the World's Fair, to be held in 1893 in Chicago, the undersigned respectfully put in this counter petition, and ask that the Fair may be open to the public on each Sunday of its continuance. We ask this for the following reasons:

1. That the American principle of separation of church and state may be maintained.

2. That public morality may be subserved by providing a substitute for the immoral places to which men may resort when no moral amusements are available.

3. As a matter of justice also to the people of Chicago who have given of their means to make the Fair possible, tens of thousands of whom can visit the Fair only on a general holiday; and as a matter of justice also to the visitors to the Fair, whose time or means may be limited, and who certainly are entitled to great consideration at your hands.

4. For the public good. The opening of the Fair on Sunday will be for the benefit not only of Chicago, but of the whole country. The rights of no one are infringed, the happiness of no one disturbed. Those who wish to attend can do so; those who do not can otherwise spend the day. This is a solely humanitarian question, a question of human relations and human welfare, and, therefore, the only standard by which you can decide is that of the public welfare.

5. It will benefit the Fair, attracting a much larger attendance, interesting more people in it, and increasing its receipts.

6 To the objection that Sunday opening of the Fair will destroy the day as a rest-day, we affirm that the tendency would be exactly the opposite. The more beautiful you make Sunday, the more attractive, the more noble and varied in its pleasures and instructions, the more difficult it will be to change its character, the less danger there is that employers will ever have the power to transfer it from its present position to the days of toil. With choice of Sunday occupation restricted to attending church or visiting a saloon, the average workingman would choose to keep on laboring.

7. Finally: Opening the World's Fair on Sunday will harm no one but the keepers of immoral places, while it will benefit the Fair itself, the people of Chicago, and the visitors to the Fair, thereby conducing to municipal prosperity, individual education, public morality, and the development and good of the whole country.
